the cadets

Dear Sirs: As a former faculty member at the Air Force Academy, I would like to take issue with "Why the Cadets Cheat" by J. Arthur Heise: The Nation, May 15.

First of all, it appeared to me to be a perfect example of a post hoc ergo propter hoc argument. There can obviously be no doubt that cheating did occur and there is also no doubt that Mr. Heise does state certain "facts" concerning educational procedures at the Academy. But at no time does he put these together in any meaningful cause-and-effect relationship. . . .

Mr. Heise takes Representative Talcott completely out of context to reinforce the disputable logic mentioned earlier. First of all, he neglects to mention Mr. Talcott's introductory statements. Let me quote one of them:

> By every accepted criteria, the Academy is accomplishing its mission superbly. To have achieved such high levels of attainment in such a short period is remarkable. Many can share the credit—the U. S. taxpayer, the Air Force, the Academy staff and its instructors, and the Cadet Wing.

The only statements which Mr. Talcott makes which are in any way similar to the charges brought by Mr. Heise are those which pertain to "Faculty Meetings" and "Excessive Emphasis on Symbols."

It is very interesting to me that Mr. Heise, who occupied a position in the Academy library, feels himself qualified to condemn an educational program which has not been found wanting by many who, on academic credentials, would appear to be far more qualified. . . .

It appears to me that Mr. Heise has simply not done his homework. I think he began with a conclusion and then found some "facts" which would prove his point. . . .

The greatest disservice which Mr. Heise has done to the Academy is to imply that the academic atmosphere is completely regimented. I taught for more than five years and at no time did anyone tell me how I had to conduct my classes. . . .

Ross C. Alm, Lt. Col., USAF, former associate professor of English and Speech, USAF Academy

Cheektowaga, N. Y.

Dear Sirs: Colonel Alm merely identifies himself as a former Air Force Academy faculty member. I feel it important to note—in view of his epithet-laced charges—that he is presently assigned to the office of the Academy's chief of staff, to a job which, according to Academy sources, includes the public relations duty of writing speeches for the school's superintendent.

Colonel Alm charges that I took Representative Talcott out of context. In turn, he quotes one paragraph from the Congressman's dissenting views appended to the 1965 report of the Board of Visitors. It is the only totally complimentary paragraph on the Academy's overall successes and is followed by this, the next line: "Having given well deserved credit, I offer the following comment as constructive criticism." It continues for 5 pages, ranging over various Academy activities. After touching on faculty meetings (". . . as known in quality universities, are not utilized at the Academy"), symbols of success, heavy workloads, failure by the faculty to detect cheating, he said:

> Although the dean tendered statistics to dispel the misinformed charge of excessive academic pressures, I believe we should not dismiss the possibility completely and that the pervasive emphasis upon scores and other symbols, rather than upon substantive learning and the acquisition of knowledge, contributed to, or was symptomatic of, the cheating incident.

Wall of Words

The war of nerves has replaced the clash of arms as a means to alter the map of the Middle East. The choice of the General Assembly as the arena for this verbal confrontation, and the decision of Soviet Premier Aleksei Kosygin to lend solemnity and drama to the occasion by appearing in person have assured the maximum echo to this grand exercise in diplomatic pressure.

What can be achieved in the circumstances is another matter. The stage was set the very first day by the statements of Premier Kosygin and President Johnson (the latter addressed to the General Assembly even though spoken from Washington). The American proposals, later amplified by Ambassador Goldberg, were eminently "reasonable" and would indeed be constructive, if they could be taken out of the context of an essentially emotional conflict. But the Palestinian question is not now—and, in fact, has never been—a problem in arithmetic, where advantages and concessions can be balanced for the greatest benefit of all. It is a problem of two-way communication, and only if communication is established can concrete issues like borders, refugees, free navigation and economic development be tackled.

The American call for negotiations, with or without a third party, is as unrealistic at this stage as Israel's offer to negotiate separately with each of its Arab neighbors. Even if the necessary two-thirds majority could be mustered in the General Assembly for the U.S. resolution, which is not at present the case, it would not be heeded by the Arab countries, save perhaps Jordan, which has already executed two about-faces in less than a month and stands now in a state of territorial amputation and political jeopardy.

At the other end of the spectrum the Russians call for condemnation of Israel and unconditional withdrawal of its forces from conquered Arab territory. The motivation of the Soviet Government was obviously to regain in a diplomatic offensive the prestige it had lost with the Arab world when it warned President Nasser against reckless moves and concurred, in the Security Council, with the United States' call for an unconditional cease-fire. In the General Assembly, Premier Kosygin has courted support with two major themes. First, he raised the specter of a major war, of which any regional armed conflict can be the seed, and found there an opportunity to evoke the curse of the Vietnamese War (so have the French). Second, he depicted the actions of Israel as the latest attempt of colonialism and imperialism to counter the forces of national liberation and to pursue the economic oppression of the struggling Third World. Mr. Kosygin stopped short of associating himself, however, with Arab outcries about "American and British complicity in the aggression," and set the Soviet Union on record as recognizing the existence of the state of Israel and its right to live.

The Soviet resolution is as incapable of obtaining the necessary two-thirds majority in the General Assembly as is the U.S. resolution. The USSR has no illusion on that account, although it can expect a much better showing in the General Assembly than in the Security Council. Again, a vote in the General Assembly asking for unconditional withdrawal of the Israeli forces to the 1956 armistice line would be no more heeded by Israel than would the U.S. resolution by the Arabs. This is a case where the two superpowers do not control for the moment the decisions of "client countries." In the present mood of Israel and the Arab nations, Washington cannot make the government of Premier Eshkol abandon territorial gains with nothing in return, and Moscow could not, even if it wished, force the UAR and Syria to talk with Israel.

This is written before the meeting between President Johnson and Premier Kosygin, but it is doubtful that they can engage in a meaningful discussion of the Middle East at this time. The most effective measure which could be taken by both governments would be an agreement to discontinue arms shipments to both sides. In the present climate, Moscow could not even hint at such a move without causing an even worse accusation of "sellout" from Arab capitals. Actually, the threat of massive arms shipments to the Arab countries is Moscow's trump card to force Israel into a military withdrawal. The Soviet Union is not likely to relinquish it, even if Israel shows nerves of steel. Probably even the unpublicized part of the Kosygin-Johnson meeting will deal only in generalities, each side wanting to show that its policy of coexistence has not been shattered by the Middle East crisis or even the Vietnamese War.

As for the General Assembly, after an outpouring of grievances, it will have to content itself, most probably, with humanitarian assistance to the refugees and such procedural devices as sending a UN representative to the area or strengthening the observers' corps of General Odd Bull. A call to Israel for a conditional withdrawal from recently conquered territory might be issued by the Assembly, but vague assurances given to Israel in compensation might hardly make it worth while for the Israeli Government. In this case, the pressure would continue on and on, in the Assembly, in the Security Council, for Israel to withdraw. A long and hot summer is ahead.

Political progress on the Palestine question (much less a settlement of it) cannot be expected in the foreseeable future. If the war has eased some immediate problems for Israel, it did not solve the basic ones and undoubtedly created new ones as well. A marriage of convenience is not in the offing. Perhaps Israel could shorten the period of uneasy waiting by showing generosity and understanding on the refugee problem. It could practice enlightened self-interest by announcing its willingness to return to the original UN partition plan, which provided for an Arab state of Palestine between Israel and Jordan and a special status for Jerusalem and its holy places.

ANNE WEILL-TUCKERMAN

The Chinese H-Bomb

The event of the week that began on June 18 was not the opening of the debate in the UN on the Middle East crisis. That was important, but predictable: an astute commentator could have written the speeches before they were delivered. Nor was what was said of long-term significance—that will come later. The big event, not only of the week but of the year, was China's explosion of a hydrogen bomb.

Historically, China has come full circle. Until somewhere around the 15th century, it was a leading nation in terms of the then current science and technology. Thereafter it was eclipsed by small European countries like England and Holland, followed by the United States, which still holds the lead. The possession of the hydrogen weapon does not give China equality with the West but it does give it a place among the elite of nations by the one commonly accepted measure—destructive power in its most concentrated form.

The speed of the achievement is remarkable. China detonated its first atomic or fission bomb on October 16, 1964. In less than three years, it has gone from A to H. France, which is no mean scientific and industrial power, set off its first A-bomb test in 1960 and has yet to detonate an H-bomb. One of America's leading scientists, himself closely identified with the U.S. nuclear development, regards the Chinese achievement as "an intelligent, uninterrupted flow of effort and energy."

The usual fatuous effort will be made to explain the Chinese success on the basis of earlier U.S. work in the field. A few of the Chinese scientist-engineers have worked at American universities, but what they learned there was in open literature and available to every student and instructor. Moreover, the experience of every member of the nuclear club shows that success depends not on a few scientists and engineers of genius but on inspired leadership coupled with a broadly based engineering community and the ability to translate scientific insight into industrial reality. The explosion of the Chinese fusion bomb marks the emergence of Asia into the modern world of science and technology—by its own efforts.

The first American hydrogen explosion was that of an experimental model which was too large and heavy to be transported. A bomb was developed later. Rep. Craig Hosmer, a member of the Joint Congressional Atomic Energy Committee, reported on June 19 that China had tested an actual weapon, which could be reproduced in quantity and presumably improved in yield relative to weight. From a military and diplomatic standpoint, this is important. China and the United States confront each other in Vietnam. If the United States should invade North Vietnam, or that country should be on the verge of collapse, China would probably counter with land forces of its own. The United States would then have the option of nuclear retaliation, both tactically on the battlefield and against the Chinese nuclear plants. But if China has available even short-range means of delivery of its nuclear devices, it might not be as vulnerable to U.S. nuclear attack as some of our strategists have assumed.

By the end of 1968, perhaps sooner, China may possess some fifty medium-range (up to 1,000 miles) missiles with nuclear payloads for use against Russian targets. Chinese hydrogen bombs pose something of a threat even to the U.S. mainland. The one used in the most recent test was said to have a yield of about 3 megatons. Anything in the megaton range poses a threat of unknown magnitude in destruction of life and property. Some U.S. experts believe it might be feasible to explode such devices at distances of the order of 100 miles off the U.S. West Coast, and to rely on sea waves and fallout for destructive effects against cities. If deterrence deters, the Chinese possess, or soon will possess, means of deterrence which must be taken into account by their opponents. In a nuclear sense, China is no longer a sitting duck.

The Chinese have once more solemnly declared that at no time and in no circumstances will China be the first to use nuclear weapons. Our hawks will credit such declarations as little as they assume similar assurances by us would weigh in a future nuclear confrontation, but the fact remains that the Chinese have said it repeatedly, and we have not said it even once. That the Chinese attitude is defensive seems plausible enough. It is hard to see how an aggressive nuclear policy would be in their interest. In February, 1965, Dr. Allen S. Whiting, then director of the Office of Research and Analysis for the Far East in the Department of State, said in an address at the University of Michigan that the Chinese "do not want to expand their territory, they want to expand their influence. And this ultimate goal, of expanding their political power, acts as a restraint on their use of military might."

Our own militarists will no doubt use the Chinese thermonuclear capability as an argument for a U.S. anti-missile-missile system, cost what it may. But to political analysts the event may be more reassuring than disquieting. Whiting is probably on sound ground in his evaluation of Chinese objectives. If so, their hydrogen bomb is not a threat to world peace. The threat lies rather in our much greater nuclear arsenal, and in our determination to maintain a military position on the Chinese borders.

Call It Up!

More than a year ago, the United States succeeded in placing on the UN Security Council agenda a draft resolution on Vietnam. It envisioned "immediate discussions without preconditions" to arrange a conference for the application of the Geneva accords of 1954 and 1962. The first order of business of the conference was to be a cessation of hostilities under effective supervision—presumably that of the UN.

That was all. The resolution is still on the agenda, but the United States has never pressed for a debate or a vote. The resolution is a sleeper amid the forgotten peace feelers and the unforgotten escalations of the Vietnamese tragedy. Ambassador Goldberg could call it up for discussion at any time, and the call for discussion would not be subject to veto.

A man who remembers this particular "stillborn initiative" is Sen. Mike Mansfield. He is one of the handful of Senators whose acquaintance with the Vietnamese problem is based on intense concern and first-hand investigation. He has toured the theatre of war five times and made his share of mistakes. At one time he subscribed to the domino theory, and he was a persistent admirer of President Ngo Dinh Diem. He has not attacked the Johnson Administration's Vietnamese policy as Senators Gruening and Morse, for instance, have done, but for the past four years he has voiced misgivings at each escalation and made no secret of his view that the bombing of the North has been a military failure. Now he urges on the Administration a revival of the initiative in the Security Council which was not pursued at the time of its introduction.

The perils of bringing it back to life are obvious but hardly calculated to frighten the President, his phlegmatic Secretary of State, or Ambassador Goldberg, whose assurance in debate is equaled by few and excelled by none. Harsh words would fly but, as Mr. Mansfield says, escalation of words is not to be feared. And barring some such solution as the one he proposes, all that can be expected is more bloodshed and more frustration. Asserting that it is a closely guarded secret, Rowland Evans and Robert Novak reveal that General Westmoreland wants additional troop strength of nearly 140,000, to raise the total under his command above 600,000. Premier Ky, in between electioneering trips in his campaign for the Presidency, has graciously seconded General Westmoreland's request. Thus, when Secretary McNamara arrives in Vietnam to see how the war is going, he will not need to do much figuring; and he can be sure, on the basis of past experience, that the new plateau will not be the last.

Senator Mansfield's proposal, if acted upon, might end what otherwise seems endless. Richard Dudman of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch suggests that Hanoi, Peking and the National Liberation Front could be invited to such a conference, as Peking was invited to the Korean War debate in 1950. Another precedent involves the Jewish Agency for Palestine, which took part in the 1948 debate on the Middle East. The NLF has certainly earned the right to representation at a regional conference, not only by its status as a de facto belligerent but because no settlement is conceivable without it. Premier Ky would object, but as one American officer in Vietnam is quoted as saying: "We've been trying the get-along-at-all-costs system for a long time. You would think that it would occur to someone to try something else for a while." Senator Mansfield's seems the best formula at the moment.

In any case, having succeeded in placing the resolution on the agenda of the Security Council, do we dare let the impression prevail that we are afraid to call it up for discussion?

Advice to Congressmen

One way or another, every Congressman will have to consider the issue of Vietnam in the 1968 election. The hawks, the Birchites, the automatic conformists, and the superpatriots will want to be told why the war is not being pushed more aggressively. On the other hand, any number of peace organizations will be seeking interviews with their Congressmen on this same issue. It is the irrepressible issue, and by 1968 all the platitudes will have been worn threadbare.

Why, then, wait for the angry delegations to appear for the discussions that may leave the problem more confused than before? The wise Congressman will anticipate what is to come and organize his own meeting. It will provide clarification and serve to define his own position —at least he will not be in danger of defeat through misunderstanding. There is firm precedent for such a procedure. In July, 1965, Rep. Robert Kastenmeier, out of a deep conviction that the dialogue on Vietnam should be kept open, announced that he was going to hold a public hearing on the question in his Wisconsin district. He did, he is still a member of the House, and few are more useful in its deliberations.

The format for a meeting on Vietnam is simple. The essential thing is that all representative views shall be heard. In his successful experiment, Mr. Kastenmeier laid down a few ground rules: hear the experts first, then the spokesmen for organizations, then individuals. This sequence prepares the audience for a creative listening role and saves time. Without being denied an opportunity to be heard, individuals may conclude that their views have already been adequately aired. If not, they will be given their chance, but to insure a degree of seriousness in connection with the presentations, Mr. Kastenmeier required each speaker to fill out and file in advance a form of identification.

The hearings continued for two days in Madison and received general approbation. The New York Times and Columbia Broadcasting System were among those that sent reporters. Subsequently, Mr. Kastenmeier published, at his own expense, a book, Vietnam Hearings: Voices

From the Grass Roots, that sold through several editions and was later reissued by Doubleday.

There are variants of the idea, like the meeting held at the Hotel Roosevelt in New York City by the New York State Americans for Democratic Action on June 10. Three Representatives from the area, all eminently worth attention, spoke at the hearing: Benjamin S. Rosenthal (Queens), William F. Ryan (Manhattan), and Lester L. Wolff (Nassau), together with seven distinguished panelists. There was only one weakness in this admirable attempt to carry forward a genuine dialogue between the people and their Representatives on foreign policy: it was completely ignored by the press. However constituted, such meetings can serve only to enlighten the voters and make next year's election more meaningful. And if there were more such hearings, the press might pay closer attention to them.

Instant Politics

Half of the Big Ten student bodies—generally among the most conservative—this year elected New Left candidates as student body presidents. But there has been no evidence that the political pulse is beating faster on these campuses; on the contrary, student interest in civil rights, peace and related issues is less intense, by all reports, than it was last year. Political "activism," now as yesterday, attracts only a minority of students—15 per cent at Stanford and the University of California as shown by one recent study. The new mood reflects not a quickening interest in politics as politics but an impatience with things-as-they-are, a generalized resentment against being treated, as it is often expressed, as "IBM cards" in impersonal knowledge factories.

Surveys have shown that this feeling is nearly twice as prevalent among students at the large state universities as it is in smaller colleges, public or private. Even at Oklahoma State, where Stetsons and boots are more common than beards, the students are on a rampage against remote, unresponsive administrative practices. Frustrated in their attempts to get the regular campus parties and political types to "do something"—that is, to change overnight educational theories and administrative practices that have long prevailed in the Big Ten universities—students at Northwestern, Michigan, Michigan State, Wisconsin, Indiana University and Iowa State, have voted in New Left candidates as student body presidents. The same thing happened at Stanford last year when David Harris, a bearded New Leftist who modestly estimated his real adherents at 200, was swept into office in a surge of protest (see "The Rebel President," The Nation, May 16, 1966).

But protests of this sort, which stem from frustration, too often result in further frustration. David Harris, for example, resigned at Stanford because he felt, and quite correctly, that he did not represent student body opinion and could not, therefore, provide effective leadership. One of the Big Ten New Leftist student body presidents resigned for the same reason. The trouble traces back to the traditional American impatience with long-term political planning. It is not this generation's fault that it shares the national folk belief in politics as a form of reflex action—an endless rotation of "ins" and "outs"—but it is not too early for students, and the rest of us, to realize that, now more than ever, "instant politics" is a mirage. Today's political problems demand a degree of planning, preparation and organization, a degree of effort and commitment and patience, that we have not brought to politics for a long time—which is another way of saying that, on and off the campus, events are bringing us back to such political fundamentals as power and purpose.

The Emergence of Conyers

In politics there is no substitute for the right man in the right place. Rep. John Conyers, Jr., of Michigan fulfills both requirements perfectly in the one-man, one-vote situation. Some time back, the House was in the process of slipping through a bill, H.R. 2508, which would have undermined the Supreme Court's decision by allowing Congressional districts to deviate as much as 35 per cent from the proper ratio. In 1972, the variation would have been scaled down to 10 per cent, but in 1968 and 1970, one-man, one-vote would have lost almost all meaning. The bill would also have permitted considerable gerrymandering of districts.

This bit of sabotage was reported out of committee without hearings, and appeared to have clear sailing ahead, when Representative Conyers, who is a Negro, objected and said he wanted to file a minority report. He was given twelve hours to do so. Under a rule to allow no amendments, he lost, 289 to 63, in the House. Since 279 districts in twenty-two states are in noncompliance with the Supreme Court's decision, the matter is of no small importance. H.R. 2508 would have permitted a portion of a Negro district to be combined with a white suburb, with the effect of cutting down Negro voting power. That was one of Conyers' objections.

Overridden in the House, he took his fight to the Senate, where his stand aroused the interest of Sen. Edward Kennedy, who called on his brother Robert for help, with the result that a better bill was passed in the Senate. The matter now goes to a conference session, with the Senate conferees coupling Edward Kennedy with the old standbys, Eastland, Ervin, McClellan, Hruska and Dirksen. The House conferees are on a higher level—Celler of New York, Herbert Tenzer of New York, William M. McCulloch of Ohio, Clark MacGregor of Minnesota—and Conyers. Later Celler added Byron Rogers of Colorado and Charles Mathias of Maryland. Under these auspices, the propects for a halfway decent bill are not bad.

There are now six Negroes in Congress—without Adam Clayton Powell, only five. Conyers would like to see something like forty Negroes in the House after the 1968 election. Whether or not that far more salutary ratio can be achieved depends to a large extent on the outcome of the impending conference. Reform Democrats in the House should give Conyers active assistance. Had it not been for him, H.R. 2508 might have had easy sailing.

Langston Hughes

Langston Hughes loved literature. He loved it not fearfully, not with awe. His respect for it was never stiff nor cold. His respect for it was gaily deferential. He considered literature not his private inch, but great acreage. The plantings of others he not only welcomed but busily enriched.

He had an affectionate interest in the young. He was intent, he was careful. The young manuscript-bearing applicant never felt himself an intruder, never went away with Oak turned ashes in the hand.

Mightily did he use the street. He found its multiple heart, its tastes, smells, alarms, formulas, flowers, garbage and convulsions. He brought them all to his table-top. He crushed them to a writing-paste. The pen that was himself went in. . . . GWENDOLYN BROOKS

Tel Aviv

Israel has won the war, but there is little jubilation in Tel Aviv today as all eyes focus intently upon the more difficult battle for peace that lies ahead. Israeli's pride in the dramatic force, the amazing swiftness with which it destroyed the Arab ring of steel, bursting the bubble of Nasser's threat of "obliteration," is muted by two sobering considerations. The more immediate curb on celebration here is the price in human life paid for this national breathing spell. In so small a nation, so intimately integrated, few families could feel themselves remote from the front, or escape the tragedy of battle. In longer range, the Israelis perfectly understand that the other side of the victory coin they have stamped out in Sinai is the bitter humiliation of Nasser. Whatever may be said here concerning Nasser's military skill, no one underestimates his pride. Born itself from the ashes of Hitler's holocaust, Israel is not unconscious of the revivifying potential of humiliation and defeat. Naturally, every Israeli hopes that Nasser and his allies are capable of learning a lesson from the disaster that struck them in June, but some fear that the utter humiliation may only fan fresh flames of Arab hatred. Israel has not been lulled by victory into a mood of deceptive self-confidence.

The crucial problem confronting Israel at present is how to secure national integrity without future fighting. It hopes to retain strategic outposts captured in Jordan and Syria, as well as the Old City of Jerusalem, but fears that its startling display of military strength will in itself undermine world support for the claim that such positions are essential to its continued existence. No one speaks of attempting to remain permanently in Sinai or in the vast bulk of land taken from Jordan. Any such occupation would overextend Israel's army and place an impossible burden upon its economy. Israelis have no desire to repeat the errors of Western Europe's 19th-century imperial expansionism. Even if they had the resources, they express no wish to maintain martial rule over the more than 1 million Arabs living in the borderland regions their armies have overrun. What they do want is unequivocal recognition by each of their neighboring states, full and open acceptance of their national status in consonance with its reality. They insist, moreover, that international force assure them that no life line as vital to Israel's survival as the Strait of Tiran be arbitrarily closed to them again.

Modest as these demands may seem after the spectacular victory, the Israelis recognize that neither goal will be easy to win. They fear that in the world debate oil interests and Afro-Asian votes will seek to deprive them of the advantage they have won in battle. Their anxiety today stems from recognition that in the world's council chambers they remain virtually alone.

Israelis are convinced that, until peace treaties are signed, Egypt and Syria will continue to divert their impoverished populations from the complex problems of internal development by raising the cry of "liberation for Palestine." Diplomatic recognition would relieve the claustrophobic feeling of isolation and apprehension, and Israel is ready now to establish contacts at every level of diplomatic, economic and cultural activity with all of its Arab neighbors. People with whom I have spoken are convinced that once such relations are launched the walls of hatred, mistrust and fear will begin slowly to crumble, and through them will pass roads of cooperation and mutual respect, if not friendship.

These recent weeks have taught Israel many things, not only about itself but about its place in the eyes of the world. U Thant's capitulation of May 19 to Nasser's demand just one day earlier that UN troops be withdrawn from the borders cannot be understood by Israelis in any terms other than betrayal. The hypothesis that U Thant surrendered in order subsequently to strengthen his bargaining position in Cairo is even less acceptable to the Israelis than it had been to Americans. Given the personality and professed goals of Egypt's ruler, Israelis ask how any rational mind could have failed to realize that Nasser would be emboldened to increasingly aggressive action. Despite the green light from U Thant, however, few Israelis can believe that Nasser would have been capable of so supreme a level of self-deception as to think that he could beat Israel if he had not counted on firm support from Russia. Pan-Arab unity was forged with Russian support and, though it desperately appealed to the United States, Britain and France, Israel found itself alone.

The transformation of Near Eastern power has given Israelis the confidence to think in terms that were hitherto impossible. Some speak, for example, of creating a "Palestine Nation" out of the borderland regions of Gaza and those conquered from Jordan. Until now, the "refugee" problem could never have been openly discussed here as a nationalist movement of Palestinian people. It may still be impossible to gain support from any of the governments involved for the creation of a state of Palestine next to the state of Israel, yet this may ultimately prove to be the only way in which the "refugees" used for the past nineteen years by Egypt, Jordan and Syria as saboteurs against Israel, can be persuaded to settle down to peaceful pursuits. With a homeland of their own, Palestine Arabs could regain their pride, and though Israel could not be expected to return any of the land it claims, it might be willing to pay compensation, or at least to help its neighbor in the early years. Whether Eshkol, Nasser, Hussein, or leaders of the Palestine Liberation Organization itself would seriously consider such a scheme remains to be seen. The significance of its unofficial articulation here is the evidence it shows of Israel's intellectual flexibility and creative endeavor now to force a truly permanent peaceful settlement.

Whatever solution is reached among the nations of this troubled region, Israel knows that at least its immediate workability must depend upon the joint efforts of the great powers. Russia's break of diplomatic relations is recognized here as a sop to Nasser, and Israelis hope that the pragmatism of Russia's long-range international policy will prevail over present-day Arab partisanship.

Naturally, Israel looks to the United States for strong diplomatic support. The general disappointment felt here at our failure to take a firm stand on the crisis caused by the closing of the Strait of Tiran is tempered by Israel's faith in our often reiterated commitment to its national survival. The great wave of popular sympathy for Israel's plight that rolled across America has also been a source of hope, and helped counterbalance Washington's official position of cool neutrality. Yet Israel will not soon forget that when the chips were down and the wheel of Near Eastern destiny began its perilous spin toward war, the United States of America left it to stand alone.

THE NEGRO IN VIETNAM

KARL H. PURNELL

Mr. Purnell is a former member of the Pennsylvania legislature and publisher of The Union County Journal of Lewisburg, Pa.

Saigon

This year, 15,000 Negro GIs, after a twelve-month tour of duty in Vietnam, will return to the ghettos of New York and Chicago, the backwoods of Tennessee and the small towns of Alabama. As members of the armed forces, many of these soldiers are being given their first taste of integration into a white man's world. Admittedly, it is not total integration. Nevertheless, it is usually better than what many American Negroes have experienced before, and the soldiers serving in Vietnam are finding this partial equality agreeable.

Consequently, the prospect of returning to a society where no commanding officer will enforce the rules of fair treatment is stirring a fierce if well-concealed resentment among Vietnam's Negro soldiers. The extraordinary irony of fighting for the freedom of an Asian country they had never heard of, while being denied freedom at home, is certain to add new and explosive fuel to the current revolution of American Negroes who are rejecting the principles of nonviolence.

After two months of talking with Negro troops in Vietnam, I am convinced that a new breed of impatient young men is going home, ready to provide shock troops for the civil rights movement. Moderates such as Martin Luther King and Whitney Young will find them hard to control; they are much more likely to hear the appeal of such militant dissenters as Stokely Carmichael or the late Malcolm X.

It would be hard to conceive of any experience which could cause as major a shift in the attitudes of young American Negroes as has been accomplished by sending almost a third of them to Vietnam. For the past decade, the disciples of segregation have promised that only by "getting them educated" could the freedoms promised by the United States Constitution ever be made available to the colored race. Vietnam is providing this education in a more decisive and dramatic fashion than a hundred integrated "Ole Miss" universities could ever do. In the jungles and rice fields, thousands of young men are learning what it means to fight and die for the name of freedom. It is a lesson which will not be easily forgotten.

Several national magazines, countless newspapers, and at least one major television network have presented an image of the returning Negro as well satisfied with military integration and only mildly disturbed by the prejudice he must face at home. The armed services are described as models of integration where every man is equal. Negro soldiers are quoted on their disenchantment with civil rights leaders who oppose the war.

To understand how this misleading picture is conveyed, one must appreciate how news is gathered in Vietnam, as well as the pressures which exist on a Negro soldier. Most reporters working for the big news organizations are a harried lot. Constant requests for stories cross their desks, and in the same week they may have to cover a Marine patrol on the North Vietnamese border and interview Jayne Mansfield on her reactions to a visit with the troops.

With a few exceptions, such as The Washington Post's Negro writer, Jesse Lewis, reporters assigned to a story on Negro reaction have lined up as many "quickie interviews" as possible in two or three days. One national magazine sent a reporter to a military air terminal where dozens of GIs were waiting for a hop. There he could interview ten or fifteen Negroes in an afternoon, date lining the story from the soldier's base somewhere in Vietnam. Naturally, no Negro or white soldier reveals his thoughts on such a sensitive question to a reporter on the run. The answers have been as routine as the questions:

REPORTER: How do you feel about equality in the Army?

ANSWER: We're all soldiers here. Color is a forgotten issue.

REPORTER: What about Martin Luther King?

ANSWER: He's lost his cool, man. What does he know about Vietnam?

In the case of television, the answers are even more predictable. Imagine a young Negro captain in line for a promotion being asked whether he thinks the high ratio of Negroes killed in the war is a result of discrimination: "No sir, they volunteer because they realize the importance of fighting communism." It comes out like a message from a computer.

One afternoon, I returned to Saigon from Danang on a plane with a Negro officer. During the trip, I asked him how he felt about Negroes fighting for freedom in Vietnam when they didn't have it at home. His answers were testy and carefully phrased.

"This Martin Luther King is just too high up. Trouble with that fellow is that he can't go back to his own church. That's why he got involved in this Vietnam business."

I pressed him on the question of freedom at home. "Listen my friend, when the American people are ready to give us more freedom, they'll do it. No use causing a fuss and making them angry," he said.

That night, I entered the conversation in my notes under the heading of "Uncle Tom." But several weeks later I met the same officer again, under different circumstances. I had invited him to sit at my table in a crowded, fashionable Saigon restaurant. When the subject of Negroes fighting in Vietnam came up, after several hours of conversation, it was an entirely different story from the "Uncle Tom" version I had heard earlier.

"You white reporters can't just pop a question like that and get an honest answer. We've been warned about making statements to the press. We're not about to lose a promotion so you can get a story."

The officer then went on to describe the burning resentment felt by Negro soldiers who are treated as equals in the foxholes of Vietnam, but shunted aside during off-duty hours. He described in bitter detail the countless conversations he had held with Negro GIs who were angry at the prospect of going back to a segregated world after putting their lives on the line in Vietnam. "It's a personal subject and not many Negroes are going on television with that side of the story."

The failure to portray the nature of integration in the armed forces has, in fact, led to widespread misunderstanding. While patrolling with a company of Marines near the North Vietnamese border recently, I talked to a white corporal who was deeply depressed by the recent death of a Negro soldier with whom he had marched and fought for three months. "We were really tight. He was the best friend I had," the Marine said. Such close friendships between white and colored soldiers are frequent under combat conditions, but in the big base camps or off duty, the old prejudices return. One Negro Air Force lieutenant described how a latrine wall at the Tan San Nhut air base outside Saigon was scrawled with ugly slogans such as "Kill niggers not VC" twenty-four hours after it had been painted. This officer was also angry at the prejudice which was never openly expressed, but which he found invariably present among his white colleagues. "They can't say anything, but you always know the feeling is there."

Negroes comprise only 3.6 per cent of the officer corps in the Army and even less in the other services. Although General Westmoreland has attempted to eradicate any evidence of prejudice within his entourage by placing nineteen Negro officers on his command staff, the fact is that career opportunities for a Negro in the service are limited.

"There are plenty of ways to keep you back," said one captain of the 173rd Airborne which he claimed was composed almost 50 per cent of Negro troops. "For one thing, getting a combat command is almost impossible. They get you working on pacification or some desk job where the promotions don't come so quickly." This view is supported by the fact that only two of the 380 combat battalion commands in the war are held by Negroes, despite the fact that Negroes account for 22.4 per cent of combat deaths.

Perhaps the most telling evidence of how segregation works is the row of bars and night clubs along dusty, dirty Trinh Minh The Street located across the river from central Saigon. This "Kanh Hoi" area is patronized exclusively by Negro troops who go there rather than to the cleaner downtown Tu Do Street where the clients are white.

Husky, Green Beret Sergeant William Barksdale, 26, of Baltimore, Md., explained why he preferred going to Kanh Hoi. "When I get in from the field, I just want to be at ease. If I go to Tu Do, the white guys start staring and the girls stay clear of me, so I just stay away from the place."

In fact, what particularly enraged one Kanh Hoi habitué was the fact that the brown-skinned Vietnamese girls on Tu Do referred to themselves as white and displayed contempt for colored GIs—an attitude they had quickly picked up from their white clients. As one Negro private who had spent six months in a line outfit said: "Its okay when you're fighting VC, but when you have to go your own way for a beer or to find a girl, you realize that Chuck [slang for white soldiers] isn't your buddy after all."

Despite the lack of meaningful integration in the armed forces, most Negroes agree that they get better treatment in the military service than at home. Consequently, 45.7 per cent of Negroes re-enlist for another tour, in contrast to only 17 per cent of white troops. This preference for a military world, often under combat conditions, to the ordeals of a segregated life in the United States is a measure of the paltry advances made thus far by the civil rights movement.

However, it is among those who determine to go home that the harshest resentment is expressed. This bitter undercurrent can be heard almost nightly at the popular clubs in the Kanh Hoi section, where the music and food recall the hang-outs many Negroes patronize at home. Here, after a few beers in the company of fellow Negroes, the GIs discuss the issue which is more important to them than the Vietnamese War. Dissenters like Stokely Carmichael or Cassius Clay, who take such a verbal beating before the television cameras, are seen as heroes for their courage in fighting the white establishment.

A Negro sergeant who frequents several of these off-duty clubs said the conversation he picks up would be thought by most Americans to be the views of militant extremists, rather than those of the average, passive Negro GI portrayed through the news media. "They may be mad at Clay and Carmichael for opposing the war, but on the big issue they realize these fellows are on their side."

The big issue, of course, is how the returning Negro veteran can find equality where it does not yet exist.

"I'm just waiting for the first guy that tries to kick me out of his restaurant," said one tall Negro private who was due to end his service in two months.

Having been taught that it is possible to fight and even die for the cause of freedom, these veterans are coming home determined to receive fair and equal treatment. The tragedy is that an unconcerned and uninformed public will be taken by surprise if they resort to the violence they learned in Vietnam.

TVA: THE HALO SLIPS

JOHN EGERTON

Mr. Egerton is a staff writer for Southern Education Reports.

Nashville

For thirty-three years the Tennessee Valley Authority pursued its objectives — electric power, navigation and flood control—with an efficiency and success which have made it an international symbol of American social planning at its best. Now it has turned its attention to economic development, water and air pollution and recreation, and already there are indications that the new look is less attractive and more disturbing than the old.

One example of resistance to what Business Week calls TVA's "second spring" can be found in the Land Between the Lakes National Recreation Area, a 200,000-acre project being developed on a wooded isthmus between two man-made lakes in western Kentucky and Tennessee. For almost four years, TVA has been locked in a bitter dispute with landowners in the area, a dispute which has raised legal and constitutional questions that could present the agency with the most prickly problems it has ever handled.

The Land Between the Lakes is set apart from the surrounding countryside by Kentucky Lake (on the Tennessee River), Barkley Lake (on the Cumberland River), and a canal which connects the two at the north. The area is remote and sparsely populated, and about half of it is already owned by federal agencies, including the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, which has a 65,000-acre refuge there. TVA intends to buy up the land, all 200,000 acres, for what it calls "a national demonstration to show how all available resources of a large area can be developed to serve a wide range of public recreation and conservation education programs."

But some of the landowners have refused to sell. They took their case first to the Federal District Court at Paducah, Ky., and being defeated there, appealed it to the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati. They are asking whether TVA has legal jurisdiction outside the Tennessee Valley (half the Land Between the Lakes project lies in the Cumberland River watershed), and whether it has authority to exercise the power of eminent domain anywhere solely for the purpose of recreation.

The Land Between the Lakes project is only one of TVA's current headaches. The agency's recent projects and procedures have aroused a variety of protests:

¶Conservationists in Tennessee and North Carolina have accused TVA of building dams solely for the purposes of industrial development and recreation. They contend that in doing so, TVA is spreading pollution, eliminating the area's few remaining wild rivers and trout streams, and joining commercial interests in real estate ventures for big profits.

¶TVA's practice of making payments in lieu of taxes to counties whose tax base is diminishing by inundation of lands has been attacked by many of the counties as inadequate and deceptive.

¶TVA developments on the Beech and Elk Rivers in Tennessee involve agency purchase of land surrounding the reservoirs. This land is then sold to a local development authority, and TVA uses the profit to repay a share of the public's cost of the project. Grady Clay, writing in the Louisville Courier-Journal last year, said the money TVA receives as profit "would have gone directly to private owners of waterfront land under the system normally followed." The fact that those private owners now must surrender their land for eventual benefit of speculators has caused no little consternation.

¶TVA now produces three-fourths of its electric power with coal. It is the nation's biggest coal consumer, and most of the coal it has bought in the past decade has been strip mined. The Peabody Coal Company and lesser giants of the industry have literally turned the earth upside down in the counties surrounding TVA's Paradise, Ky., power plant. Spoil heaps rise as high as 200 feet into the air, streams are polluted and vegetation is smothered, but TVA's objective—cheap coal—is achieved. Not until Kentucky strengthened its strip-mine laws and filed suit against the Peabody Company did TVA begin to show concern for conservation measures, and reports persist that neither TVA nor the coal companies are practicing the reforms they have pledged.

The irony in these examples is clear. Created in large part on the basic principle of relieving human misery, TVA has, with disturbing frequency, seemed to be adding to the problems of the people in its area of operation. As it has grown in power and influence, and as its projects in navigation, electric power and flood control have neared completion in the Tennessee Valley, the agency has begun to appear callous at home and covetous of fertile new fields to plow outside the valley.

It would be hard to quarrel with TVA's past successes in power generation, flood control and navigation—though plenty of people, including Barry Goldwater and the country's private power interests, have tried. Since May 18, 1933, when President Franklin D. Roosevelt signed the TVA Act and gave Sen. George Norris of Nebraska a final victory in his twelve-year fight with Congressional opponents of the measure, TVA has piled one impressive accomplishment on top of another. It now has thirty-two dams on the Tennessee River and its tributaries; it has turned the river's mainstream into an unbroken stairway of navigation lakes, and freight traffic along the 650-mile route from Knoxville to Paducah now totals more than 2 billion ton-miles a year—sixty-six times as much as in 1933.

Flood damage avoided through TVA controls is estimated at close to half a billion dollars. Electricity generated by the agency's power plants exceeds 75 billion kilowatt-hours a year, and almost 2 million customers in seven states now purchase that electricity for less than 1c a kilowatt-hour—only one-fifth as much as it cost thirty-three years ago and still less than half the national average.

Yet in spite of all this, TVA remains a controversial agency, and its handling of the Land Between the Lakes project underlines at least some of the reasons for its present notoriety. TVA seems to be winning its long fight with the residents there, but the battle could drag on for another year or more and end up in an embarrassing loss for the agency before the courts. If that happens, the only real winners in the costly and unnecessary dispute will be some not so innocent bystanders, including land-development speculators from outside the region and conservative critics of TVA who for more than thirty years have sought a weapon with which to fell the agency.

The first official proposal for development of the land between Kentucky and Barkley Lakes was made in 1962 by the National Park Service, and that proposal specified that not all the privately held land in the area would be needed. Then, in June of 1963, President John F. Kennedy signed an Executive order instructing TVA to develop a national recreation center in the Land Between the Lakes as a pilot project to show how an area with limited resources "can be converted into a recreation asset that will stimulate the economic growth of a region." The Executive order made Congressional approval of the project unnecessary, and Rep. Frank A. Stubblefield of western Kentucky, who with others in and out of Congress had urged the action on the President, explained that TVA was empowered by law to proceed immediately, whereas special legislation requiring a year or more would be necessary in order for the Park Service to take the job.

It is now a matter of debate—as witness the landowners' suit in federal court—whether TVA is in fact empowered to develop the Land Between the Lakes. This, plus the owners' suspicions that TVA's concealed but consuming interest in the project is for economic development, has made the going rough, and TVA's strategy in the face of opposition has been highly questionable.

The Presidential order instructed TVA to establish and define guidelines for "acquisition, development and operation of other outdoor recreation areas." So far, it has come closer to illustrating how not to proceed in such development. Some items:

¶ Aubrey J. Wagner, chairman of the TVA board, said following issuance of the Executive order that the project would take five years to develop and would cost $33 million. Now, four years later, the agency refuses to say how long it will take, and the latest estimates on the cost exceed $55 million.

¶ After saying at the outset that TVA "will explain the plans to the people in the affected area soon," the agency later announced that "every acre" of the land would be acquired (with the unexplained exception of an 8,600-acre tract in the southeast corner, near Dover, Tenn.), and some landowners still have not been notified of TVA's intentions or of its authority to proceed.

¶ TVA has billed the project as a demonstration of new concepts in recreation, though it duplicates principles long employed in other areas of the country by the National Park Service.

¶ Neither the U. S. Army Corps of Engineers nor the U. S. Fish and Wildlife Service has yet surrendered its holdings in the Land Between the Lakes to TVA, and sub rosa disputes among the three agencies have been rumored. The Corps of Engineers, that paragon of Congressional pork-barreling, is predictably resentful of intrusions into what it considers its territory (i.e., the Cumberland River Valley), and the Fish and Wildlife Service is known to dislike the idea of surrendering its wildlife refuge. Furthermore, the National Park Service has often voiced concern about the indiscriminate use of park land by hordes of campers—and campers are what TVA wants most in the area.

TVA did not announce its intention to take all the land until Congress had appropriated $4 million to get the project started. The fiscal courts of Trigg and Lyon Counties, in which the Kentucky portion of the area lies, publicly opposed further land acquisition by TVA except from willing sellers, and Congressman Stubblefield also protested the land-buying plan.

Amid charges of coercion, harassment and trespass, TVA began to feel a backlash. The landowners organized and began picketing agency headquarters in the area, and the pro-TVA Nashville Tennessean said in an editorial that "poor diplomacy, fuzzy policies, and lack of liaison with elected officials—a cardinal principle with TVA in early days—appear to be major factors provoking angry resistance."

Kentucky's respected Republican Senator, John Sherman Cooper, in a letter to President Johnson, gave TVA even more cause for concern:

> The boundaries for the Between-the-Lakes recreational area, as recently announced by TVA, have caused considerable consternation among people and communities in the area, and to us. On reviewing our discussions and understandings of the proposals made during the past two years, we think that great harm may be done to the project if TVA does not reconsider its apparent plans to acquire all the land. . . . In Kentucky, the towns of Golden Pond and Twin Lakes, as well as the homes and businesses of some 3,000 people in the area involved, may be needlessly uprooted, meaning that many of these residents would be moved for the third, fourth, or fifth time due to Federal programs. . . . We agree generally with [TVA's] objectives, but we cannot agree that they merit the neglect of the rights of a large number of area citizens. . . .

Several residents of the area appeared before Congressional appropriations committees in the spring of 1964 to testify against TVA procedures. Mrs. Corinne Whitehead of Lyon County told a Senate subcommittee that residents of the area "have been informed . . . that industrial plant sites have been mapped and pinpointed by TVA in the north section of Lyon County. We are convinced that TVA proposes to take our land and homes under the guise of recreation and ultimately sell it for industrial use." TVA Chairman Wagner called the charge "just a plain lie" that "irritates me very much." Mrs. Whitehead and the other residents who testified said they were not opposed to the recreation area project, but requested that it be developed in the 100,000 acres already in federal hands "by the National Park Service, which is a recognized authority in this field."

Mrs. Whitehead underlined the eroding reputation of TVA in her area with these words: "TVA has heretofore been recognized by valley residents as a reasonable and idealistic agency with a heart in dealing with people. Today that image is considerably tarnished in light of this era of pure TVA empire-building." Her comment stood in stark contrast to the testimony of TVA Director Frank Smith, who said in answer to a question that his agency was developing the Land Between the Lakes "because of the overwhelming request of the people in the area."

Despite the protests, TVA got its second appropriation—$5.5 million—for the project, and since then it has received three more allocations. The population of the area, which stood at about 3,000 five years ago, has now been reduced to about 1,200, and of those who remain about fifty families, holding less than 10,000 acres among them, are unalterably opposed to surrender of their property to TVA. As the months pass, these landowners are seeing the sympathy and support they once received from newspapers, local governments and business organizations all but evaporate. TVA has mounted an intensive public relations campaign to sell the economic merits of the recreation area to surrounding communities, and the sound of money has had a mesmerizing effect. The holdout property owners are now condemned as speculators.

Still, suspicion of TVA's motives persists. Soon after Congress voted the 1964 appropriation, it was learned that the Kerr-McGee Oil Company of Oklahoma, former empire of the late Sen. Robert Kerr, had acquired all assets of the T. J. Moss Tie Company of St. Louis in July of 1963, one month after TVA had been assigned Land Between the Lakes (Distance from Kuttawa to Dover Is 42 Miles) the Land Between the Lakes project. This created a stir because the Moss Company owned some 30,000 acres in the three counties encompassing the project. State records indicate that more than a dozen exploratory drillings for oil and other minerals have been made in the Land Between the Lakes region in the past thirty years, and this has prompted speculation that the Kerr-McGee land purchase was a prelude to more mineral exploration. No recent drillings have been made, but the appointment last year of Donald McBride, a long-time administrative assistant to Senator Kerr, to a nine-year term on the TVA board of directors, drew more than passing interest from skeptical residents of the area.

Such developments only solidify the landowners' conviction that something more than a playground is in store for the Land Between the Lakes. TVA officials repeatedly deny that they have any intention of engaging in the kind of real estate and industrial development activities which they are trying in the Beech and Elk River projects in Tennessee. Since 1933, however, TVA has disposed of more than 200,000 acres of land it had acquired along the shore lines of its lakes, and in virtually every instance the sale of such land has turned a handsome profit.

In its promotion of the Land Between the Lakes project, TVA has pictured a virgin wilderness, uncluttered by commercial enterprises of any kind. It has been described as a haven for hunters, fishermen, hiking and camping enthusiasts, swimmers and boaters and horseback riders. About 70 million people live within a 500-mile radius of the area, and TVA predicted in 1963 that within three years the park would be recording 4 million to 5 million visitor-days annually—a visitor-day being defined as twelve recreation hours spent in the area.

The prediction was wildly inaccurate. Less than half a million visitor-days were recorded in 1966. Still, TVA has already begun to hedge on its policy of keeping commercial enterprises out of the area. If the park's capacity of 20,000 campers is ever reached, says Sherrill Milliken, resident manager and coordinator of the project, the people will have to have access to supplies. Who would get that business? "We don't know," says Milliken. "We haven't faced up to that part yet. This summer we may have to get into it."

Milliken is also uncertain about TVA's future role in the project, or when the "demonstration of new concepts in recreation" will end. "It's an open-ended thing," he says. "Maybe ten years, maybe twelve, maybe fifteen, but sometime it'll be done." Who will take it over then? "I don't think there's an answer to that now."

January 1, 1968, has been announced as the target date for TVA to possess all the land. The residents who remain, meanwhile, are waiting and hoping for a miracle to save their property. They are saying that no amount of money will compensate them for what they have, and TVA's reply, in effect, is that every man has his price. Asked why he thought some people are resisting TVA's land buying, Director Frank Smith replied: "People just think they can get more money than what we offer them, that's what it boils down to. They want to get more than what's been offered to them. We think most of them, when it becomes so obvious that they're isolated, they'll eventually find that they want to move out, when there's nobody left around."

TVA has refused to compromise in its determination to control all the land. It has apparently not considered buying only from the willing sellers or even permitting present landowners to have the right of domicile for their lifetime. Even more important, it has made no effort to promote any kind of cooperative zoning in which county, state and federal governments could work together to assure compatible development of public and private lands—a principle the National Park Service employs effectively in the Nez Percé country of the Northwest.

Now the agency's intransigence has been met head-on by that of the holdout residents. TVA has failed to convince them that the necessity of a recreation area is in any sense comparable to the urgent needs for electric power, navigation and flood control. The issue is: does TVA have the right, morally or legally, to condemn the land and use it for recreation purposes?

Mr. Smith says "there's no question about the legality," and cites Section 22 of the TVA Act, which makes reference to "studies, experiments and demonstrations" by the agency. But this section makes no mention of recreation and does not grant powers of eminent domain to the agency.

Mr. Milliken says the Presidential order and the subsequent appropriations from Congress are authority enough. "Our legal division sees no problem, and that's the best answer I can give you. TVA has no intention of going anywhere else on this type of thing. You know it's been said that if you can do this you can go to Idaho or some place else and do the same thing. TVA has no intention of going anywhere else, and it has no intention of being in this type of thing forever."

But no one knows, or says, how far TVA can go. Some of the holdout residents are convinced that TVA will never go to court to condemn the land, though Smith says it is "almost inevitable there'll be a certain amount of condemnation." The residents contend that condemnation procedures would require the agency to specify what use will be made of the land—thus jeopardizing any future sale or lease for purposes other than recreation. Furthermore, they say, TVA is unsure of its legal authority to condemn.

To answer the question of legal authority Granville Clark, a Russellville, Ky., attorney, has gone into federal court on behalf of some of the residents. In William D. Travis v. Pennyrile Rural Electric Cooperative (REA) and TVA, Clark is asking the court to settle a dispute between Travis and the REA concerning electric service. But in his brief, Clark alleges a conspiracy between REA and TVA, and he asks these questions:

> (1). Does Pennyrile REA have a right to refuse to provide electric service to a customer in their territory because of a threatened condemnation [by TVA]?
> (2). Does TVA have a right to condemn the land of the plaintiff?

Mr. Clark says the answer to both questions is "no." In the course of his argument he contends that the TVA venture is not a demonstration project, within the definition of Section 22 of the TVA Act, but rather an end in itself. He points out that the deeds the agency is issuing for land in the Land Between the Lakes region "contain no reference to the authority for the taking." At one point in his brief, Clark says:

> Not having specific statutory authority to get into the park, wildlife and recreation business, TVA says it is going to have a demonstration project. What are they going to demonstrate, other than that they are once again entering a field utterly foreign to the concepts Senator Norris had when he first conceived TVA? . . . What is TVA going to demonstrate in the LBL region that has not already been demonstrated . . . in the hundreds of national and state parks and recreational, wildlife and forestry areas that stretch across the land? Just what is it TVA is trying to prove by taking the LBL area? If whatever it is cannot be done on its own merits, it ought not to be allowed by a fictitious demonstration.

To further substantiate his case, Clark quotes the section of the TVA Act which governs its powers of eminent domain, and points out that it confines its powers to the acquisition of real estate "for the construction of dams, reservoirs, transmission lines, power houses, and other structures, and navigation projects at any point along the Tennessee River, or any of its tributaries."

Frank Smith concedes that "the TVA Act needs to be broadened to provide wider authority for us to do more in the areas of economic development, pollution control and recreation."

What started as a locally approved development proposed by the National Park Service has degenerated into a fight to the death between a small group of property owners and the Tennessee Valley Authority. It remains for the courts to declare the ultimate winner, but already it is clear that TVA is paying a heavy price in popularity just for being in the game.

PEACE CORPS RETURNEES

THE NEW WORLD THEY SEE

FRANCIS POLLOCK

Mr. Pollock, a former Peace Corps Volunteer, teaches at Cuyahoga Community College in Cleveland.

Peace Corps Volunteers have been spilling back into the country for four years now, but as yet their group forays into politics have been sporadic at best—and more than a little unwelcome to many of the volunteers. Indeed, one of the major concerns of a 1965 conference of returned corpsmen—titled "Citizen in a Time of Change"—was a parcel of several proposals for a national association: a "Veterans of Foreign Nonwars," as one critic sneered. To these proposals, the overwhelming majority of the 1,000 ex-PCVs in attendance responded with an emphatic thumbs down. "They have consistently resisted all attempts to be organized into a national organization or behind any well-defined national movement, philosophy, or set of objectives," one Peace Corps staff member wrote recently. Nevertheless, the tide may be changing. Although the prospects for the immediate formation of an American Legion of Former Peace Corps Volunteers are remote, there are strong indications that ex-PCVs are starting to give second thoughts to group action. More than 800 of them, about 7 per cent of those who have come back, declared recently in a well-publicized letter to President Johnson, that American policy in Vietnam is "seriously undermining" hopes for a "peaceful and bountiful world." And in New York, more than 100 persons, at least two-thirds of them ex-Peace Corpsmen, have launched the Committee of Returned Volunteers (CRV) to challenge a foreign policy they say "frustrates rather than supports the aspirations of the people" of the Third World. Their concern over Vietnamese policy prompted a letter to the President in early February of this year. It carried more than 400 signatures.

In Atlanta, Chicago, Los Angeles, Boston and other cities, former volunteers are contemplating group action as a response to what they feel is a worsening world situation. "Young Americans of unquestioned loyalty but with alert and questioning minds are continuing to express doubts about United States policy in Vietnam," the Akron (Ohio) Beacon Journal noted in a recent editorial about one of the letters.

Vietnam is certainly the catalyst, but it is not Vietnam alone. The mounting racial tensions in southern Africa, the agonizing deterioration of the Alliance for Progress, the growing U. S. military presence in Thailand—these and other occurrences are provoking serious thought among ex-PCVs. The conditions for massive group action are good, and indications are that some elements of the government Establishment are uneasy.

There are more than 12,000 ex-PCVs in the country now; within three years there will be 50,000. While every indication is given that they are highly conscious politically, they have unquestionably been slow to consider collective action. It is understandable: the small number of returnees at first; total involvement in graduate school (which most enter upon their return); the strains of readjustment and, to a large degree, the independence that characterizes so many of them. "I didn't join the Peace Corps to have forty-five or twenty-two or any number of people express my views," declared one returnee at the 1965 conference. "If I want to express them," he added, "I'd just as soon express them myself."

In place of group political action, the ex-PCVs have given mild assent to proposals for the formation of local organizations with blander concerns. Appropriate examples are the approximately eighty Peace Corps service councils scattered across the country. They started almost spontaneously to provide books and nonessential supplies for PCVs in the field, and to help fill requests for speakers that were inundating Peace Corps headquarters in Washington. At first they were organized and run by parents and friends of PCVs, but more and more the ex-volunteers have taken over. They have no official affiliation with PC/Washington, only its approval.

But these booster clubs do not provide the political outlets that many ex-PCVs are now seeking. Small, localized political action groups started appearing as early as 1964, as soon as enough ex-PCVs could get together. For the most part they were short-lived, lacking good organization or sustained interest. Yet they were the seed groups. Their leaders were heartened by Vice President Humphrey's speech at the 1965 conference: "I call upon you to be men and women of action," he told the ex-PCVs, ". . . to think, to think creatively, to think daringly and to share those thoughts—to share them with the community because it is only in so doing that we enrich this America."

To some, this type of statement was a call to action, and despite the rejection of proposals for a national association, new groups were formed. Typical of them, and perhaps best organized, is the CRV, whose temporary chairman is Aubrey Brown (PC/Nigeria). Membership is by no means restricted to ex-PCVs; about a third of its 120 members have worked abroad with mission groups or other voluntary organizations, and in some cases, other agencies of the U. S. Government. Their presence, according to Brown, brings a broader perspective to the group and minimizes the possibility that outsiders would link it to the Peace Corps.

CRV wants far broader U. S. engagement in multilateral assistance programs, preferably through the United Nations; seeks more responsiveness on the part of the U. S. Government to popular social, economic and political movements in the developing nations; and opposes unilateral U. S. military intervention anywhere. It is organized into highly active subcommittees studying the problems of Africa, Latin America, Southeast Asia, with special attention to Vietnam.

The committee's most publicized act to date, its February letter to the President, went unanswered by Mr. Johnson but drew a brief though cordial response from a staff member of the National Security Council. Spokesmen for the CRV feel the letter gave them useful experience for planning future action.

"What we did wrong there," contends Robert McGuire (PC/Pakistan), a graduate student at Columbia, "was in failing to accompany the letter with a well-thought-out position paper." He indicates that white papers will back up most of CRV's major statements in the future. The Africa subcommittee has prepared one on Rhodesia, expressing support of the President's decision to maintain sanctions against that nation. A thoughtful paper on Vietnam has recently been drawn up and distributed.

The war in Vietnam is the primary concern of another New York-based organization, the Former Peace Corpsmen's Committee for Peace. Although numbering less than ten active members, it set out last year to solicit signatures of other returnees for a strong letter to the President, calling for recognition of the National Liberation Front and immediate cessation of the bombing. According to its chairman, Burton Segall (PC/Tanganyika), it failed to get enough signatures to carry out the project.

He and other members involved themselves instead in the efforts of a third group, which bears a press agent's nightmare for a name—the Ad Hoc Committee for Returned Peace Corps Volunteers Letter on Vietnam. This group, in some ways the most controversial of the three, originally intended to collect as many signatures as possible for its moderate letter to the President and then to disband. But events following dispatch of the letter may prompt the organizers of the Ad Hoc Committee to continue their activities even more vigorously.

The letter went to the President on March 6, signed with 800 names. So far there has been no response from the White House, a fact from which the organizers take umbrage. One reason why there has been no response may be the feeling in Washington that the letter was not solely the work of the 800 ex-PCVs who signed it. "The letter was not spontaneous," Peace Corps Director Jack Hood Vaughan said in a recent telephone interview. "I know it was done by outsiders," he added, and indicated that it was the "result of an intensive campaign by people outside the Peace Corps."

The chief "outsider" associated with the letter is Allard Lowenstein, a New York lawyer who also participated in the drafting of letters from 100 student body presidents last year, and after that, the letter from fifty Rhodes scholars. Organizers of the Ad Hoc Committee and Lowenstein himself insist that his participation was minimal, consisting of advice on how to circulate the letter among possible signers and how to achieve maximum publicity. Once the sentiments to be expressed were decided on, they say, he did lend some assistance in the phrasing.

Lowenstein says the student leaders' letter followed a speech last summer at the National Student Association convention (he is a past NSA president, having served in 1951, before the time the CIA is said to have become involved). He says he made his speech with the intention of creating a dialogue between the Administration and the student leaders. "I gave a suggestion of a tactic that would provide for further discussion, not merely a protest," he says. "Anybody who thinks I can put words into the mouths of student leaders, fifty Rhodes scholars and 800 Peace Corps Volunteers is being absolutely absurd."

Eric Reuther (PC/Venezuela), Washington organizer of the Ad Hoc Committee, adds angrily: "If they are foolish enough to discredit our letter on these grounds, it will only force a more bitter response." He contends that some Peace Corps sources, particularly that agency's public information office, deliberately attempted to sabotage the letter. To buttress his point, he refers to an article in the Baltimore Sun of March 7, quoting a Peace Corps spokesman as saying that the Ad Hoc Committee had approached 5,000 ex-PCVs, but that 4,200 "had refused" to sign the letter.

That figure "amounts to nothing less than a complete fabrication and a deliberate attempt to misrepresent the situation," Reuther later wrote to the paper. (He puts the figure of ex-corpsmen solicited at 2,000.) The statement, he continued, "was based upon a single telephone conversation reputed to have taken place between a returned Peace Corps Volunteer and an individual soliciting signatures. 'The Peace Corps spokesman' made no attempt to verify the validity of his statement by checking members of our committee."

The spokesman—Thomas Page, director of Public Information for the Peace Corps—confirms that he gave the "4,200 out of 5,000" figure to the paper, but explains that he did not say they refused to sign the letter, merely that they were approached.

More static for the committee's efforts came in an editorial in the Sun on March 8:

> A new young pressure group may be developing among Peace Corps alumni, a sort of liberal American Legion. This is not going to go over well with many members of Congress. . . . Since its inception the Peace Corps has done a splendid job of convincing Americans and most foreigners that it is non-political and non-ideological. That reputation has sustained it in some ticklish situations. If former members give people a reason—or an excuse—for believing otherwise, the Peace Corps will have lost a valuable asset.

This did not go over well with members of the new movement. Says Reuther:

> What they are saying is that once someone has been a PCV, he is an apolitical being. But if we give our youth a mandate to become involved in the shaping of overseas institutions, and if we do not expect this same involvement by such people here, then we can only admit that our support for the Peace Corps' work overseas has been based on chauvinistic arrogance and narrow self-interest. The returned Volunteer is going to make some noise—that is his duty.

Members of the New York-based CRV appear to share Reuther's sentiments. "When you commit yourself to change," contends McGuire, "you are going to cause trouble. . . . We are not outside the political consensus now, but if we do go outside, so what?"

Just what position does the government take on the political activities of returned PCVs? Ostensibly it welcomes their participation, provided it is made clear that they are not speaking for the Peace Corps.

"The contribution of former volunteers to society in the United States and in the Third World will constitute a major impact of the Peace Corps," Robert Calvert, Jr., then director of the Peace Corps' Career Information Service, wrote last year. The architects of the Peace Corps knew that this unique overseas experience would have profound effects on the volunteer, that he would be more than likely to return home with renewed convictions.

"We encourage them to stand up and be counted responsibly," PC Director Vaughan said shortly after the release of the Ad Hoc Committee's letter. "I have wondered for some time now just what forms the political activities of ex-PCVs would take," he said recently, adding that there is "no possibility" that Congressmen would bring pressure on the Peace Corps for the actions of any returnee group.

Members of the Ad Hoc Committee and CRV report that Vaughan has generally been encouraging in private conversations with members of both groups, while expressing some concern about the letters. The apparent regard for Vaughan does not extend to the PC's Public Information Office. "Their dishonesty in releasing the figure of 4,200 refusals to the Baltimore Sun was completely invented," says Lowenstein.

Burton Segall of the third group, the Former Peace Corpsmen's Committee for Peace, has reason to believe that PC/Washington will move decisively if necessary. His group's name was originally the Peace Corps Committee for Peace. Shortly after it started asking other ex-PCVs for signatures on the letter it was drafting, a note arrived from the Peace Corps' General Counsel, stating that the use of the name "Peace Corps" was illegal, punishable by fine and imprisonment.

"In all instances where the use of the name 'Peace Corps' by another organization is brought to our attention," the letter said in part, "we feel compelled to request that organization to alter its name." With some chafing, Segall's group changed the name, but in its response inquired why the unaffiliated Peace Corps service councils had not also been prevented from using the name.

Incidents such as this and the Ad Hoc Committee's treatment by the Baltimore Sun prompt Aubrey Brown of CRV to express fears about future actions by the Peace Corps or other agencies. "We'll have to be prepared to see them make some efforts to insulate themselves if we become more effective," he noted recently at a luncheon meeting at the African-American Institute in New York City. He and other members of his group are troubled that three of politics' strangest bedfellows—the Peace Corps, the far Left and, as indicated by recent disclosures, the CIA—all have reason to be concerned with the new groups of ex-PCVs. He concedes that there are few safeguards.

The prospects for future development of groups such as the CRV, the Ad Hoc Committee and other organizations of overseas volunteers look encouraging, if not bright. If a national association is possible it would more likely than not be patterned along the lines of the present Committee of Returned Volunteers: study groups in a number of cities, loosely joined in a national federation. Brown, who says he would "prefer to pass out leaflets rather than to picket," sees these groups doing in-depth studies of foreign policy problems, and drawing upon their experience and sensitivity as Dr. Immanuel Wallerstein, sociologist and African scholar at Columbia University, suggests, to serve as interpreters of the Third World to Americans.

A writer for the Saturday Review asked in 1964:

> Will the volunteer "readjust," give up and adapt? Or will he take up the challenges in our own backyard similar to those he faced overseas? The answer to this question may provide the most important story yet to be written about the Peace Corps and its volunteers.

Speaking at the 1965 conference on behalf of those who sought a national association—and perhaps somewhat prophetically for those one in twelve ex-PCVs who have signed one of the letters on Vietnam—a volunteer said: "All we want to do is to make people aware, and then they are the pressure group for whatever they believe after they know the facts. All we're trying to do is to expose these people to a new world which we see."

Sewing Machines & Union Machines

HERBERT HILL

Mr. Hill is national labor secretary of the NAACP and co-editor (with Arthur M. Ross) of Employment, Race and Poverty (Harcourt, Brace & World).

When a group of teen-age girls, mainly Negro and Puerto Rican high school "dropouts" in New York City, bitterly defended their sewing machines and their right to learn a craft, the drama at the Lower West Side Community Center, a unit of the Neighborhood Youth Corps, was reported in many newspapers. However, the real story —the refusal of the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union and the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, both AFL-CIO affiliates, to permit the federal training of apparel workers—was little noted. The New York Times failed to mention that the events occurred as the result of ILGWU and ACWA opposition to federal training in the clothing trades. The incident, treated as "human interest" by the press, is far more revealing of restrictive labor union practices than its newspaper treatment suggests.

The New York Times of June 7 reported that "Fifteen girls in a Lower West Side branch of the Neighborhood Youth Corps armed themselves with cherry cream pies and soft drinks yesterday to retain the sewing machines they love." The Times quoted 17-year-old Sandra Brown as saying: "They're not going to take these machines. If they do, they're going to have to take us along." It also referred vaguely to "a Youth Corps technicality."

As the sewing machines were being removed from other Neighborhood Youth Corps Job Training Centers in the Morrisania section of the Bronx and in west Jamaica, Queens, as well as in other ghetto locations, Mrs. Rosali Maxwell, a sewing machine instructor, stated that the high school dropouts will "probably go back to doing nothing again."

The apparel training program was finally saved only by private donations which made possible the delivery of new machines and bolts of fabric to the community training centers after the federal funds were withdrawn. On June 13, the New York Post quoted Jerry Kolker, project director, who said that "Neither the government nor the union will cooperate with us. But now we have enough machines and money to keep going, even if they come to collect them again. . . ." Kolker added: "We have asked them [the unions] for their help in developing training programs and working out a solution to this problem, but the ILGWU won't answer."

The insistence of the unions that there be no government-sponsored job training for workers in the apparel industry, and their ability to prevent new training opportunities under the anti-poverty program, has a special implication for Negro workers. Negro applicants for jobs in garment manufacturing shops are often asked if they have had previous experience. Because they have been denied the opportunity to obtain such experience they are either refused work or employed only in low-paying unskilled jobs. Despite their rigid opposition to federally sponsored training opportunities, officials of the ILGWU have admitted that the industry lacks experienced workers. Gus Tyler, assistant president of the union, has written: "There is a shortage of skilled sewing machine operators. Nobody knows this better than the ILGWU. Some employers have either closed shop in New York or threatened to fold up for lack of skilled operators."

Although admitting that this is the case, the ILGWU has more than once refused to permit federally sponsored training. In Newark, N. J., in 1965, the United Community Corporation, the anti-poverty Community Action Program agency for Newark, had a similar experience. The federal Office of Economic Opportunity refused to provide funds for an apparel trades job training program for 545 workers (200 of whom were welfare recipients). When the Newark group requested funds for the program already begun, they were told by officials of the U.S. Department of Labor that the basis for the rejection was the refusal of the two unions to approve the job training program. Shortly thereafter, the Newark training program was destroyed by federal officials acting upon the insistence of the ILGWU.*

Action by the unions to prevent federally sponsored training in the garment industry dates back to August 22, 1963, when the U.S. Department of Labor, which administers the Manpower Development and Training Act, received a 14-page statement of the "position of the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union and the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America on the question of subsidized training programs in the apparel industry of the United States." In this policy statement (initiated by the ILGWU) signed by Lazare Teper, research director of the ILGWU and Milton Fried, research director of the ACWA the unions stated that: "on the basis of our many years experience in the apparel industry we are convinced that such training of apparel workers is not only a waste of federal funds but sets in motion forces detrimental to the health and stability of our industry."

They also argued that "the hiring of inexperienced workers by the industry is central to its functioning." And they stated that "training and the possession of a specific apparel skill is not an essential requirement for employment in the apparel industry and . . . the training of inexperienced workers by the employer is a normal phase of the apparel business."

The report concludes:

> These considerations apply to government financed training programs under the Area Redevelopment Act as well as the Manpower Development and Training Act. We, therefore, respectfully urge that the Department of Labor as a matter of policy not sponsor or approve any training program for apparel workers under the Manpower Development Act.

Both the ILGWU and the ACWA have used their considerable political power in Newark and elsewhere to prevent the kind of training programs that are operating with public funds in many other industries.

The statement of the apparel labor unions is contradicted by manpower data on the industry. According to the Occupational Training Needs Survey, Research Series No. 18, September, 1964, prepared and compiled by the state of New Jersey, Department of Labor and Industry, Division of Employment Security:

> By 1965 there will be a shortage in three of the six semiskilled occupations surveyed. These occupations are: machine presser in the garment, laundry and cleaning and dyeing industries. By 1968 (in addition to those occupations expected to be in short supply in 1965) there will be shortage of sewing machine operators and handpressers, in the garment, laundry, cleaning and dyeing industries.

These data are significant because they relate directly to the proposal for funds submitted to the Office of Economic Opportunity by the Newark Community Action Council. Furthermore, the city of Newark had been declared a depressed area with very high unemployment among Negroes. Such job training programs, which are intended to enable the long-term unemployed to liberate themselves from the relief rolls by obtaining jobs as a result of newly acquired skills, is the essence of any real "war against poverty."

The development of many large garment manufacturing companies with modern production methods that require new skills has been evident for some time. But even though nonwhites constitute a potentially large source of skilled labor recruitment for this industry, they have been effectively denied such opportunities, mainly as a result of restrictive union practices.

Secretary of Labor W. Willard Wirtz stated on March 1, 1966, at a meeting of the National Board of the Coat and Suit Industry: "Industry reports show that companies were having difficulty finding people with skills. In terms of fully prepared people there is a shortage." He also noted that the growing shortage called for preparations to take care of the expanding needs in industry and asked for support of federal job training programs. ILGWU president, David Dubinsky, according to Women's Wear Daily of March 2, 1966, in response to the Secretary's statement, "scored the Administration's assistance programs for on the job training as they applied to the coat and suit industry."

In the Harvard University 1959 study, "Made in New York: Case Studies in Metropolitan Manufacturing," it is noted that Negroes and Latin Americans > . . . were largely to be found in the less skilled lower paid crafts and in shops making the lower price lines and in this industry their advancement to higher skills was not proceeding very rapidly. In the higher skilled coat and suit industry the new ethnic groups have hardly made an appearance.

> In short, Negro and Puerto Rican women, who are on the lower rungs of the city's economic ladder, have become important in the New York garment industry, but they work mainly in the more standardized branches, and with few exceptions, unlike the Jewish and Italian men of earlier days, they do not become highly skilled tailor system workers on dresses or "cloaks." As a result, a shortage of skilled sewing machine operators is developing.

In the past, the liberal and progressive ILGWU and ACWA were important vehicles for improving the economic status and social condition of immigrant workers. Tragically enough, these same unions now use their extensive powers to prevent the further entry of Negro and Puerto Rican workers into the labor market, or to lock these groups permanently in unrewarding menial and unskilled jobs.

Elsewhere the Colonel implies that as a former Academy library executive officer, I am hardly qualified to criticize the Academy's educational program. Such attacks on the character, qualifications or motives of anyone who dares suggest the Academy may not be infallible, I learned during three years there, are a standard device. Anticipating this line of attack, I did not present my personal opinion but reported the situation on the basis of interviews with more than a dozen past and present faculty members plus other documentary material, none of which the Colonel proved wrong in his letter. . . .

Nowhere does the Colonel produce evidence which proves wrong or even disputes any of the questionable practices at the Academy which I reported; following another classic Air Force Academy tactic in dealing with critics, he talks about everything but why cheating occurs —repeatedly—at the Academy. If my report is as distorted and illogical as he claims, I suggest Colonel Alm cite the "real" reasons—supported by documentary evidence—for the scandals. J. Arthur Heise

Los Angeles, Calif.
DEAR SIRS: I congratulate author J. A. Heise on his candid, yet sympathetic and understanding, analysis of the recent cheating scandals at the United States Air Force Academy. From my perspective as a former Air Force Captain and associate professor at the Academy (1958-60 and 1962-65), Mr. Heise—or rather the officer he quoted on page 626 —got to the heart of the matter when he stressed the costs of creating a truly intellectual environment for the education of our future officers. . . .

The time has come to translate "pious platitudes about honor and leadership" (to use the words of Admiral Rickover) into academically sound practices. Congress and the academic community—both of whom have major but unexercised responsibilities for the education of future officers, had better act quickly. If they continue to abdicate this responsibility, the views of one member of the White committee, before whom I testified in 1965, will continue to be the Academy's operating policy. I was told: "We must think of the survival of the institution." We must indeed, but the institution at stake is our country, not the Air Force or the Academy!

John C. Ries, associate professor,

Cambridge, Mass.
DEAR SIRS: Mr. Heise poses an important question in the title of his article but he seems less interested in answering it than in maligning the Air Force Academy and its dean. One would think that the Academy's problems would arise from causes peculiar to it as a military educational institution. But such apparently is not the case. Look at Mr. Heise's catalogue of deficiencies: "Standardization of prescribed courses," "a lack of real student-faculty involvement," the "policy of grading on a curve," faculty meetings which "are rarely needed and rarely called," "highly centralized administration," the passion for the Ph.D., "emphasis on questionable symbols of academic success." . . . In seventeen years of teaching at Columbia and Harvard, I have heard all of these charges again and again and again. They may be the roots of the cheating problem, but if they are Mr. Heise doesn't show why this is the case. . . .

While Mr. Heise's comments on the Academy are largely irrelevant, his attacks on the Academy's dean, Brig. Gen. Robert F. McDermott, are blatantly wrong. For almost 150 years the system of education at the military academies was frozen into the pattern which Sylvanus Thayer set at West Point. Under General McDermott's leadership, the Air Force Academy broke with this pattern and instituted, as Heise himself has to recognize, a diversified course program, majors, an enrichment program, graduate work, and advance standing. These innovations are now being copied by the other service academies. By any standard, General McDermott is one of the leading innovators and statesmen in higher education today. . . .

air policy

Washington, D.C.
DEAR SIRS: You have done a public service in publishing Karl M. Ruppenthal's survey of prospects for the Supersonic Transport as generator of political, social and economic questions its promoters decline to acknowledge [May 22, May 29, June 19].

Any resident of the Potomac River valley in the vicinity of Washington can testify that the Federal Aviation Agency accepts no responsibility for the consequences of its fixed policy to promote the interests of air carriers.

In May, 1963, the FAA issued a policy declaration that it would not allow jet carriers into Washington National Airport, just 3 miles from the White House. For reasons it has never made public, FAA reversed this and the jets came into National in April, 1966.

Noise, pollution and mathematically increased hazard of crashes in the center of the densely populated region embraced by the Capital Beltway are now fixed qualities of life in this city. People in all sections of Washington along the river report falling property values, kerosene droppings, near misses (and verified instances of cowlings and other parts off planes—so far, fortunately, landing in the river instead of in the streets), not to mention the endless howling and whine of engines, night and day.

We do not need to wait for the SST to discover social irresponsibility in the FAA concept of how air carriers should operate in a human society. Frank C. Waldrop death by abortion

Los Angeles, Calif.
DEAR SIRS: Phil Kerby's article, "Abortion: Laws and Attitudes" [The Nation, June 12], deserves special recognition for its comprehensive and incisive analysis.

One error (which many writers on this topic have perpetuated) does not mar it. For the record, the total number of maternal deaths in the United States in 1964 was 1,096, of which 247, or 19 per cent, are recorded in official statistics as caused by abortion. To this number should be added an unknown number of maternal deaths which are the result of criminal abortion but which, because of the stigma, have been attributed to other causes. Passage of the Beilenson Therapeutic Abortion Act in California will, we hope, decrease this needless toll.

happiness in Asia

London
DEAR SIRS: After reading with interest, appreciation and general approval Malcolm W. Browne's masterly destructive review of Roger Hilsman's book, To Move A Nation [The Nation, June 5], I find myself staggered when he writes toward the end of it the words: "Granting that Asian communism is a brutal force that hardly does much to make life happier for the average peasant. . . ." This statement is so blatantly in contradiction with what I personally observed, during a fairly comprehensive tour around the Democratic Republic of Vietnam in November, 1958, and with what has been observed, before and since then, by numerous Western visitors more competent than I, that I am at a loss to understand on what evidence it is based. . . .

LOUIS HARAP

Mr. Harap is a member of the editorial board of the monthly, Jewish Currents.

The four books under review fall into a logical progression. Norman Cohn traces the strange vicissitudes of that anti-Semitic ideology in the past few centuries which supplied the rationale (if one can call it that) for genocide. Steiner and Suhl describe the genocide itself and, in different ways, the Jewish resistance to it. And Wiesenthal illuminates aspects of denazification through his personal activities in bringing Nazi criminals to justice.

In meticulous detail Cohn sets forth the bizarre history of the Protocols of the Elders of Zion, together with its antecedents and practical consequences. He shows how this history is continuous with the medieval myth of the Jew as anti-Christian devil and ritual murderer. It was only after the French Revolution, however, that the myth received its political cast as a Judaeo-Masonic conspiracy to dominate European governments. Cohn makes clear how the myth grew in close coordination with reactionary opposition to revolutionary developments. The 1848 revolution in Germany gave fresh impetus to this drive; Russian reactionaries and pogromists took over from the Germans in the last third of the century until, in 1905, Sergei Nilus published the full-blown forgery, the Protocols, which was used to instigate pogroms. The execution of the Czarist royal family in 1918 added a new feature, the Bolshevik Revolution as a Jewish plot.

Reactionary Russian émigrés fanned out into Europe and the United States spreading the infection of the Protocols. They reached Henry Ford who took up the cause, and in 1920 had the Protocols serialized in his Dearborn Independent, circulation 300,000. Later in the year he reprinted the material in a book which was distributed in the United States in half a million copies, and was translated into sixteen languages, including the German. The Protocols emerged strongly in the United States once again in 1938, when Father Coughlin published them in his Social Justice, with a circulation of 1 million.

Russian émigrés brought the Protocols directly into Germany in 1920. In 1922, they played a great part in provoking the assassination of Walther Rathenau as an "Elder of Zion." The Nazis grafted their völkisch-racist ideology on the Protocols, which Hitler fervently embraced as the ideological basis for the "final solution." The myth, Cohn shows, served as a "warrant" for genocide.

In his Treblinka, Jean-François Steiner attempts an account of the execution of this warrant in one ghetto, Vilna, and one extermination camp, Treblinka, where about 800,000 Jews were killed. Steiner was 2 years old when his Polish-Jewish father died in a camp, and he was reared by his French-Catholic mother in France. Written like a thriller, this book was an immediate success in France and aroused considerable controversy. The first few chapters convey the Nazi techniques for liquidating the Vilna ghetto and the rise of underground resistance. Most of the book describes the establishment of the extermination camp at Treblinka, the formation of revolt plans, several frustrated attempts at revolt, the final desperate rising (which set free some 600 inmates, of whom about forty survived the manhunt that followed), and the final Nazi erasure of all traces of the camp.

Steiner had spent half a year studying the records and interviewing survivors. The book cannot be said to be documentary, the American publishers' blurb notwithstanding, but is rather a semi-fictional adaptation of history designed to set forth Steiner's theses of Jewish behavior during the holocaust. In an interview with Le Nouveau Candide, Steiner explains that he wrote it because of the shame he felt at the passivity of the slaughtered 6 million—a reflection, perhaps, of the Raul Hilberg-Hannah Arendt thesis that Jews offered no significant resistance to their extermination. But the Treblinka revolt, it appears, offered him theses that appeased his shame.

But Steiner's theses are a mass of contradictions. Jewish behavior under the Nazis, he holds, was governed by the to him peculiarly Jewish, mystically tenacious belief in life as such. (Incidentally, Simone de Beauvoir's laudatory introduction makes one wonder if she fully understood the book she praises. In direct contradiction to Steiner, she asserts that in the camps "all peoples behaved identically." Further, she writes that Steiner rejects the notion of "the mystery of the Jewish soul," while his book advances precisely some such view.) Together with this mystical belief in life, Steiner believes that the Jews wished to survive to bear witness to Nazi bestiality. At the same time, many who survived, Steiner holds, did so by serving as "accomplices" of extermination. The Treblinka rebels, Steiner repeatedly asserts, were just such "accomplices" because they attended the undressing and haircutting of the Jews, and also disposed of the corpses.

No less troublesome is the synthetic history of some parts of the book, such as Steiner's designation of the Vilna ghetto as "the pilot ghetto," a proving ground for developing techniques to prepare Jews psychologically for extermination. The fact is that the Vilna ghetto was set up in July, 1941, a year after the Warsaw and other ghettos had been in operation. He wrongly places in Treblinka a melodramatic episode that was actually part of the rising at the Sobibor extermination camp. At an early stage in the Sobibor revolt, chief Nazi camp officials were lured into "appointments" with camp tailors and shoemakers, and killed with hatchets. Steiner has the Treblinka revolt leaders plan just this tactic, refers to it several times in reviewing the plans, and then forgets all about it in his detailed account of the uprising.

Survivors who have devoted themselves to assembling and verifying the history of the holocaust have attacked Steiner's book. Rochel Auerbach, Treblinka survivor, associate of the Warsaw Ghetto historian, Emmanuel Ringelblum, and presently head of the Department of Testimony at the Yad Vashem archives in Tel Aviv, denounced it in the Paris Yiddish paper, Undzer Vort. Apart from her rejection of Steiner's wish "to transfer a great part of the responsibility for German mass murder onto Jewish victims themselves," she accused Steiner of having broken his agreement to allow her to read the manuscript before publication, and of having used real names of victims and survivors now living in Israel, attributing fictional conversations and actions to them. Yad Vashem demanded that these names be changed in further editions.

Fearing the possibility of legal action, publishers agreed to the change. Rochel Auerbach was invited to Paris to discuss further corrections with the author. But he stubbornly refused, she writes, to "purge the book of the desecrations with which he soiled the materials taken from Jewish sources." She then felt compelled publicly to reject the "false thanks" given her in the book (retained in the American edition). She has asked the prospective Italian producers to remove the "slanders" in the book from the forthcoming film. Two others whom Steiner "thanks" for their aid, Leon Czertok and Olga Imbert, both of the Center of Jewish Documentation in Paris, have also rejected his thanks (retained in the American edition). David Rosset, non-Jewish camp survivor and theorist of camp psychology, has described the book as "full of racist formulas." One instance: the leader of the revolt "lacked that typically Jewish quality of looking for the hardest way, always wanting to do better, never being satisfied with the possible," etc. Léon Poliakov points out other instances in his sharply condemnatory article reprinted in Atlas for September, 1966. Others in Israel and Paris have condemned the book and even asked for recall of the "Prix de Résistance" award for 1966. What is particularly disconcerting is the commercial attitude revealed in Steiner's remark, reported by Rochel Auerbach, that he was not troubled by the unfavorable attitude to the book in Israel because Israel is a "small market."

It is not surprising that Treblinka has sold widely in France and promises to be a success in this country. It is the kind of thriller that makes one miss his subway stop, as it did this reviewer. But whether it will increase understanding of the holocaust is another matter.

ALLAN KAPLAN

Fortunately, another book has recently appeared which should serve as a strong antidote—Yuri Suhl's invaluable collection of historical, scrupulously documented accounts of Jewish resistance in all parts of occupied Europe which Suhl wrote because, as he says: "The world knows little or nothing about the other side of the holocaust picture: Jewish resistance. . . . It is not generally known that in every labor and concentration camp there existed a Jewish underground organization that kept up the prisoners' morale, reduced their physical sufferings, committed acts of sabotage, organized escapes, collected arms, planned revolts, and, in many instances, carried them out." Nor is much generally known about the numerous daring Jewish partisan and resistance groups. Even though Suhl's book makes no claim to be exhaustive—the book could easily have been ten times its present size—it should permanently put to rest the legend of total Jewish passivity.

Suhl's book includes, for example, the diary of Abraham Lissner, revealing the existence of an effective and heroic Jewish Partisan Unit in Paris which, both alone and in coordination with other groups, carried out an enormous number of acts of sabotage from 1942 to 1944, when they were executed by the Nazis. Perhaps the least-known chapter of Jewish resistance is the heroic career of the Herbert Baum Jewish group in Berlin from 1937 to 1942, and Suhl includes the late Prof. Ber Mark's account of this group, taken from Gestapo files. The most important act of the group was the partial burning of Goebbels' anti-Soviet exhibit at the Lustgarten in May, 1942, after which the group was betrayed and executed by the Nazis.

Narratives of resistance in the largest ghettos and camps (Sobibor, Byalistok, Warsaw, Treblinka, Minsk, Vilna), and in smaller places one never heard of (Marcinkonis, Lachwa, Tuczyn, Koldyczewo, Horodenka); impressive achievements of Jewish partisans in Poland and farther east; stories of outstanding individual heroism by men, women and children in resistance movements and solitary acts; summaries of resistance in Belgium, Italy, Bulgaria: all these in Suhl's book bear striking witness to Jewish activist heroism in the face of the Nazi terror.

Simon Wiesenthal's memoirs of search, seizure and exposure of Nazi war criminals, in Joseph Wechsberg's superbly edited volume, carries the anti-Nazi effort into the postwar period. Having miraculously escaped death many times, Wiesenthal decided at the war's end to devote himself to bringing Nazis to justice. He is motivated neither by vindictiveness nor revenge but by deep concern for the future. Wiesenthal's attitude is epitomized in a remark he heard from an American major: "The enemy of yesterday will become the enemy of tomorrow if we let him alone." As a one-man research institute, Wiesenthal has an amazing record. He has brought to justice about 900 of the 22,500 Nazis in his files, including his essential aid in tracking down Adolf Eichmann. Wechsberg's "profile" of Wiesenthal reveals an incorruptible, selfless, deeply humane man, as indeed the memoirs themselves confirm.

Light is thrown on important aspects of postwar history by these memoirs. The clandestine Nazi escape junta, ODESSA (Organization der SS-Angehörigen), which is funded with about $1 billion in buried treasure and investments in neutral and nonbelligerent countries, is exposed. Wiesenthal documents the well-known fact that German officialdom is permeated with high Nazis and the less-known fact that Nazis are protected from prosecution and conviction in court. Shocking miscarriages of justice in war-crimes trials are related. And Wiesenthal shows how the British occupiers evinced more concern in stemming the illegal immigration to Palestine than in apprehending war criminals, and how American, British and French denazification efforts gave way to cooperation with ex-Nazis in pursuit of cold-war anti-communism. The astonishing extent of Austrian participation in the holocaust emerges: Wiesenthal told Wechsberg that although Austria's population was 8 per cent of that of the Reich, "about one-third of all people working for the S.S. extermination machinery were Austrians. Almost half of the 6 million Jewish victims of the Hitler regime were killed by Austrians."

At a time when neo-Nazism in Germany shows signs of revival (and Weisenthal believes the new reaction to be not only German but part of an international movement), the memoirs of this dedicated humanist sound a strong note of warning.

LEONARD KRIEGEL

Mr. Kriegel teaches English at the City College of New York, and is currently working on a novel and on a study of politics and literature in contemporary America.

Any novelist must avoid being smothered by a personal identity crisis, especially in a work which is itself about a crisis in identity. But it is too easy to claim that all men face identity crises today, and that the novelist who is conscious of himself as a Jew is not singular. For while all men are alienated by definition, the Jew is faced with an alienation that is peculiar to him alone, one that exists within the context of his immediate experience.

In our time, his conflict has been strikingly nonreligious—at least until quite recently. Of the novels under discussion here, only Arthur Cohen's The Carpenter Years tries to come to terms with the problem of how one can be a Jew in a gentile world which wears its smug security like a flower in its buttonhole. Although I do not think that Mr. Cohen has been particularly successful, he has been daring in his choice of a theme. His purpose is not ecumenical. He does not propose to reconcile American Jew and American Christian but rather to explore the very brittle heritage each can claim as his own.

The Carpenter Years is apparently an effort at creating a contemporary parable about religion in the United States. Unfortunately, Cohen's protagonist exists only on the edges of the reader's perceptions, insofar as those perceptions can be felt. Edgar Morrison, born Morris Edelman (from the noble Morris to the son of that Morris, conceived in his own spiritual inadequacy), is Cohen's battleground for the conflict of Jew and gentile. Having renounced religion, family, heritage and name, Morrison has emerged as the director of a small-town YMCA in Pennsylvania, a model husband and father, a Christian, and an unfortunately static symbol. The novel begins when he learns of the imminent arrival of his son by his first marriage, to take a job in town. But the confrontation between father and son, a confrontation toward which the entire novel moves, is remarkably inadequate. The reader is left with the impression that Edgar Morrison has settled for far less than he might have expected. To trade the rich history of the Jew for the directorship of a small-town YMCA is a very poor bargain indeed. And to go from Thomas Mann's Naptha to Cohen's Edgar Morrison is simply too long a journey for this reader. It leaves one in a kind of spiritual torpor. Arthur Cohen is a Jew by choice, as any reader of his nonfiction knows. The failure in this novel is Cohen's inability to make his religious consciousness decisive for the reader.

Herbert Gold's Fathers, an autobiographical "novel in the form of a memoir," does not wrestle with the spiritual rootlessness of the contemporary Jew in a gentile world. If anything, it celebrates that rootlessness. It is stasis that both Gold and the father he has so vividly brought to life in this novel seem to fear most. What Gold achieves is the vital re-creation of a world that had ended long before the Second World War, although we did not know it then: the Jewish immigrant seeking fortune and dynasty in America. In his previous novels, Gold's language, always rich and sensuous, stood in the way of what he was trying to do. He was that peculiar creature, a "natural" novelist who had not written the novel one felt he was capable of writing. It is probably this that accounts for the smugness with which Gold has been dismissed by a number of critics and fellow novelists, most of whom should have known better. Gold was generally accused of not being tough enough, of not being contemporary, of lacking what Hemingway called cojones (a much traveled novelistic commodity), of being too sentimental. Some of this was true. Perhaps it still is. But Gold at his best, and he is at his best in Fathers, is a warm, lyrical, zestful writer. (An indication of how tough we Americans are can be found in the fact that these adjectives seem strangely hackneyed, threatening the critic's own toughness. It is a difficult land: even book reviewers bare their teeth in front of the mirror when they wake up each morning.)

The movement from the author's father Sam Gold to Herb Gold himself, from the father as father to the son as father, is something that demands no summation. Gold treads dangerously sentimental territory and the proof of his artistry is that only in fleeting instances does the novel succumb to sentiment. Perhaps our chief problem in reading Fathers is that we ourselves are too self-consciously filled with Angst to understand a Sam Gold, or even to accept him at face value. He is too elementary in his needs and desires, too responsive to the pork barrel of American life, too raucous, too tender, too loving, too intent on imposing a vision of his own destiny on his America. "But in this life you have to take chances and defend yourself like you can" is as meaningful a morality as any he could have learned in Russia and brought with him to the United States. Sam Gold is a wanderer. And the Jew as wanderer is a cliché only because, like so many clichés, it has a substantial basis in history. Gold has taken the myth of the Jew as wanderer and molded it to his own purposes. While some of us search for superman, he has been content to write a novel which is decidedly uncontemporary and remarkably good.

According to the jacket copy, Bernard Kops's The Dissent of Dominick Shapiro "presents a vivid picture of Jewish family life and offers a salutary . . . comment on rebellion among the young." In short, Kops is touching all bases. His difficulty is that he is not quite sure of whether his real subject is Jewish life in London or adolescent rebellion. He cannot altogether get away from a sometimes staged "Yiddishkeit in Golders Green" atmosphere. But despite this occasional artificiality, this is a fine novel, one that readers will inevitably compare to Salinger's Catcher in the Rye. In his rebelliousness, his distrust of the adult world, even in his outraged sense of having been conned by those who cannot understand him, Dominick must be compared to Holden Caulfield. He is, however, far more a product of this generation. Dominick is a winner at the novel's end, while Holden speaks to us from the sanctuary of his famous asylum.

With a single notable exception—a magnificent comic explosion of a Jewish wedding in London which in itself is worth the price of the book—the scenes which directly concern themselves with the Jewishness of the characters fall victim to the author's desire to make of the Jew a contemporary comic outlaw. But when he is dealing with Dominick among his kind, those restless disaffiliates who seem to represent England itself at this moment in history, Kops is in superb control, and his novel is genuinely moving and thick with humor. When we watch Dominick's dissent in action, when we view him with a pack of beatniks, follow his first sexual experience, cheer for him as he hoists an anarchist flag on Big Ben to emerge an English celebrity, he is appealingly picaresque, certainly an adequate anti-hero for this anti-heroic age.

These three novels indicate that there is still a great deal of vitality in the Jewish confrontation with Anglo-Saxon society, sufficient to feed many more writers. But with this observation one suspects also that the Jew as rebel in fiction has outlived both his time and usefulness. One mythicizes at the price of possible falsity. And if the writer's background is frequently taken for his meaning, the sad truth is that he is too frequently willing to have it that way. It is, after all, much easier. It is also much more dangerous to the powers that the creative imagination must exert.

Adding Up the Double

MR. CLEMENS AND MR. TWAIN: A Biography. By Justin Kaplan. Simon & Schuster. 424 pp. $7.95.

JAY MARTIN

Mr. Martin, an associate professor of English and American Studies at Yale University, is the author of Harvests of Change: American Literature 1865-1914 (Prentice-Hall) and Conrad Aiken: A Life of His Art (Princeton University Press). He is presently at work on a biography of Nathanael West.

Mr. Clemens and Mr. Twain, published almost a year ago, has been accorded high commendation and wide recognition, culminating recently in the awarding of both the National Book Award and the Pulitzer Prize to Justin Kaplan for his biography. Many reviewers of the book, however, have tended merely to nod pleasantly in Mr. Kaplan's direction, and then go on to write out their own versions of Mark Twain's "doubleness," his "dark side" or his literary "place," using as their evidence the vast array of material which Kaplan himself has gathered.

Such a preoccupation with the subject of the book rather than with the book itself seems to be a convention of reviewing at the present time. Perhaps in this case it suggests that the readers were encouraged to go on to Twain himself or to recall, absorbing some of Kaplan's enthusiasm, their own pleasures in reading Twain. But a book which a former editor of the Mark Twain papers has declared "is sure to remain for a long time the standard book" about Twain, one so subsequently distinguished, should be scrutinized on its own terms. If it will provide for this generation their portrait of Twain (as another historian has contended), what kind and how complete a portrait will that be?

Its particular accomplishments, everywhere apparent, are easy to enumerate. Eminent among these, of course, is the obvious command of document and detail which Kaplan shows. He has clearly gone through, minutely, a mountain of material far larger than that which Albert Bigelow Paine consulted: and although he has reduced his biography to less than half the length of Paine's, he is essentially more complete than Paine: certainly his book is more accurately balanced. And he is never, as Paine was constantly, swept away by the flood of materials at his disposal.

Moreover, in his presentation of detail he is witty, with a sharp feeling for light irony; he is accurate and precise ("To be in New York in 1867 was to be at the scrambling center of American life"); and he is inventive in style—as in his description of a Clemens family scene as if it were a sculptured "Rogers group." His book is not designed as a psychoanalytic biography, and while it is true (as one reviewer complained)

FIELD CRICKET

He's having a field day in my room and I don't mind having him make all these jumps and thrusts.
He accommodates, adjusts himself better than a boy in a candy factory.
Pocket companion, darkheaded shadow of my boyhood.
He's practicing his pure form
among the fat corn of my books, getting more mileage than goatfooted cummings or Williams and Stevens.
He sounds on his forewings
the within and without of things, birthwater sharp
over this shape, husk, peel, shell:
this terrible temple.
And I keep shedding my body forever saying goodbye to the departing boy.

that Kaplan has no coherent theory of analysis whereby to "explain" Twain's split or multiple personalities, he makes a virtue of this lack and shows admirable tact and restraint in his analysis of Twain's psyche. In particular he has some shrewd comments on Twain's ambivalence toward money, brilliantly calling the books which come from this obsession a "pornography of the dollar."

For his main theme, the split in the man indicated in the title, he has more, and more accurately presented, evidence than has ever been brought together, although critics since Twain's time have felt and discussed the divisions in him. Earlier, simple, discussions — like that of the Van Wyck Brooks-Bernard DeVoto debate — Kaplan simply passes by, in his more informed view, whereas many other critics ended here, stalled on their terms of debate. Kaplan's perception, his understanding of Twain's wit, his own clear style—in short, his absolute command of narrative—all commend his book.

Although Kaplan is so careful to be accurate about Twain, he is apt to fall into the clichés of thirty years ago (vintage Brooks-DeVoto) concerning others, particularly in his view of Bret Harte and William Dean Howells, who both play important parts. Harte, who was born in Albany, N. Y., in 1839, and did not go to California until 1854, is portrayed consistently by Kaplan as a Westerner, and he remarks on Harte's (in contrast to Twain's) confidence in Eastern society; he agrees, furthermore, with Twain's (and Brooks's) biased view of Harte's literary career, although Harte produced some of his best work in his late parodies. Howells, who had first written a biography of Lincoln in Columbus, O., then had been American consul in Venice, returned to a job on Godkin's Nation in New York, and later lived in New York for thirty years, he speaks of as having "a sure, unwavering vocation in Boston," and associates him with the Concord and Cambridge writers in the genteel tradition, though Howells had dared Twain to tell the "black truth" about himself in autobiography, and published far more black truth about American society than Twain. In the case of the comic writers and rivals of Twain in the period —P. V. Nasby and Josh Billings, for instance—Kaplan takes the view of them as buffoons (which he defends Twain against); he does not make clear that, like "Mark Twain," these are all assumed names, that the comic name was also the satirist's double, concealing name, and that, like Clemens, David Ross Locke (Nasby) was an accurate and vehement satirist of the corruption of his age. As here, so in the cases of such writers as Josiah Gilbert Holland, Samuel Bowles and Thomas Wentworth Higginson, he diminishes critics of Twain in order to raise Twain in the reader's estimation. It is curious that this group, which Kaplan generally scorns, should have played so important a role for so sharp an intelligence as Emily Dickinson: these three, precisely, were her intellectual "tutors."

Michael Goldman, Poetry Editor, will be on leave until September 15. During that time no poetry will be considered for publication; we shall welcome submissions again in the early fall.

Kaplan does not mention Emily Dickinson, and refers to Henry James only briefly; Henry Adams appears nowhere, nor do John DeForest, Rebecca Harding Davis, Stephen Crane, Sidney Lanier, Edward Eggleston, Edgar Watson Howe, Edward Bellamy or Edith Wharton. Only as people, not really as important contemporary writers, do Joel Chandler Harris, Walt Whitman, Sarah Orne Jewett and even Howells come into this book. For a work about a writer, there is strangely absent a sense that Twain was part of a community of writers—that others were, like him, concerned with the figure of the double (had not Melville treated this to exhaustion in The Confidence Man? Was not Adams' Education subtitled "A Study in Twentieth-Century Multiplicity"?), with the lost primitive past (Thoreau's and Eggleston's theme before Twain's), with utopian thought, with the genre of the travel book or of a novel dealing with the American continent (DeForest, not to mention Cooper, preceded Twain in both genres), with the theme of American Innocents in Europe (shared brilliantly by James), and so on. What did Twain read? Whom did he admire? What was his intellectual life? His sense of the art of the novel (the subject of a brilliant essay by Twain on Howells, here unmentioned)? There is a genuine piece of literary history relegated to a footnote, while the history of social, technical and political institutions fills many paragraphs, and identical quotations or information concerning Twain's view of H. H. Rogers, H. W. Beecher's opinion of his sister, Howells' comment on Twain's frequent dinners, and the size of the Twain estate in 1963 are repeated needlessly. Reacting, perhaps, against the focus of other books on the literary Twain, Kaplan deals chiefly with the Clemens-making Twain; but to the extent that he sacrifices Twain for Clemens he is both false to the balance implied in his title and to our reasons for caring at all about Mr. Clemens.

Nor does he really consider the importance of the connections or shifts between one book and another of Twain's; or that Twain's art has a development of its own which runs parallel to, but is not entirely a reflection of, the artist's life. Preoccupied with the life of the man, Kaplan misses the life of the art. It is not surprising, but it is dismaying, that he devotes many more pages to Twain's schemes for the Paige Typesetter than to Huckleberry Finn.

Both the accomplishments and defects of the book are aspects, I think, of the form in which Kaplan has chosen to tell his tale. Twain's "central drama," he tells us immediately, "was his discovery of the usable past." Kaplan, too, has discovered that the past, Twain's past, is usable, and part of the great drama of this book consists in his efforts to make it available to us. Not only apt parallels but direct allusions to the present—to Hal Holbrook, Earl K. Long and Billie Sol Estes, for instance—appear in the book as hints of this.

To make the past freely available, within the general chronology imposed by the exigencies of biography, he has developed a kind of meditative history in which, speculating about a life which is all known to him, there is no suspense, no real unfolding. He moves freely back and forth: anticipating events from present causes, tracing out the history of Twain's lifelong responses all at once, demonstrating how Twain's attitudes and satiric material were accumulating. Like Henry Adams, in his History of the Administrations of Jefferson and Madison, he wisely, but without distortion, watches his hero kicking and gesticulating on the flood of time, which will at last immerse him. And like Henry James, in biographies of Hawthorne and William Wetmore Story, he enters the life of that frail being with enormous sympathy and tenderness. He sees Twain sharply, but with great understanding, as he moves back and forth along the lines of force in his subject's career.

Such free shifting has its dangers, and for all his skill Kaplan does not entirely avoid them. The chief danger is that he will confuse one time with another. Describing Henry Ward Beecher's preaching style in 1867, he says that the minister "described himself as a 'cordial Christian Darwinist' "—a remark which Beecher could hardly have made for almost twenty years. Again, when Kaplan describes Twain's meeting with Lewis Carroll (another writer interested in the "double") in May, 1873, "the shyest full-grown man, except Uncle Remus, I ever met," he quotes Twain as saying, although Twain did not meet Joel Chandler Harris (Remus: another "double" figure) until 1882. Kaplan thus slides easily from time to time (and, in a book where the index is imperfect and documentation is very sketchy, he does not give accurate documentation for either of these quotations), occasionally falling into the trap of a method whose generally brilliant success is to that extent affected.

But these are minor skepticisms in the light of the book's successes. Twain's eccentricities are his own and not his author's. Kaplan's style is his own and not the result of stringing together his subject's cynical or witty remarks, a decided danger to which biographers of humorists often surrender. Kaplan is himself witty and wise, involved in responsiveness but detached in judgment. If his book does not give the full measure of justice to Twain's work, and should be supplemented by those of Walter Blair, Henry Nash Smith and James Cox, still, it provides a rich understanding of Twain's life that none of these can give. Taking them all together, with Kaplan's book undoubtedly serving as the base, they give us fully and elaborately Mr. Clemens and Mr. Twain.

ART / Max Kozloff

STORE DAYS: Documents from The Store (1961) and Ray Gun Theater (1962). Selected by Claes Oldenburg and Emmett Williams. Something Else Press. 152 pp. $10.

ASSEMBLAGE, ENVIRONMENTS, HAPPENINGS. Text and design by Allan Kaprow. Harry N. Abrams. 341 pp. $25.

The tradition of modern visual art, if one wanted to hazard a generalization, might be split into two broadly opposing camps: the tendency to conserve the "purity" of its various media, and the impulse to mix their properties, and blur their boundaries. As a statement, this is wobbly enough, but it is temporarily useful. For it focuses attention on a long-standing controversy: the desire to fend off "life" in an effort to create a self-contained aesthetic entity, relationally compressing metaphors of outside energies—which is resisted by the equally strong will to diffuse, tweak and bluff response by a more activist, unstructured notion of art, incorporating real objects, and often seeking ironically to change the status of the non-art surroundings. In this metaphysical argument, the issue of abstraction versus representation is secondary, or irrelevant. Though both sensibilities (whose common origin is Cubism) are elitist, they conflict in a struggle between reduction and extension, optimism and pessimism, faith in rationality, and formal manipulation opposed to skepticism about the effectiveness of form itself. A protagonist of the first camp will view a work of the second as "theatrical"; his own efforts, in turn, will be considered "cosmetic." Yet while they radically differ as to the negotiability of conventions and moral accent (e.g., the permissible limits of what can be done), both these antitheses are irreplaceable constituents of the avant-garde, lending it its characteristic tautness and vitality.

Because contemporary criticism has not yet satisfactorily transcended a formalist position, the appearance of two books by practitioners of mixed media, both extraordinary minds, is welcome. The formulations in Claes Oldenburg's Store Days and Allan Kaprow's Assemblage, Environments, Happenings are, above all, vivid. They seem to me, in addition, far-reaching and profound. Being artists, these men tend to be partisan and self-interested; but it redeems their texts that they are also exceptionally self-critical.

Despite the undiscipline of his notes, Oldenburg is perhaps the more literary of the two; he is certainly the more poetic. "I am for the art of conversation between the sidewalk and a blind man's metal stick. . . ." "I am for an art that is political-erotical-mystical, that does something other than sit on its ass in a museum." In comparison, one finds in Kaprow: ". . . A cough from the alley. You giggle, talk to someone nonchalantly while eating strawberry jam sandwiches. . . . Electric fans start wafting breezes of 'New Car' smell past your nose as leaves bury heaps of a whining, burping, foul, pinky mess." These utterances have their correlation in William Burroughs' reader-bugging language, his ecstatic loathing, that has its own analogies in Miller and Mailer, and that finds expression also in Edward Kienholz's gruesome environments. It is important to locate this disgust filled with enjoyment, this aesthetic diarrhea, not only because it is an authentic reaction to the American scene but because, in blending fundamentally opposed effects, it can attempt to comprehend a long unrealized synesthesia in the arts.

Not that Oldenburg's Store, a Second Street establishment, rented at Christmas, 1961, and filled with plaster edibles and products of his own viscous imagining, was greatly synesthetic. The present book comprises a kind of desultory sales pitch to his own consciousness, on the implications of this project. Initially, one finds Oldenburg forcing himself to "think" outside bourgeois values:

> Perhaps this can't be done, but why should I even want to create "art"—that's the notion I can't get rid of. Assuming that I wanted to create something, what would that something be? Just a thing, an object. Art would not enter into it. I make a charged object ("living"). An "artistic" appearance or content is derived from the object's reference, not from the object itself or me. These things are displayed in galleries, but that is not the place for them. A store would be better. . . . Museum in b(ourgeois) concept equals store in mine.

After all, the last thing a bourgeois public would consider an artist to be is a storekeeper.

It is interesting that Kaprow, too, rejects the gallery or museum, even any cubicle, for a display for works of art—but on the ground that these places too rigidly condition the spatial extensions he envisages. Whereas Oldenburg can say: "My life is a history of rooms in which I am self-locked in. My life is also a history of frantic 'escapes' which come to nothing, back to a room. . . . I have had something like affairs with rooms." For him, meanings saturate everything, and what is to be done, as a result, is to invert them, turn them inside out ("Store—Eros"). For Kaprow, the artist must accept whatever the nature of his improbable materials, his new subject matter, functionally making sure that they have not been cliché-ridden by previous usage. These differences of approach—the one instinctively social and Dada, the other, faithful in its logic, even to anarchy—yet seem mutually informed by an unacknowledged presentiment of nothingness, as if experience were so ungraspable that a deluge of sensations must be substituted for it. Whether emotional or pragmatic, whether zealous for an audience or indifferent to one, the experience of these two men is that the greater their intimacy with the literal stuff of actuality, the deeper are they infected by a sense of unreality. Since habitual behavior and fixed categories choke that sense of life being lived in which they want almost to immolate themselves, they mount an attack, in an ever maddened, often self-defeating whirl, against the real enemy: the capacity of the human mind to make distinctions. The Store was already a fusion of sculpture, objects and painting; a parallel step was to push off into theatre.

The great paradox of those sections in Store Days which have to do with Oldenburg's happenings, is that a radically sophisticated and problematic concept of theatre was generated by an outstanding naïveté. "Theater," he says, "is the most powerful art form there is because it is most involving . . . but it is forever becoming lost in trivialities . . . realism . . . distance . . . commercial pressures. . . . I no longer see the distinction between theater and visual arts very clearly . . . distinctions I suppose are a civilized disease." And indeed, there is something savage and childlike about him, such that he is able to conceive of a theatre of objects, in which even people are regarded as things. But this becomes a form of imitation, contaminated by an overwhelming animism: "my desire to imitate extends to the event or activity of making the thing I imitate. In one instance that is to be for a moment a sign-painter, in another, for a moment, a baker of cakes, in another the cutter of suits. . . . In some cases especially, but really in all, it is necessary to be for a moment nature herself, if this is possible." But, of course, it is not, for which reason his theatre, in fact all his work, melds extreme artifice and extreme spontaneity. The middle range of experience is dropped out, or rather, it emerges only as the nominal heading for a series of elaborate charades. To pretend not to know the difference between making and representing, this pretension, once enacted, brings crashing down the whole dramatic structure of plot, character and sequence, as it is known in Western theatre.

According to the prime exegete of Happenings, Michael Kirby, such an attitude has extraordinary repercussions on the traditional concept of acting and performance. "Acting," writes Kirby, "might be defined as the creation of character and/or place: details of 'who' and 'where' the performer is are necessary to the performance. The actor functions within subjective or objective person-place matrices." Oldenburg's personages, on the other hand, are nonmatrixed (like musicians). They are what they are, even when "performing"; their situations are real situations—literalist. Obviously, this literalism does much to destroy the conventional notion of "role"; it also works forcefully to collapse the contextual meaning of events, making them infinitely more ambiguous than in the normal theatre.

As often happens in hybrids, however, one finds the introduction of ingredients antithetic to the various media involved, with a consequent threat to resolution. Something of the kind goes far to explain the general failure of the "Nine Evenings of Art and Technology" last year at a New York armory. If the spectator is oriented toward the visual arts, he tends to "look" and to wander in his looking, structuring his experience as he goes along. If he is primarily theatre-based, he will be more inclined to "watch," and to be concentrated and obedient in his watching. The events I mention vacillated between instilling the condition of the one, only to trip it up by demands implied by the tradition of the other. This is not an accusation premised on an idea of media purity but, rather, awareness of the fact that the temporal and attention claims of two arts, when flushed outward, can awkwardly back into each other. If this means, perhaps, that the new contexts have not had sufficient time to jell coherently, it follows, also, and absurdly, that the piece must flee any thought of contexts, at least in the sense that they may bind it in.

Such, at any rate, is a major theme of Allan Kaprow's book. Its short text commences only on page 146, behind a great clump of photographs of happenings, and after it has been explained that the photos refer to their models, "but strangely, as would a movie taken of a dream, stopped at unexpected intervals." The text itself has been subject to constant revisions, since first undertaken in 1959 (in explanation of his own activities), stopping only now, rather grandly, and in a form so permanent as to be untypical of the author. For this genealogist of changing spaces and formats, who briefly sketches their history in visual art, a book must have been a sorry compromise, whose advantage consisted only in its didacticism. The latter appears in his explorations of what can be deduced, or made meaningfully hypothetical, from the pictorial directions involved in "relinquishing the goal of picture making entirely by accepting the possibilities that lay in using a broken surface and a non-geometric field." That is why Kaprow can imagine the duration of an "event" as being theoretically without limit—occurring over years or lifetimes (and discontinuously within them), and it is the cause, too, of his suggestion that an artistic action can be performed intercontinentally, infra-privately or, for that matter, in thought alone. Because of this immense and astonishing idea that the dimension of a "work of art" can be so elastic or omnipresent (viz., Early Bird television satellite), Kaprow parts ways with the Dada manifestations that otherwise would have been his normal point of departure. Neither politically motivated nor philosophically alienated, as they were, he conjures scenarios (by what means we shall see in a moment), quite in advance of seeing in them any intelligible program of content. That he is able to read this development out of the history of modern art does not prevent him from being, perhaps unwittingly, hostile to its overall tenets.

This eminently logical, articulate and practical man does not hesitate to call into question principles which have long safeguarded the informational and communicative basis of art. Thus, the notion that a work of art is created by one man (or is overseered by him), that he is in willful control of what he does, his craftsmanly execution commensurate with his intention, that his work is meant to be embodied in permanent form, are conditions which Kaprow considers dispensable. He was willing to sacrifice all these as it "became necessary as means were sought to adequately embody those subtle and spontaneous feelings and responses that were the living expression of change." (Italics mine.) It might be said that change has always been a prominent theme of art, but here there is no inhibition against thinking of it as actual. Suggesting a "form-principle for an art which is never finished"—"something to be renewed in different forms like fine cooking or the seasonal changes, which we do not put into our pockets, but need, nevertheless"—Kaprow's perspective is far superior to the merely topical references of a throw-away technological culture. Nature, the weather, above all, other people, may alter or reapportion the artist's materials as he himself has been willing to see fit, or to take in as a bonus surprise. "Using an extreme logic," he says, "this could imply that anything may be art and anyone may be an artist, but in plain fact it only extends the right of sensitive perception and creative activity to those who wish to respond appropriately, and artists usually proffer this invitation with discretion."

But if chance, in many cases, is too uncooperative or indeterminate an action, Kaprow, going further, says: "Chance bypasses failure by building non-control into the work as a desideratum." Abandoning order on a manipulatively conscious level, the idea has been to substitute for it a completely arbitrary and external kind of order. With all the dice throwing and number gambling that Kaprow argues for, following John Cage, under whom he once studied, I am out of sympathy. What can be stated most positively in its defense, that it brings with it something previously unknown at its every turn, is outweighed by its extreme deficiencies in effectiveness, and something more, I think—its philosophical facetiousness. How can one pretend to shed responsibility for an occurrence, by programing it as a system to which one is completely indifferent? (Further, if one chance system is favored because it tends to produce more interesting results, then it is not so chancy.) Even more, if one alternative, theoretically speaking, is just as good as another, then what you are doing ceases to have any evaluational density, any moral charge, and undermines the point (the claim that it is "our need for discovery or risk") of doing it in the first place. In addition, the deliberately nonorganic quality in the relationship between cause of action and the nature of material, creates far more difficulties of comprehension than it elicits scenes of wonder. I may be willing to undergo the trials of an extremely antagonistic, disrespectful artistic vision if it is made evident to me that there are eventually substances or sensations upon which I can work; but in this aesthetic, substance can just as easily evaporate as it may randomly and evanescently fall into some satisfying pattern. At such a moment, I am not prepared to be fulfilled merely by the "spirit" of accident. The literalness of the objects or events does not compensate for the intangibility of the art. But then, literalness is inimical to the allusiveness and metaphor by which synesthesia has always been constrained to operate in the past. To overstep them is only to court the documenary or the trivial.

Still and all, it is hard to be ungrateful to Kaprow's rigor, or to be unadmiring even, or especially when, he himself is aware of the distance he has traveled toward impasse and impossibility. Without the sense of this impasse, and the pressures he and many others put upon them, our options would be far fewer, and the dialogue in our aesthetic life considerably less rich.

THEATRE IN EUROPE II

HAROLD CLURMAN

London-Paris

One of the unmistakable successes of the London season is The Promise by Alexei Arbuzov, a prominent Soviet dramatist. The play was first presented in Oxford. Having been cordially greeted by the press, it was brought to the small Fortune Theatre in the capital where it has been playing to packed houses since its opening last winter.

The success is something of a phenomenon, for Arbuzov has written a slight, sentimental play of young folk in the midst of the siege of Leningrad, of friendship born from shared hardship, of true love, of self-abnegation, of the stirring of conscience to renewed and ever finer effort. There is something dubious about every one of the play's moves; nothing is wholly convincing. Yet it is a popular and critical hit.

While it is true that geniality is always a favored ingredient in show business, there are two aspects (besides a pleasing cast) that explain the play's appeal to its London audience. It is both serious and affirmative. The more highly regarded of the new plays London has been seeing for the past ten years have been bitter, and made even more acrid by their humorous garb. They have jeered at existence. In typical Soviet fashion, The Promise is bracing. One senses a kind of benevolent collusion between playwright and public. The English audience, sufficiently depressed by both fact and fiction, wants bolstering. The play provides a "lift."

Then too the play gives evidence of self-criticism; it is critical of the trend of Soviet life. That strikes the English as a sign of progress in the Socialist state with which the English people, more than we, hanker for an entente.

Through its thin garment of humble heroics, comradely good nature and manly resolve, the play suggests that the mood of idealistic struggle of the war days has since given way to a rather slothful acceptance of petty bourgeois mediocrity. In The Promise Arbuzov mildly urges the Soviet folk to recover the hardy aspiration of the period in which their nation's very existence was threatened. This may to an extent apply to England itself.

The acting is nice and very English. Pretty, robust and charming, Judi Dench (the Juliet of Zefferelli's Romeo and Juliet at the Old Vic) is particularly good in the third act in which the bedraggled waif of the first act has become a dignified doctor and wife. In the earlier scenes Miss Dench forces her youthfully eager impetus too much.

Still I could not help noticing that the more heartily Russian the male actors try to be the more British "boy scout" and slightly camp they seem to become. I make this perhaps ungracious comment because it is reported that while Miss Dench will not be present when the play comes to Broadway, the two men are to be. Since the question of English actors on our stage has recently become a matter of some controversy, I feel obliged to assert that if ever English actors were not needed for the proper presentation of a play among us, The Promise is a case in point.

Paris has its three subsidized (national) theatres: the venerable Comédie Française, the more adventurous Théâtre de France (Jean Louis Barrault's company) and the Théâtre National Populaire now under the guidance of an excellent actor, Georges Wilson. In these theatres (and during the spring months), with the festival visits of foreign troupes which are collectively advertised as the Théâtre des Nations, worthy productions of interesting plays may be enjoyed.

At the Comédie Française, to cite one instance, a new production of Molière's Dom Juan has aroused considerable interest: applause from the progressive forces, condemnation from the traditionalists. Both factions seem to me misguided but the play itself merits consideration.

It is much less frequently given than any of Molière's other plays because it isn't, and is hardly intended to be, particularly funny. It verges on anger. While Molière is passionately on the side of the angels, the play in its time, and to some degree even today, affronts both the respectable (conservative) members of society and the cynics. For Dom Juan's lack of hypocrisy, his witty defense of profligacy and his even bolder defiance of moral and religious strictures are stated with such splendid candor that he engages our sympathy.

It is perhaps significant that Molière makes Sgnarelle—an intimidated valet, almost a "slave"—the spokesman for virtue. When he asks his master what he believes in, Dom Juan replies: "I believe that two and two make four and four and four are eight," to which the bondsman retorts, "Your religion, I see, is arithmetic." The rejoinder has a peculiarly contemporary ring.

The Molière revival has been staged by a director associated with the more forward looking wing of the Parisian profession. But the French theatrical avant-garde is hardly the counterpart of that in Eastern Europe. In this respect, Dom Juan is an example of the slow pace and feeble accomplishment of the stage in Paris today.

The settings for Dom Juan, prettified "Noguchi" without that artist's originality, are bronzed abstract shapes. A warm amber light plays on them, adding a glamour that negates the severity I assume their menacing contours are intended to convey. The costumes worn by the principal characters resemble blue patent leather space suits. One wonders how they are related to the text—except as they differ from the routine dress we are accustomed to see at the Comédie Française. Is it possible that the director wishes to imply that space men are the aristocrats of our time?

The staging too attempts to strike a "modern" note by having several scenes played in semi-obscurity with the actors placed at a considerable distance upstage, their backs turned to the audience. Though proficient, the acting reveals nothing new, relying as it does on well-articulated and energetic speech in the best conservatory manner.

Apart from the vogue of Pinter, Osborne and Albee, the will to bring a draft of fresh air onto the now languishing French stage is observed in the carefully designed nonrealistic settings employed in such productions as those of Arrabal's The Architect and the Emperor and Pirandello's To Find Oneself.

Arrabal, a Spaniard by the Seine, is thought to be sounding a chord of his own: ritualistic, improvisatory, lyrically vehement, anarchic, grotesquely and violently comic. But I found little in The Architect and the Emperor, a symbolic two-character play, which does not derive from every one of the theatrical fauves or "wild men" from Jarry to Genet. The high point of Arrabal's play is a scene in which the Architect (the Common Man lost on a mythical planet) chops the Emperor (ruler of Civilization) to bits—and eats him. For all its gestures of total freedom and ferocious playfulness, I see in the play merely another specimen of the up-to-the-minute trite.

The setting in straw is a good-looking but dramatically irrelevant object, while the acting is strenuous with a fire that sheds neither heat nor light. For all that, the play is one of the season's hits.

Pirandello's To Find Oneself is a largely discursive rehash of the dramatist's everlasting theme that we have no stable identity—the illustration in this case is effected in the person of a star actress—and that to find oneself one must create a superself through art.

The play merits attention not so much because of its author's eminence as because it is the most meticulously mounted production in Paris. The costumes are stylishly handsome, the sets have a kind of metallic and silky Cecil Beaton chic, and the performance as a whole is rather special.

The acting, with only one ranting exception, avoids "emotion" and is deliberately reduced to a flat declarative statement the director mistakenly takes for either Stanislavsky simplicity or Brecht calm. As a contrast to most Parisian acting, the result is something of an innovation, though it so happens that Pirandello requires Italian flame and flare rather than dispassionate sobriety. Yet with an expert company in which Delphine Seyrig (the lady of Last Year in Marienbad), beautifully gowned, speaks in a white voice of muted resonance through a mask of suppressed fervor suggesting mystery, the evening makes an uncommon though ultimately boring impression.

Another and far more modest play which has been gratefully welcomed is Romain Weingarten's Summer at the Théâtre de Poche, seating about 150 persons. It is a wispy little thing in which the characters are two cats (I'm not using slang) and two children, a brother and sister. It is whimsy, tender and touching to a degree. It evokes the poetry of young people's loneliness, awakening desire, growth and the secret germination of nature. Like many such things, the play is prolonged beyond the point of pleasure: brevity is the soul of whimsy.

Neither London with its numerous actors of genuine ability nor Paris with its remainders of former brilliance reveals the kind of theatre excitement one finds in Prague and Berlin. Events in these cities will be discussed in the next two "installments" of this account.

Forewarned Is Forearmed

Tomorrow's top news story need not always catch you unprepared. Time and again, The Nation has called attention to coming events well before they happened. Two examples: On November 19, 1960, we carried a story about the impending Bay of Pigs disaster, which actually occurred six months later. On March 27 of this year, we warned of the coming coup in Greece, four weeks before it hit the headlines. What Nation subscribers are reading this week is giving them a "sneak preview" of some of the front page news of next month, or next year. Why not join this group of alert and forewarned citizens?

implication denied

New York City

Dear Sirs: Your May 29 issue has an article entitled "The Time-Life Caper: Brazil's Yankee Network" by Ernest Blum, which contains the following statement: "Late last year, apparently as a result of the Time-Life revelations, the corporate links between Vision, Inc., of New York, and Visao were ostensibly severed." This sentence implies that some unlawful or improper connection exists between Vision, Incorporated and Visao. This implication is false. Although Vision, Incorporated, pursuant to contract, acts as exclusive sales representative of advertising space in Visao in countries other than Brazil. . . . Vision, Incorporated has no direct or indirect interest in Revista Visao Ltda., a wholly Brazilian company which owns Visao, maintains no contacts with the editorial staff of Visao and does not interfere with or attempt to exercise any direct or indirect control or influence over the editorial policies or content of Visao or its orientation or management or over the policies, administration, orientation or management of Revista Visao Ltda. In short, no relationship, other than our position as exclusive sales representative for advertising space in countries other than Brazil—a position wholly proper under Brazilian law and practice—exists between Vision and Revista Visao Ltda. and/or Visao. . . .

Dear Sirs: The New Yorker refuses to list the play Mac Bird! in its so-called "Conscientious Calendar of Goings On About Town." This play has received both kudos and brickbats from very important critics. Mac Bird! is a very successful production in the largest theatre off-Broadway. There are also productions in London and San Francisco, with plans to mount it in Boston, Chicago, Washington, Los Angeles and perhaps other places. . . . why U Thant withdrew

Dear Sirs: Your editorial statement (The Nation, June 19) that "the abrupt withdrawal of the UN forces gave Nasser the opportunity to precipitate the crisis" would appear to be based on the picturesque simile coined by the British Foreign Secretary, Mr. Brown, in the House of Commons on May 31, and repeated by the Foreign Minister of Israel, Mr. Eban, to the Assembly on June 20: "It could not be right, when a fire is known to be imminent, to remove the fire brigade." It may be useful, therefore, to take note of what was said by Secretary General U Thant on the latter occasion—after your statement was published—in condign refutation thereof and rebuke of its co-authors, if only to correct a false impression.

U Thant told the Assembly that "unlike the UAR, which had agreed to UN troops forming a buffer on its side of the line, Israel had extended no such cooperation, despite the intent of the General Assembly resolution ten years ago. "Before receiving and replying to the UAR request for withdrawal of the UN force, he had raised with the Israeli UN delegate the possibility of stationing elements of the UN force on the Israeli side of the line, and was told that the idea was "completely unacceptable." . . .

Recalcitrant World

The overwhelming influence of the two superpowers over the fate of small nations has been much deplored, not without reason. But from time to time a small nation seizes the opportunity to expose for all to see the limitations on the power of the great. Or, as in the recent inconclusive voting in the UN General Assembly on the Middle East problem, the small nations, though disagreeing among themselves, frustrate the superpowers so painfully that one can almost forgive the latter for their misguided policies.

The prime example of a small nation humiliating a large one is, of course, Vietnam vis-à-vis the United States. True, the cost to the small country is appalling. One has only to consider the ratio of North Vietnamese and Vietcong dead to American and South Vietnamese government losses, yet Americans are being shipped back to the States in coffins at an annual rate of something like 15,000, and the war drags on. Not all the power of the greatest military machine in all history is enough to bring the Vietnamese to their knees. With each week of the excruciating spectacle the prestige of the United States sinks a bit further, and the disgust of men of good will mounts in proportion.

Or take the efforts of the Soviet Union to equip the Arab world for its assault on Israel. The Soviet policy is not on the same level of iniquity as that of the United States in Southeast Asia. The Soviets were at first receptive to the creation of a Jewish state in the Middle East, and their alliance with the Arabs has the excuse of propinquity. But the end result has been abject failure. The Soviets could arm the Arabs but could not give them unity among themselves nor the ability to use modern arms to good effect. The Arabs served their patron quite as badly as the South Vietnamese generals have served the United States.

The Soviet effort to turn defeat into victory in the UN, or at least to mitigate the debacle, is likewise a failure. Kosygin's appeal to the Assembly merely emphasized the Soviet discomfiture; if he had left the speechmaking to Gromyko, the rebuff would have been less embarrassing. Certainly the USSR is a superpower: its performance in World War II, and its nuclear arsenal, can leave no doubt. But its diplomacy does not match its military prowess. The last really brilliant Soviet diplomat was the first foreign minister, Chicherin, who had served the Czar and stayed on for the Bolsheviks.

Even the rightist press, however, cannot turn the Soviet defeat in the Assembly into an American victory. Rallying its Latin American cohorts and anyone else it could pull in, the United States did slightly better than the Soviets, who never received more than 45 votes on any paragraph of its own proposal. The Yugoslav draft, which was the only real hope the Soviet bloc had, collected 53 votes, with 46 against and 20 abstentions. The more sensible Latin American draft, which linked Israel's withdrawal to the end of the state of belligerency to which the Arabs cling, was rejected, 57 to 43 with 20 abstentions. This was the motion the United States supported with every diplomatic resource and no doubt implied promises of reward and punishment—and it garnered 4 more votes than the Yugoslav proposal.

Where do these events—in the Middle East, in Vietnam, and at the UN—leave the superpowers? What emerges is that when the two great antagonists pursue their antagonism by all means short of nuclear war, they both lose. In one confrontation the Soviets may come out ahead, in another the United States, but in the end both cover themselves with shame. The great aggressors of the past could at least carve out world empires for themselves, but all the superpowers can achieve is chronic stalemate, with periodic threats of nuclear warfare which may some day turn into the real thing.

This frustrating and dangerous immobility of the superpowers paralyzes the UN, but it would be a foolish exaggeration to say that the world organization has become useless. It did provide a means of ending the fighting at least some days sooner than would otherwise have been possible. The UN role was much like that of the referee in a prize fight where one man is decisively defeated and should be spared further punishment. Had it not been for the UN, the Israeli armies would probably be in Amman, Damascus and Cairo. Second, the UN has provided a forum for debate in which the issues were clarified for everyone who cared to listen. The fatal weakness of the Arab case was that the leaders in Damascus and Cairo had vowed to drive Israel into the sea, and still will not give up their stand of perpetual belligerency. Some of Abba Eban's arguments were as specious as those of any other foreign minister, but the essential reasonableness of the Israeli position emerged from the debates. Before there was a United Nations (and the earlier League of Nations), humanity had no such instrument of elucidation. The UN is the creation of nations trying desperately, and with no assurance of success, to avert nuclear extermination by discussion and diplomacy.

It will never be more than that as long as the world is divided into three camps—the American, the Soviet, and those who occupy a precarious position in between. The UN can play a larger role, and the world can breathe more easily, only when the superpowers decide to cooperate, for the most part, instead of remaining frozen in antagonism. This was shown in the Glassboro meetings. Little enough was accomplished, as far as the world was told, in the Johnson-Kosygin confrontations, but the mere fact that they came together to talk inspired hope—not least among the American people. It was [illegible] slight indication of what could be accomplished if the superpowers would cease their posturing and engage in a constructive dialogue.

Was This Violence Necessary?

Los Angeles

The scene on June 23 was pure Hollywood, and the action occurred appropriately on the old Twentieth Century Fox movie lot, whose vast acreage is now the setting for Century City, the biggest planned complex of luxury office buildings, shopping centers and apartment houses in America. The backdrop was the crescent-shaped, block-long Century Plaza Hotel, where deep inside, the President of the United States dined with 1,000 guests at a $500-a-plate political fund-raising dinner.

On the parkway facing the crowd of spectators were a tangle of TV cameras and clots of news reporters. Uniformed, white-helmeted police, 1,300 of them, were everywhere—on foot and roaring about on motorcycles and in siren-screaming squad cars. Early in the day, they had cordoned off a four-block area surrounding the hotel. Plain-clothes police mingled with the crowd, relaying information to various police "command posts."

The parade of demonstrators against the war in Vietnam, which had assembled in a park playground a few blocks away, started to empty slowly into the Century Plaza area about 7:30 P.M. Instead of moving past the hotel, the leading contingent stopped, and thousands of marchers, following behind, gradually filled half the six-lane avenue for two and a half blocks. The police parade permit, and a quickie court injunction issued only hours earlier, had required the parade not to pause at the hotel, but it was highly doubtful that most of the marchers were aware of this stipulation. Parade monitors urged people to keep moving, but their instructions could not be widely heard in the hubbub.

At this point, the atmosphere was reminiscent of a Hollywood première, except for a small forest of picket signs, a few comparing President Johnson to Hitler. More typical were those reading, "War is unhealthy for children and other living things." Families with young children, some pushed in prams, were sprinkled through the crowd, predominantly middle class and white.

As the jolly black-tie banquet got under way, a police captain outside stepped up to a loud-speaker system and ordered the crowd to disperse. Parade monitors tried, as they had before, to move the demonstrators along, but there was no perceptible movement. Afterward, many paraders insisted they had heard no warning.

Thirty minutes passed, and then it was lights, camera, action, as though the scene had been thoroughly rehearsed. A solid phalanx of police suddenly advanced into the mass of people, swinging night sticks as they reached the front lines, and turning a large part of the crowd back upon itself in panic. What had been an orderly gathering turned into a stampede of frightened thousands. Motorcycle police drove a wedge into the center of the crowd, and officers on foot swarmed in to widen the gap and cut the demonstration in two. An officer of the American Civil Liberties Union who was on the march said: "For the police, it was a safari. They were bottling people up and beating them. A dispersal could have been made without trouble." His report could have been biased—he had been struck on the head by a police club.

Was the police action necessary? One of the demonstration leaders put part of the blame on the "relative inexperience" of the organizers. "Our parade permit was totally inadequate, but we didn't realize that," he said. "We knew that some of the demonstrators planned to sit down, but we thought the parade would move around them, and they would be subject to arrest. We were not prepared for an attack by the police." In the planning stage of the protest, wacky talk was heard of turning mice into the banquet room or setting off stink bombs in the hotel. It was evident that some of the people involved, especially the college youngsters, had no understanding of the tension that surrounds a visit of the President during a protest demonstration. They acted as though they had never heard of November 22, 1963, and Dallas. But prior to the rush of the police against the crowd, there was no reported act of overt hostility directed against them or any move to approach the hotel.

Chief of Police Tom Reddin said he ordered the dispersal solely for the "safety of the President of the United States during an extremely dangerous situation." C.B.S. News suggested another reason by reporting rumors that the President had made it clear he did not want an unfriendly crowd near the hotel. It was hinted that the Secret Service passed the word on to the police. If this is true, it may pose an interesting problem of crowd control in next year's Presidential election.

Chief Reddin, as he deserted his "command post" and came into the street to congratulate his forces, said, "I think the message is out. Our city is not going to give in to lawbreakers." As to the identity of the lawbreakers, the American Civil Liberties Union offered a different view: "What is clear beyond a shadow of a doubt is that the brutal conduct of the police in their method of dispersing the alleged 'illegal assembly' was unwarranted, unlawful, and a complete violation of the basic liberties guaranteed by the Constitution."

Hot Summers and Short Tempers

The long hot summer, now at its zenith, has had only one accepted meaning in the American lexicon of politics. It is the time when disaffected Negroes take to the streets to burn and loot. It is the time when the police, and the National Guard when necessary, stand between the pillars of society and the ghetto rabble, which shows no gratitude for the goodies showered on it by Welfare and the Great Society. Further, according to the "right thinkers" of the middle class, law and order would not be thus flouted were it not for "outside agitators" who incite the no-good Negro poor to riot. (The most energetic of these rabble rousers is, of course, Stokely Carmichael

SUMMER SCHEDULE

During July and August, The Nation will appear on alternate weeks: forthcoming issues will be dated July 31, August 14 and August 28.

who, thanks to air travel, may pop up anywhere at any time to disturb the peace.)

Sentiment in Congress to deal with this menace has been mounting to such a pitch that nearly 100 anti-riot bills have backed up in the House Judiciary Committee, where Chairman Emanuel Celler stuck his hand in the dike to keep them from getting to the floor. However, after foretastes of the summer heat in Atlanta, Tampa, Cincinnati, Buffalo, Boston and other cities, Mr. Celler had to yield to the clamor. William C. Colmer of Mississippi, Chairman of the House Rules Committee, will bring out a bill if Celler doesn't—and without a Celler amendment to protect Negroes and other minority groups.

The prospect is, then, for a bill that will make it a federal crime to cross state lines with intent to "incite, organize, promote or encourage" a riot. The penalties would be fines up to $10,000, or prison terms of up to five years, or both.

If all goes according to plan, the House will repeat its performance in passing the flag-burning bill by a vote of 385 to 16. For many Congressmen the twin occasions for parliamentary passion are Negro agitators and flag burners, and in addressing their constituents they frequently link the two as manifestations of a single Communist plot. When the flag-desecration bill was up for consideration, Rep. Walter S. Baring (D., Nev.) called the flag burners "dirty, long-haired, Communist-led beatniks." Respect for Old Glory was upheld by another Southern Democrat, James A. Haley of Florida, who proposed taking the miscreants 200 miles out in the ocean and sinking them with the anchor around their necks. "Let's deal with these buzzards!" cried L. Mendel Rivers of South Carolina. It is safe to predict that they will be equally impassioned in dealing with anyone who urges the Negro to consider his grievances, and that they will be joined by the guardians of law and order from the North.

Of course there is always protection for the dissatisfied and dissenting from the staunch exponent of freedom of expression in the White House. But they had better not rely too much on support from that quarter, for there are signs that the long hot summer is fraying the Presidential nerves as well. Samuel Sharkey, Jr., of the Birmingham News Washington staff, reports that at a meeting between Mr. Johnson and the AFL-CIO Building and Construction Trades Council, the President complained of peace pickets in front of the White House. "It's difficult now getting to the front gate without the dogs barking," said the great defender of dissent. In a barely audible aside he added, "I'm tired of them." Let the agitators and peaceniks take heed.

Ghost Vote

A new way to pervert the democratic process has been devised, or at any rate has just come to public notice. Elegant in its simplicity, it is essentially ballot-box stuffing on a grand and public scale, requiring no more than infinite gall on the part of the perpetrator. Students of political science—and political chicanery—have Rep. George P. Miller, a California Democrat, to thank for it.

On the floor of the House late in June during a debate on the space agency's budget, Miller falsified a teller vote in full view of his colleagues and of reporters in the press gallery. Perhaps this has been done many times before; perhaps not. This time, however, someone who saw it reported it in a newspaper the following day.

Miller, chairman of the House Space Committee, was defending the NASA budget bill from an amendment which would require the agency to pay some attention to rudimentary safety precautions. The amendment was offered by Rep. Donald Rumsfeld, an Illinois Republican who serves on Miller's committee.

A teller vote was called for. This is an evasive parliamentary trick used to poll the House without placing individual members on the record; who, after all, wishes to be recorded as voting against safety for the astronauts?

Under House rules, Rumsfeld and Miller were appointed tellers. First those in favor trooped up the aisle between the two tellers as Rumsfeld counted and Miller watched (along with other witnesses on the floor and in the gallery). Rumsfeld was seen to count 88 members, and duly reported 88 ayes to the chair. Then came Miller's turn. A press gallery observer counted 77 members as passing up the aisle, but Miller announced the count as 101. He was not challenged, and this artifice gave him the decision even though he lacked the actual votes.

Rumsfeld was asked later if he had noticed the discrepancy. "Of course I did," he replied, "but what should I have done, call him a liar?" The answer is, obviously, yes, but that is not how the game is played in Congress. There has never been a challenge to a teller vote, according to House Parliamentarian Lewis Deschler.

Apparently a "gentlemen's agreement" operates in such cases, making it difficult for the citizens to be properly represented by their Congressmen. This time, however, honesty won out—the same amendment came up again as part of a package and won handily on a roll-call vote.

The Negro and Vietnam

Since Martin Luther King's assumption of leadership in a joint peace-civil rights movement, he has been singled out for a barrage of attacks, some snide, some vicious. The more virulent of these assaults, however, usually contain a mitigating clause: namely, that King is not quite as detestable as McKissick and Carmichael and those other fiends who describe Vietnam as a "war of color," a "race war" and the like. Granting the courage and dedication of the leaders of this wing, one may feel that their rhetoric is a net contribution to the cause of those who oppose them. Seldom in history has flamboyant and careless exhortation advanced a good cause. If by a war of race is meant that we are in Vietnam because the Vietnamese (or the Chinese) have a different skin color, the charge falls of its own weight. General Maxwell Taylor is quite plausible when he says that we would fight "the fairest of the fair" if we thought they were "betraying" us by inaugurating a revolution of a type we did not approve.

The real question is this: does the American Negro have good reason to feel that he is being victimized in this war? Rep. Augustus Hawkins of Southern California, himself a Negro, has done some research on the subject (Congressional Record—House, April 18, p. 4283). Summarized, his findings are:

(1) The present draft boards are with few exceptions "small independent kingdoms" heavily weighted in favor of age, white skin and service in past wars. They operate with practically unfettered power and, as others than Mr. Hawkins have observed, with the utmost caprice and non-uniformity.

(2) Because of educational discrimination and other disadvantages, only about half of the Negroes in the preferred age group qualify for service, whereas three-quarters of the white youth are acceptable. But in the qualifying groups, only 5 per cent of the Negroes can obtain deferment as college students, whereas 95 per cent of the whites are so deferred. The result is an induction rate for Negroes about twice as high as for eligible whites.

Some time back, Mr. Johnson, "surprised" by suggestions that color might be a factor in the draft, asked the state governors to give him examples of discrimination. He reported, proudly, that he had received only one such case. But the point, amply documented in the Hawkins report, is that discrimination is so massive, so institutionalized, that individual complaints are really not relevant.

Those who prefer white testimony on this point can find complete corroboration in The Economist, April 15, p. 255. One out of every 11 American men between the ages of 19 and 29 is a Negro, but 2 out of every 11 of the Army's enlisted men killed in Vietnam up to the end of 1966 were Negroes. The Economist's U.S. correspondent goes on to point out that despite the discrimination which remains, and the chance of being killed, military service is a refuge for many Negroes—their only escape from city slums or rural sharecropping. It offers three meals a day, clothing, medical care, a little spending money, and some fringe benefits—particularly the prestige of soldiering. Some whites regard this reconciliation of some Negroes with the military services as progress, but in reality it is the most damning indictment of all. To compound the irony, Dr. King will find it difficult to get Negroes to follow the banner he has raised because many are so desperate that they are willing to fight—and to re-enlist—in considerable numbers. Of all the careers available to most Negroes, the Army is one of the few offering a measure of immediate improvement.

Yet, in the long run, McKissick and Carmichael may prove to be prophets in some peripheral sense. John Lewis of The Washington Post, after interviewing a substantial number of Negro troops in Vietnam, found that they did not feel they were being exploited, but "they did hold strong views on their rights to equal treatment when they got back home." [See "The Negro in Vietnam" by Karl H. Purnell, The Nation, July 3.] They were lining up on "the more activist side" of nonviolence, and some sounded ready to use violence if necessary. The powers that be had better not toss their hats in the air at the present moderation of the mass of Negroes.

HATFIELD: THE OREGON ENIGMA

ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Mark O. Hatfield, 45, former Governor of Oregon and since January the junior Senator from that state (Wayne Morse is the senior Senator), has for seven years been regularly mentioned as a possible Vice Presidential candidate on the Republican ticket. Among national strategists for the GOP he is chiefly valued—like Charles Percy and John Lindsay—as an available balance to a ticket that might be headed by a candidate such as Nixon or Reagan. Nobody, least of all Hatfield, expects the leaders to see him as possessing more ponderous potentialities before 1972, in which year he will still be young enough to sprint to the platform to make his acceptance speech.

The Republican National Headquarters likes to describe Hatfield as one of the "fresh new faces," although there is really nothing new about him. He has been in politics—sometimes peering over the edge of national politics—since 1950. He nominated Nixon in 1960; he returned to the GOP convention four years later to deliver the keynote address, which he couched in such reasonable and moderate terms that the Goldwater galleries considered him an intruder. Over the years, operating out of a state that made no great demands on his talents, Hatfield got around the nation enough to cultivate an image which The Saturday Evening Post caught in the title "Oregon's Golden Boy." In a party led mostly by men of pewter it was not hard to seem so.

Hatfield progressed smoothly upward from the Oregon House (four years), into the state Senate (two years), briefly into the secretary of state's office (two years), then becoming Governor in 1958 at the age of 36, the youngest Oregonian ever to get there. He served in that office until, without missing a government payday, he moved last January into the U.S. Senate, where his national reputation to date hangs from two shining hooks: he is the GOP's most outspoken advocate of a halt to bombing of North Vietnam, of giving the problem to the United Nations, of turning Asia back to the Asians; and he is an eloquent challenger of that "tyranny in our midst" which President Johnson has created by "redefining our Constitution to deny us our liberty."

With these stands he has stirred much warmth among Democrats who value sanity over partisanship. Senators Lee Metcalf and Morse are two who have said they would vote Republican in 1968 if Hatfield were the party's Presidential candidate. This kind of discontent in the other party prompts Hatfield to predict "a greater hope for the GOP next year than in 1964 or 1966, greater also than in 1960. One of the basic reasons is that in the history of U.S. political systems, the outs have depended on the weakening of the majority party rather than on the strengthening of the minority party. Of course, you've got to do more than wait for their decline. You have to come up with something. To me, it's an opportunity to espouse alternatives."

There is not yet anything that could be called a ground swell in his support, but each day he gets twenty to thirty requests to make speeches, and although his appeal seems greatest among university and church organizations he has in the last couple of months addressed groups as various as a General Electric Co. seminar, the National Manufacturers Association, the Daughters of the American Colonists, the Young Republican Club of Princeton, the Ripon Society, the National Agriculture and Marketing Conference, the New York City Young Republicans (to receive their annual War Memorial Award), the University of California student body, the American Society of Newspaper Editors, the Southern Baptist Convention in Miami and the Yale Political Union. The Harvard Young Republicans, who a few days earlier had received Governor Romney very coolly, gave Hatfield a two-minute standing ovation.

His impact on these groups has no point in common with the craggy cerebralism of Paul Douglas or the steerage animalism of Lyndon Johnson; he strikes instead with the cock-sure decencies of a Calvinistic Republican who has never lost an election in a Democratic state.

Hatfield is a trim 6-footer with brown hair, pale green eyes and the kind of scrubbed, perfectly balanced features that recommend him to Oregon women's groups; his grooming is fastidious almost to the point of being flashy. Some of his advisers wished he would dress a bit more like one of the boys when he campaigned in the lumber camps of Oregon, but Hatfield stuck to his dapper green corduroy suit and refused to rough it. He is not athletic. He went out for rugby at Stanford University, but he is better at playing the clarinet. He is a good gardener and an expert canner of pickles. His father was a blacksmith and his mother a schoolteacher, and Hatfield has not, since leaving home, attained story-book riches; when he left college teaching to enter politics it meant a step up in pay.

Still—despite the fact that his career, like his looks, seems to have been programed through some All-American IBM machine—there is a primitive excitement about his presence in Washington, as there always is when a talented fellow climbs out of the restricting furrows of state politics and onto the rich alluvial plain of national affairs, there to discover himself and what he can do.

Nothing marks his new freedom better than his campaign for the Senate. His opponent was Rep. Robert Duncan, a tousled-haired, outgoing Scotsman, a beer-drinking, snuff-dipping ex-gold-miner and, above everything else, a partisan of LBJ's war in Southeast Asia. Duncan is, in short, just the opposite of Hatfield. In defeating Duncan, Hatfield freed himself, at least momentarily, from most of the parochial criticism that has dragged upon his career for seventeen years—that he is too handsome, too pious, too slippery on issues, and too peaceful.

Except for the complaints about Hatfield's philosophical elusiveness—which have some substance, and to which I shall return in a moment—these are plainly the gripes of the outs who cannot think of much to damn a man for except that he is in. The best expression of that group that I have heard was made by a Washington-based Oregonian: "I think he's basically a fink. But you can't get up on a political stand and say vote against him because he's a fink. You've got to say he's screwed us here or there—and he hasn't."

Opposition of that sort is worth buying, but Hatfield gets it free—an example of the superb luck that has always followed him. Slander and tough attacks on him have a way of boomeranging in the most spectacular fashion. In 1952 Hatfield, with the help of then Gov. Douglas McKay, was named to the GOP national platform committee instead of Senator Morse. It was partly pique at this rebuff that prompted Morse to switch to the Democratic Party. Free of Morse's pushy personality, Hatfield was thus nicely positioned to become the outstanding Republican in the state.

But the victory had a heavy price: a feud with Morse which came to a climax six years later when Hatfield was campaigning for governor.

In 1956, Morse had been challenged for re-election by McKay who, as Eisenhower's Secretary of the Interior, led the giveaway of the Hells Canyon power project. Morse was the leader of the opposition. Ike, hoping to get rid of this irritant, sent McKay home to run against him. Morse slaughtered McKay. Now, in 1958, Morse was restless to complete his revenge for the embarrassment of 1952. He would do anything to defeat Hatfield.

The contest for governor was tight. The incumbent, Robert D. Holmes, was a popular Democrat who had been elected in 1956 to fill an unexpired term. That same year Hatfield had been elected secretary of state, the only Republican candidate for an Oregon state office to survive a Democratic sweep. Going down to the general election in 1958, it was impossible to tell who was ahead, but many newspaper reporters felt they could detect a wafer-thin lead for Holmes.

Five days before the balloting, Morse decided to play rough. He had two smears to choose between at the bottom of the Democratic grab bag. One was a morals rumor, completely unfounded, similar to the notorious one used ten years earlier to defeat Homer Rainey in his campaign for the governorship of Texas. The other was an old tragedy in Hatfield's life; eighteen years earlier a child had darted into the path of a car driven by Hatfield, and was killed. A civil suit jury awarded the parents $5,000.

Democratic strategists had decided against using either story, but Morse broke their plans, stirred up tales of the car accident, and publicly accused Hatfield of lying to the jury. It was the best thing that could have happened to Hatfield. Former Gov. Charles Sprague, Oregon's Republican elder statesman, had earlier said that his newspaper, The Salem Statesman, would support neither Holmes nor Hatfield. But after Morse's blunder, Sprague called for Hatfield's election because of "this foul eleventh-hour attack." Even the attorneys for the slain child's parents put in a good word for Hatfield. Thousands of others felt the same. The switchboards at the Portland newspapers were flooded with anti-Morse protests. Leading Democrats tried to repair the damage by dissociating themselves from Morse's revelation, but there wasn't time. Although the Democrats had a registration edge of 52,000 voters, Hatfield won by 60,000. (To help grease any possible switch of this kind, Hatfield had left the word "Republican" off his billboards.)

Within a year after this painful encounter, the feud was over and Hatfield and Morse moved into a smooth alliance, establishing a Washington-Salem axis for squeezing Corps of Engineers and Bureau of Reclamation projects out of the federal government. Their chumminess in economic matters has now been strengthened by their common opposition to the Vietnamese War. Morse voted for Hatfield last year and he, in turn, is expected to help Morse next year if Morse needs it, which he probably won't.

The striking Hatfield luck bobbed to the surface again last year in his race against Duncan. With encouragement from the Johnson Administration, Duncan flew into the campaign as the most belligerent sort of hawk. When Hatfield brought other issues into the race Duncan tried to block him, saying, "The war is the issue. There are no clear-cut state issues between us." Sometimes Duncan referred to the race as a "referendum on the war." Encouraged by his easy primary victory over Howard Morgan, a peace candidate backed by Morse, and whipped along by his own rhetoric, Duncan indulged in extravagances. The war was merely a choice of fighting on the Mekong Delta or at the mouth of the Columbia River, he said. To hear Duncan talk, the enemy was Communist China, which was about to launch a massive armada of junks against the West Coast of the United States. He suggested with little subtlety that a vote for Hatfield was a vote for Mao. "Hanoi and Peking are watching the elections very closely — particularly the one here in Oregon—to see if the American people will support the [Administration's] policy of resistance to Communist aggression."

Oregonians are a somewhat independent people who enjoy mavericks (witness their tolerance of the senior Senator) and resist being coerced by superpatriotic propaganda, but it began to seem that Duncan was moving ahead of Hatfield, despite the fact that Hatfield was far better known in the state and was buoyed up by a much larger campaign budget. Then two key factors turned in Hatfield's favor. First, bank interest rates began to soar, causing a cutback of the nation's building industry, followed quickly by a cave-in of the Oregon lumber industry. But Duncan, who by this time was locked in to defending everything that was happening under the Johnson Administration, went about the state claiming that all was well. He succeeded only in irritating everyone.

Second, President Johnson announced that he would hold a conference among friendly Pacific powers in Manila to discuss ways to improve the situation in Vietnam. Hatfield, a genius at hooking others into an appearance of supporting his position, immediately praised Johnson for coming over to his way of seeing negotiation as the way out. The President, not he, had changed, said Hatfield; but he was ready to be big about it and call for the prayers of all Americans so that "he can be the kind of leader we saw in Dwight Eisenhower in 1952." Then Vice President Humphrey came to Oregon to put in a good word for Duncan, but while there announced: "We are prepared to see the National Liberation Front represented in peace negotiations." Hatfield also called this support for his own position; and then on November 4, just before the election, he added UN Ambassador Arthur Goldberg to his stable of "supporters," giving the impression that Goldberg's conciliatory remarks in the UN were prompted by Hatfield's call for peace. By the time Hatfield got through claiming credit and support, he had thoroughly integrated doves and hawks, and had left Duncan seeming to stand alone as a global brawler. It may not have been exactly an accurate juggling, but it seemed to work. The Oregonian, the state's largest paper, called Hatfield "the responsible voice of dissent as contrasted to the irresponsible rant and cant of Senator Morse."

(Duncan, who admits today that it was a fatal mistake to limit his campaign to one issue and to seem so closely allied with Johnson, will not make that mistake next year if he runs against Morse.)

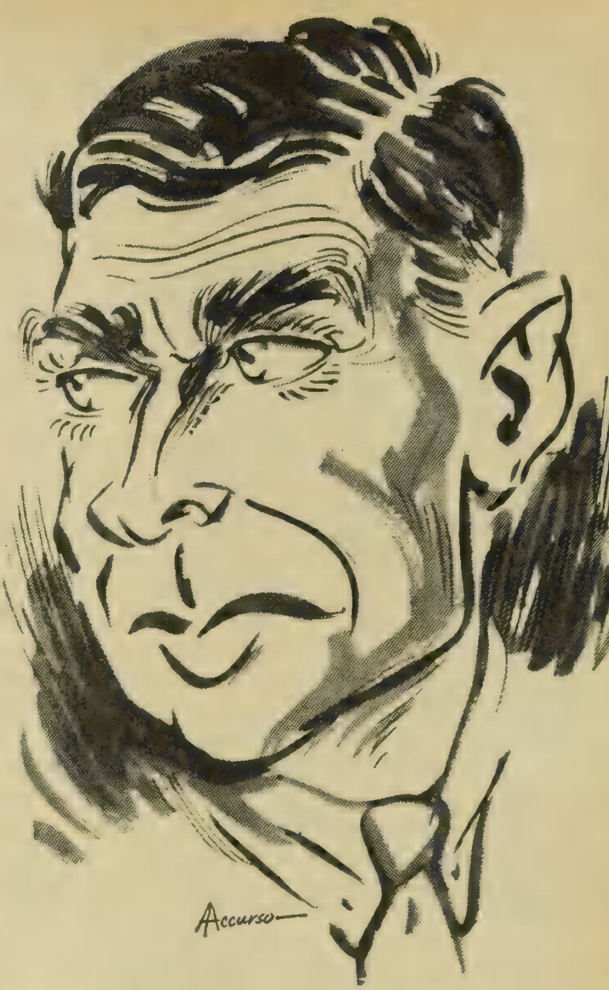
Although Hatfield was the first Oregon governor of modern times to win re-election, this does not mean his administration (1959-66) was especially sparkling. There was never a hint of scandal, but neither were there many heart-lifting activities. He cannot be blamed for that because Oregon is a difficult state in which to make an outstanding record. The governor has virtually no patronage to use in forcing his program, and there is little party discipline. The state's economic structure also inhibits creativity. Half the land is owned by the federal government; the other half is taken up by industries of the soil. The economy and life of Oregon revolve around one crop — lumber — and that tends to give the state's administrators a rather narrow vision. "When the timber industry is prosperous," Hatfield explains fatalistically, "we are all prosperous, and when the timber industry is in a slump, we are all in a slump."

Discontented with these strictures, Hatfield spent much of his time trying to recruit hardware industry for the state. His efforts yielded several electronics plants, and one notable bust. He leased 100,000 acres to Boeing on "steal" terms and the corporation talked big about building there in a style to rival its mammoth facilities in Washington, but so far nothing has been done.

Hatfield is mainly remembered as governor for two things. First, he taught the fat cats of Portland that a politician could get along without much help from them. After their unsuccessful spending spree in 1956 to elect McKay and defeat Morse, the big-money families of Portland grew stingy. This forced Hatfield, starting in 1958, to become the first major Oregon politician with a really broad-based campaign income. It also gave him unique independence. The second thing Hatfield is remembered for is a Herbert Hoover-like regard for economy (he has had several minor idols in his life, including James Farley and Wendell Willkie, but Hoover is his all-time hero). With Hatfield, economy often comes heavily veined with moralisms. Poor people should be helped, but they should work for their supper, and to this end his administration hired an ex-Scotland Yard man to see that there were no dead beats on the welfare rolls. Adult males who were judged eligible for welfare were put to work cleaning up state property. Likewise, sinners should not be allowed to repeat their sins, if they are costly. In 1960, Hatfield wrote the chairman of the Oregon Public Welfare Commission that one way to discourage abuse of the welfare programs would be to sterilize unwed mothers.

A number of Hatfield's political shifts seem to be traceable to his deep religiosity. When the state needed more money, he proposed heavy new taxes on cigarettes and beer. He was once so hearty a supporter of Gov. Nelson Rockefeller that he was sometimes called "Rockefeller's agent in the West." But after Rockefeller's divorce, many observers thought they detected in Hatfield a sudden and chilly distaste for his old ally.

This religious side is welcomed by Oregonians. Where there is an excuse for religion to be added to politics, they are as eager as Southerners to let it in so that they can then squabble over it. In 1960 there was a great deal of anti-Catholicism in the state, which went for Nixon by 50,000 votes. Some Catholics, without actually blaming Hatfield for Kennedy's defeat, claim that during the campaign Youth for Christ—an organization which Hatfield belonged to and has supported for years—sent out bales of tracts featuring Hatfield and Bible quotes which created an anti-Kennedy atmosphere. Mrs. Hatfield, daughter of a Yugoslav immigrant, has also offended Catholics. One Catholic, who participates in Democratic politics in that state, put it this way: "His wife is an apostate. She was raised in Madeline parish (Catholic) in Portland. She left the Church to marry Hatfield. Sometimes in their political campaigns she is asked if she isn't an apostate, and she says: 'I never really was a Catholic; I was a Greek Orthodox.' " He mocked her voice, then added —clearly to suggest that the change of faith was motivated by a desire to gain status as well as a husband: "They were married in Hinson Memorial Baptist Church in Portland, a fashionable church in a fashionable area."



Even in this, however, Hatfield has split the opposition. A Portland State University study of voting patterns in Oregon shows that many Catholic areas routinely give their support to him. Among Protestants and nonreligious voters he stirs other emotional opposites. Ever since Sgt. Bill Newell of the Oregon State Police, who then served as Hatfield's chauffeur, disclosed to the Christian Businessmen's Association of Portland that occasionally the Governor would have him stop the car so they could get out and join in prayer by the roadside, Hatfield has been subjected to some snickering campaigns. It is certainly true that in his private life Hatfield—who used to smoke a pipe constantly but quit, and used to accept social cocktails but now sticks to nonalcoholic punch—has been compulsively religious for about the past seventeen years. His library is heavy with books on theology; he is a regular Bible reader and quick to quote from it, sometimes going so far as to plop into his conversation an identification of which translation he is citing: "The First Letter to the Church at Corinth, fifth chapter and tenth verse (Weymouth translation), shows this very clearly."

Aside from membership in Youth for Christ and Campus Crusade, he has been a lay preacher and a moderator of the First Baptist Church in Salem, has spoken at the Easter sunrise service in the Pasadena Bowl, has addressed the President's prayer breakfast and numerous governors' prayer breakfasts. Small church colleges (Baptist, Free Methodist, various types of Presbyterian, Church of God, and Nazarene) have heaped honorary doctorates on him.

Many Oregonians admire this, of course, and those who don't have had a hard time making something out of it, for Hatfield has advocated the separation of church and state with a firmness that would not make Billy James Hargis happy (although in this, as in most things, Hatfield has something for both sides; he thinks the Supreme Court prayer ban wrong). "I have yet discovered nothing in the Scriptures," he told a church college forum not long ago, "that instructs us to Christianize institutions."

Some of the same people who smile at his insistent piety accuse him of being at the same time hardhearted. As an example they often recall his attitude toward capital punishment. Actually it is not clear just where he does stand on this. To a church college forum in March, 1963, he said that capital punishment is wrong because it is economically unjust—"the poor die and the rich get off." But eight months later, speaking to the American Medical Association, he said: "Time after time, people come to my office saying, 'oh, you should pardon this poor soul,' or 'you should commute this poor soul's sentence. It is really not his fault. It's society which is to blame.' These are well-meaning people, who are mistakenly saying they do not believe people should be responsible for their own actions, but that government or society should be, because they are too dependent."

Whether or not it is a political weakness may be debatable, but there are some grounds for saying that Hatfield is philosophically elusive. In his office there is a picture that will soothe the right wingers (an autographed photo of J. Edgar Hoover), but it is hung in a spot to please the left wingers (out of the way, behind an inner hallway door). But that's just nice political balance. By elusive, I mean that in looking back over his record I find that in 1960 he said: "We need to continue civilian supervision of the military to insure that the will of the people is best represented." By the next Presidential campaign time he was quoted in the Los Angeles Times as complaining: "It's popular these days to kick the military brass around. But there is a very real danger in the displacement of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and other military experts by the civilian members of the Defense Department and the Kennedy administration." Then, last year, when ultraconservatives tried to stick a resolution into the Oregon GOP platform calling for a transfer of all responsibility for Vietnam to the military, he opposed the move.

In a question-and-answer period with the Executives' Club of Chicago in April, 1964. Hatfield was asked how, if he were President, he would deal with Castro, and he answered modestly: "Well, the very easy answer for anyone, 3,000 miles away from Washington in a Statehouse like I am in, to answer that question, would be to say, let's get rid of Castro. Let's drive him out of Cuba. But I can't answer the question that way, because I do not have all the facts. I do not have all the data that the CIA has supposedly presented to the President. I don't have the facts and data as to our military capacity and posture at this moment, in terms of missiles, and in terms of ground forces, and what have you. So therefore, I do not feel I can answer the question."

By August of that year, however, he had either obtained a pipe line to CIA information or was ready to dispense with modesty because he was sharply critical of the administration for "vacillation," for failure to take all economic sanctions against Castro, and for not encouraging the spread of governments in exile which could direct raids against Cuba. Hatfield was unconcerned that some of these raids might be launched from U.S. soil.

Hatfield prides himself on his libertarian views, especially in defense of the right to dissent. When Gus Hall went to Oregon to speak to any college groups that would hear him, right wingers tried to pressure Hatfield into closing the doors of state schools to him. Hatfield refused to be spooked. But he was deeply offended ("disgraceful") by the anti-war pickets who turned out to greet Vice President Humphrey. Hatfield is pro-Negro; twice he refused to extradite Negro prisoners to Mississippi, and he consistently and skillfully fought for expansion of civil rights—most spectacularly at the 1963 Governors' Conference where, in league with Gov. Nelson Rockefeller, he forced the Democrats to abolish the resolutions committee, leaving much of its work still pending, rather than face him in a showdown over a rights resolution. Yet, somewhat like Justice Hugo Black, Hatfield draws back from the demands that would complete the endeavor, feeling that "in our efforts to establish particularly Negro rights and other minority rights we have moved into an era in which we have become so minority-oriented we've forgotten about the majority."

Hatfield has a long and proud record of fighting hate groups. As the keynote speaker at the 1964 GOP National Convention, he could not have been more out of tune with the dominant voices when he denounced "bigots in this nation who spew forth the venom of hate. They must be overcome, and this applies to the Ku Klux Klan, the John Birch Society, the Communist Party, and the hundreds of others like them." He got a closetful of mail from the Birchers about that. Hatfield was not anti-Goldwater in 1964, but he was clear and open about his fears that if the tough conservatives and hate vendors seized control, the party would languish for years. It was not a safe position for an ambitious young man to take that year, but he took it. Then in October, 1965, he did an extraordinary thing. Following the lead of Sen. Thruston Morton, who made a similar attack, Hatfield set out to discredit Group Research, Inc., of Washington. GRI, in large part supported by the Democratic National Committee and labor organizations, is not known to the general public but it is recognized by many Washington newsmen and Congressmen as one of the most effective opponents of right-wing hate groups. It is a clearinghouse for information about such groups. Ex-Sen. Maurine Neuberger, for example, waged most of her war against H. L. Hunt and Life Line with data obtained from GRI. For one who doesn't like hate groups, it was a strange attack for Hatfield to make; but if it was a mistake, it was one which he refused to correct.

So there are persuasive reasons for thinking it a little early to paint Senator Hatfield's political portrait. Yet on the most important issue of the moment, Vietnam, he has not equivocated in the slightest degree. Nor has there been any wavering in his push to establish what he calls "a world due process," a global legislative and adjudicative machinery with more authority and more status than the United Nations, though he does not belittle that as a beginning. "If I were President, my first move," he says, "would be to help reconstruct the United Nations' police organization. I would try to strengthen the hand of the Secretary General so that he could dispatch police forces. Eventually I would seek the admission of Red China to the United Nations, though it is not realistic to ask for that until the Vietnam quarrel is settled." As for the chances of getting this kind of program past Congress, Hatfield is under no illusion that it could be done soon, "but we must undertake the task at some point. It isn't an impossibility. There are a number of leaders who are willing to consider the idea. Dick Nixon, he sees it; he may not advocate it, but he comprehends the proposal. Perhaps only a small fraction of the nation's leadership would agree with me on these points right now, but all progress starts with a small fraction of the leadership." Even in his insistence that the UN be given a greater role in Vietnam he runs into strange opposition. When, at the 1965 Governors' Conference in Minneapolis, he proposed UN intervention, the sometimes liberal Washington Post asked in editorial horror: "How could any serious student of world affairs suppose that anything could be accomplished at this time by going to the U.N.?" The Post ridiculed Hatfield for expecting a "miracle."

Governors' conferences are such blotto affairs that Hatfield, simply by speaking his mind, consistently made headlines at them. At the Minneapolis conference two years ago he and Governor Romney were the only two to refuse to vote in favor of a resolution backing the escalation of military intervention in Vietnam, but Romney, after being closeted with Johnson, backed away from his previous opposition. Hatfield stayed firm.

At the National Governors' Conference last year, Hatfield was the only one to vote against giving Johnson carte blanche support in Southeast Asia. "After I took that position," Hatfield recalls, "governor after governor came up to me privately and praised me and said they would have liked to vote as I did but felt that they couldn't. I would just say 'oh,' and stare at them. I wouldn't thank them. If you believe something, you should stand by it. If the heat's on, it makes loyalty to a position all the more important."

Hatfield's enemies predicted that as soon as he got to Washington he would modify his opposition to the war, as Senator Brooke of Massachusetts has done. Instead, Hatfield has increased his opposition. Howard Morgan, the former Federal Power Commissioner who ran as the Democratic peace candidate in the 1966 primaries, and does not like Hatfield but dislikes the Vietnamese conflict more, wrote a letter to a Portland newspaper several weeks ago acknowledging that he had been one who thought Hatfield would never persist as a peacenik, but that he now wanted to admit publicly that he had been wrong.

Hatfield had hardly hit Washington before he was on national television, urging that the United States gradually withdraw its troops from Vietnam and turn the fighting over to Asian troops. Within two months he was also Washington's major new voice, calling for a completely volunteer "citizens' army" to replace the draft, not only because "conscription is involuntary servitude," as he told the American Society of Newspaper Editors, but also because conscription is too expensive, inefficient and unsafe in terms of national security.

Last month, when the draft was under debate in the Senate, he fought its status quo extension even more savagely than did the old draft opponents, Ernest Gruening, Stephen Young and Wayne Morse. Among his several darts was an amendment that would have written into law a description of the draft as a "total governmental invasion of the liberties of America's young men." It lost, of course.

It may be that Hatfield's plasticity on some issues comes from the fact that he is one of those persons who must be personally familiar with the reality on which he bases his conclusions, if he is to hold to them firmly. For instance, Oregon is a well-fed state, roped together at the bottom rung by a fairly decent welfare system. There is little hunger there, and Hatfield apparently thinks the rest of the nation is as fortunate because he can make a speech about feeding the hungry (as he did to the National Canners Association in May) without once alluding to the fact that there is hunger in this country. He talked a lot about feeding the world's hungry. Similarly, Oregon has almost no Negro population, and Hatfield has no knowledge of urban ghettos; therefore he quickly loses patience with racial demonstrations.

But when it comes to war, it is another matter. He has experienced it, and it left a pacifying mark on him. When he complains that "terroristic or indiscriminate bombing" of Vietnam "must involve deaths of noncombatant men, women and children, and merits the general condemnation of humanity, for it cannot be justified as an instrument for the fulfillment of U.S. foreign policy," he is speaking from the memory of a visit to another place. ("I was at Hiroshima shortly after the bombing and it left a deep impression.") When he talks of trying to beat communism in Vietnam by feeding it to death, rather than trying to bomb it out of existence, again he speaks from what he has seen.

Hatfield was commander of a wave of the amphibious attack craft at both Iwo Jima and Okinawa. He was preparing for the invasion of Japan when the war ended. Then he was ordered to Haiphong, North Vietnam's best-known harbor, to pick up Chiang Kai-shek's troops who had come overland to the port, and to convoy them to areas of northern China where they could fight the Communist Chinese. He recalls:

> When we moved into the daylight, the dawn hours, when we were coming into the harbor of Haiphong we could see the reflection of the beautiful polished tile of that very impressive Monte Carlo of Southeast Asia that was on top of a hill overlooking the port. This was the great place for French recreation, of all the Western people's recreation in the old days of colonialism.

And yet around that same hill were the little huts of the people of Vietnam who lived in squalor and poverty. And the contrast of the wealth and the foolish use of that wealth of the Western colonists on top of that hill and the abject poverty of the people living about it was a contrast I shall never forget. . . .

I remember along the road going into town the bodies, dead bodies alongside the road, not dead because of war or bullets but dead because of starvation. I can't forget that. And I can't forget my feeling that food—food—would be our weapon, not military might alone. But how we missed it, how we miscalculated, how we became so involved in political power structures and political manipulation between the French and the Vietnamese that today we are reaping that error of not having addressed ourselves to the needs of the people, but rather to support 80 per cent of the French attempt to retake a colony in this century!

Hatfield is obviously a man to cause trouble. And the more he gets around in the nation and the world, the more he enriches his philosophy from broader personal experiences, the more trouble for this Administration he can be expected to cause.

PUERTO RICO

Commonwealth, State or Nation?

GUY T. NUNN

Mr. Nunn is professor of industrial sociology at the University of Puerto Rico.

San Juan

On July 23, Puerto Rican voters will speak on the tight little island's (population density possibly the world's highest) most tortured question: status. Record registration for the plebiscite, despite recommended boycott by both the Republican Statehood and Independence Parties, would seem to presage a landslide victory for continuation of the present Commonwealth, or Free Associated Statehood status, vigorously supported by the majority Popular Democratic Party, which is still led by its creator, former Governor and currently Senator Luis Muñoz Marín.

Here as elsewhere, however, political appearances may conceivably deceive. Muñoz and the PDP are obviously worried. One index of their concern is their belated attempt to make the plebiscite an issue of loyalty, insisting that no good PDP member can vote other than for continuation of the Free Associated State. This contradicts two decades of PDP assertion, in normal elections, that Puerto Ricans favoring either statehood or independence could vote PDP without doing violence to their eventual status hopes.

All crystal balls are befogged by the fact that the Republican Statehood Party's convention majority voted months back to boycott the plebiscite, claiming to see in it a "trap" which would destroy the party. This action, ironically, promises to increase, rather than diminish, the pro-statehood vote on July 23. Refusing to accept the majority decision to abstain, Luis A. Ferré, the party's thrice-beaten candidate for the governorship against Muñoz (and the island's richest industrialist), promptly organized a rump group, Statehooders United, and put it on the ballot.

Ferré, although almost totally lacking in Muñoz's popular appeal, is nevertheless an attractive figure. He has energy, intelligence and dedication. He also has money and an enterprising organization of young people which has saturated the island with statehood propaganda and generated by far the largest and most enthusiastic public meetings of the campaign. By breaking away from his own party, he has stumbled into an attractive double-underdog posture. In the present context, moreover, statehood comes before the voters relatively free of the Republican Statehood Party's old and (to most Puerto Ricans) unpalatable association with the mainland GOP.

The "ideal" of statehood, Ferré insists, must be kept alive through participation in the plebiscite, whatever its outcome. Should this one be lost, other plebiscites will follow. But this one need not be lost. The PDP's big majorities of the past have been largely irrelevant to the statehood issue, and scores of thousands of PDP supporters can finally vote their consciences.

There are many signs that Ferré's intuition is well grounded. Even the leadership of the PDP is known to contain a number of statehood advocates (just as it contains elements emotionally committed to the opposite pole of independence). Urbanization, which is rapidly liquidating the jíbaro (or rural) class which thrust Muñoz into power originally, is a possibly powerful sociological ally of statehood. So too, presumably, is the extreme youth of the island population. To many new voters, Muñoz is history, the mystique of hispanidad an outmoded conception, and Free Associated Statehood intrinsically demeaning. This attitude shows itself sharply, and perhaps surprisingly, among servicemen and veterans. Far from feeling abused by a "colonial" authority which has conscripted them without representation, Puerto Rican servicemen seem to derive both pride and status from their role. Anti-draft demonstrations have, by mainland standards, been infrequent, skimpy and of low voltage—this, perhaps, because they have in the main been sponsored by independista or nacionalista splinter groups tarred with the presumption of Castro sympathy or support. Young people, in any event, appear measurably readier to accept the implications of outright statehood than their elders.

But a possibly larger "sleeper" factor in the coming plebiscite than all of the foregoing is the PDP's long tenure in office. Although astonishingly scandal-free, sensitive to emerging social needs, and responsible for an uninterruptedly rising island standard of living, the governing party shows unmistakable signs of political arteriosclerosis. Muñoz, though officially retired from party office, has never, in fact, ceased to govern. He has been repeatedly called upon to mediate factional crises which the party's internal machinery has been incapable of resolving without him.

Beneath the dazzling feats of Fomento (Public Works) in giving the island the beginnings of an industrial base, and maintaining a productivity growth well ahead of the mainland average, lie unreduced social reefs of monstrous dimensions: persisting unemployment (officially put at 14 per cent, but actually closer to 30 per cent if concealed unemployment among housewives and young people out of work and out of school are counted), an urban slum growth dishearteningly close to the pace of rehousing, a desperate educational deficit at every level, a collapsing sugar industry, rising delinquency and addiction rates, and other problems. The PDP has attacked them, for the most part, with resourcefulness and humane candor, but with grievously limited resources. There is nothing about statehood which in any way promises speedy improvement in these areas, but neither is there anything about voters which guarantees that they will give rational expression to discontent.

Already nearing 70, Muñoz had been called down from his emeritus Olympus to grub through the villages and dusty pueblecitos in search of votes for a "permanent" Free Associated State which he himself, for upward of two decades, has pictured as nothing more than a tactical bridge to eventual outright independence.

Walt Dehner: Fortune

Whether because of age, failing health, or distaste at having to argue (in betrayal of his youth) the inevitability of permanent dependence on the United States—or a combination of all three—the old Muñoz incandescence and almost visceral communion with his audience are gone. He argues well but without color or vigor. Against independence he urges the unthinkability of severing U.S. ties; against statehood, its sheer economic unviability. Statehood is the major "enemy," and his case against it, while crammed with common-sense economics, is passionless. More, it fails to offer any ultimate reason for statehood's unacceptability. Puerto Rico, he argues, simply cannot "afford" statehood. The island's hope of eventual parity with the world's industrially mature economies (Puerto Rican per capita income lags well behind that of Mississippi, although life expectancy is thought to be a faint fraction higher than that of the United States as a whole) rests upon its continuing ability to offer a tax haven to mainland investors, along with unhindered access to the U.S. consumer market. Only Commonwealth can preserve the present freedom from U.S. corporation profits taxes. Outright statehood would rob Puerto Rico of a tool crucial to the shaping of its own economic destiny, blighting the golden culmination of Operation Bootstrap. It would mean an automatic and disastrous reduction in island standards of living. Muñoz dares his opposition to declare its readiness to pay this price.

Theoretically unassailable though his logic is (especially over the short term), it is hardly a clarion call to national pride. Nor does its power seem likely to ignite a pro-Commonwealth vote of a size to sweep the status question permanently off the political agenda, as Muñoz and the PDP had obviously anticipated when the decision was made to hold a plebiscite in the more or less immediate wake of the Status Commission Report.

That report gave equal comfort to the three status alternatives, holding each to be equally "honorable" and workable as eventualities. Commonwealth, or Free Associated Statehood, was obliquely favored only to the extent that both statehood and independence were found to be economically sustainable only fifteen or twenty years down the future. Since no one seriously quarrels with that reservation, the plebiscite takes place in a context of non-immediacy so far as its practical consequences are concerned. It will be the expression of a sentiment, without fixed or visible consequences. Its only practical effect will be the creation of study commissions to investigate the eventual implementation of whatever sentiment is expressed in the plebiscite. This process alone could reasonably consume several years (and probably create the need for further plebiscites on the specific product of such investigation), and the U.S. Congress, torpid of reflex at best, might easily take several years more to accept the result, with its many complications, should either statehood or independence win.

All this, of course, is obvious to Puerto Rican voters, and it reduces the plebiscite to an expression of theoretical "druthers," without the bite of instant necessity for living with the consequences. And it is precisely this "dream" quality which makes predicting the plebiscite outcome so hazardous.

Although a vote without clear and predictable consequences might logically be thought likely to favor a strong pro-independence expression, few observers are willing to predict an independence vote of more than 2 or 3 per cent. Once a powerful, if subterranean, current even in the PDP leadership, it is now reduced to a handful of small, programless clusters of intellectuals whose leadership denounces participation in the plebiscite "fraud," with occasional vague threats of violence if the "fraud" is consummated. Independence is on the ballot only because of unauthorized self-starter Independistas. The recent history of Cuba, the travail of the Dominican Republic, the depth of American cultural penetration, the benign paternalism of U.S. economic colonialism, the presumably permanent presence on the mainland of nearly a million Puerto Ricans—all these and more may be relevant factors; but in any case the fires of nationalism on the island seem to have been banked down to a flameless smolder.

But Ferré and his United Statehooders remain an imponderable and serious threat to Muñoz's determination to drive the status question permanently underground. If statehood should manage to show significantly more than the roughly 28 per cent of the vote which the Republican Statehood Party scored in the last election, then the status question must be conceded to be more alive than dead, and the PDP's insistence on an early plebiscite judged a strategic blunder. And if the pro-statehood vote should run as high as 40 per cent (as many believe possible), the probability is that the island will be thrown into a continuing status crisis, more insistent, more real, than the mere nagging backache which the plebiscite was initially intended to cure. Seeking prematurely to bury a nuisance, Muñoz may have unearthed a monster.

RESPONSIBILITIES OF NATIONAL GREATNESS

KENNETH BURKE

Critic, teacher and poet, Kenneth Burke is the author, among many books, of A Grammar of Motives, A Rhetoric of Motives (Peter Smith), Book of Moments (Hermes Publications) and Language as Symbolic Action (University of California Press).

There is a critical difference between the powerful performance of an automobile and the effort of its driver. Runners or cyclists can increase their speed only by a corresponding increase of their exertions; but without any added effort whatever, by merely pressing a slight bit more on the gas pedal, the driver of a car can accelerate his automotive monster, even to the extent where it can take over, and race or rage beyond his control. This easy opportunity for a vast mechanical transmogrifying of our comparatively feeble physical powers can lure us into drastically irresponsible assertiveness.

However, as impressive and extensive and hazardous as the automotive empire is (I take it that one is speaking not metaphorically but literally, when one looks upon the overall resources of travel by car as a kind of empire), it is but an example of man's relationship to all the great advances in the development of technological power, the tremendous expansion in the powers of physical motion.

Everywhere we look, we confront the same fate-ridden disproportion between what I would distinguish as the realms of action and motion. That is: in our nature as persons, we act. Our machines, not being persons, can't act; they can but move, or be moved. But their sheer motions vastly magnify our powers of action. And by the same token, they impose upon us correspondingly vast new areas of sufferance. In their power is our pride—and, as always, in man's pride there lurks his greatest danger. If classic tragedy can teach us anything, it should teach us that. Nor must we be on guard only against those machines which provide motion on command from our physical actions. The dangers of a related yet quite different kind of personal aggrandizement beset us, by reason of our good fortune as citizens identified with a nation of almost terrifyingly vast and expansive political and economic power.

Note my expression, "our good fortune as citizens identified with" our nation. That term, "identified with," brings into focus a more "spiritual" kind of aggrandizement. This aggrandizement centers in the nature of "identification," the kind of corporate identity the individual citizen possesses by reason of his personal identification with the collective might summed up in our present national greatness.

We know of many empires that rose and fell. We know of none that rose and didn't fall. Hitler, at the height of his arrogance, promised his followers, who obeyed him as automatically as conditioned cattle, that his dismal outfit would last a thousand years. That dream was soon over. I don't have the least idea how permanent our setup is likely to be, though it is a fact known to us all that a considerable number of our most characteristic contrivances have to be junked strikingly soon after we buy them.

Meanwhile, we may profit by meditating on our personal modes of identification with the great empire of which we all are citizens. And regardless of how long our hegemony may prevail, we can now say for sure that the rulers of no other country on earth can come even remotely so near to imposing their will upon all nations as can those elected authorities of ours who decide upon U.S. policies abroad.

The mention of such concepts as “collective might” and “hegemony” brings up the possibility of a misunderstanding; my title, “Responsibilities of National Greatness,” may suggest to the reader a likelihood that I intend to deal with the problem of our country’s foreign policy. But though I have personal opinions on such matters, I do not have the equipment to substantiate them as thoroughly as an essay on the subject would demand. Rather, my focus upon “identification” is a terministic matter, about which I am entitled to speak, if not by my competence at least by the great amount of attention and number of years I have devoted to it. And the kind of “responsibilities” I shall deal with will concentrate not upon our country’s obligations to other countries but with a single citizen’s obligations to his country. More narrowly still, I shall treat not even of a citizen’s obligations in their totality, but only of the need to pause occasionally and ponder the bepuzzlements of “identification” as they affect our sense of citizenship. My only claim is that, by peering into this term “identification” somewhat persistently, we find that it reveals notable risks and dangers, which must be recognized if democracy is to function at its best. Indeed, what with the heightened responsibilities placed upon us by the genius of our technology, I might also have entitled this paper, “Concepts of Identification Needed To Make Democracy Work.”

In the religious frame of reference, man acquired categorical dignity by identification with some transcendent principle—as in the Old Testament relationship between man and God, and the New Testament relationship involving an identification with Christ as intermediary between man and God. With the rise of nationalism, there gradually arose a more secular kind of categorical dignity, defined by identification with one political power or another. Machiavelli’s The Prince is a notable book along the way. For though it reflected the breaking of “universal” (that is “catholic”) identification into political factionalism, its incipiently nationalistic nature was partially concealed by its concern with purely personal rule (a kind of rule that could not become wholly nationalistic until some one feudal ruler had triumphed over many rivals and established centralization of authority). At the time of the Renaissance, Machiavelli was usually thought of as a kind of devil. For whereas, according to the universal notion of religious motives current at the time, a man’s private virtues would be the traits of character which, if cultivated in each individual, would be most beneficial to mankind as a whole, Machiavelli was concerned with a kind of conspiratorial virtue whereby even the personal vices of a ruler might be of benefit to his empire as a whole.

It wasn’t until Hegel, with his glorification of the Prussian state, that such factional kind of identification became wholly sanctioned. Many related developments could be considered here. For instance, the concept of national identity was capable of two quite different uses. One might hold to what I would call the “Picture Gallery” theory of culture, whereby each national integer could be appreciated in and for itself, without reference to other such integers. But obviously any such situation set up the conditions for an invidious emphasis whereby a cultural difference could be interpreted rather as a cultural superiority.

Ordinarily, such identifications involve simple cases of self-love whereby one admires oneself roundabout by identifying oneself with some group which one praises, whereupon one’s own shares in the assets of the corporation appreciate proportionately. Implied identification can figure as a kind of unavowed statement of policy or attitude. For instance, to quote from an early review of mine, in The Philosophy of Literary Form (the quotation, in which I change one word to avoid too much explaining, will make it clear that the passage, on the subject of identification, was written before the outbreak of World War II):

> One could even imagine the emergence of a particular aesthetic school, in which not one single thought or image was “subversive” on its face, yet functioned as a challenge. Nazis in Poland, for instance, wear white sox, harmless enough in themselves, yet significant enough as a challenge to enrage a Polish patriot—and so there may be subtler aspects of a style, functioning like the white sox in Poland, even stylistic ways of wearing anti-white sox in Hitler’s Germany. So with “travel literature” like that of Tacitus, who wrote under conditions of dictatorship, and attacked the local political situation by an ambiguous device, in presenting an idealization of Germany that implied a criticism of > Rome (the point is taken from Jacques Barzun's interesting book on Race Theories, which also notes some irony in the fact that Tacitus, for progressive purposes, here gave the first form to the doctrines of "Nordic" superiority that were subsequently to serve the ends of reactionaries).

As to what our sins of identification (if any) may or may not be, we are necessarily uncertain. But at least, looking back upon the group madness that seized a great nation (the nation of Lessing, of Goethe, of Kant, of Schopenhauer, of Heine, of Thomas Mann, of Einstein, of the marvelous musicians, I could go on and on), we can clearly see that such a madness somehow got imposed upon the citizens of that exceptionally great nation, until the citizens, as in the frenzy of a lynch mob, identified themselves with a shrewd madman who had in turn identified himself with them, even to the extent that when contemplating suicide at the thought of his defeat, he was minded to risk taking his whole nation down to defeat with him. And, so crazy are the tricks of identification, we hear of self-styled "patriots" in Germany today, who would live that lie all over again, and only recently have elected candidates to such an end.

Since identifications also involve anti-identifications, those neo-Nazis would even blame this political relapse upon us. For it is true that we are pressing West Germany to buy our ammunition. If West Germany does not do so, its citizens can pay less taxes. And if their citizens pay less taxes, they can sell their goods abroad more cheaply. And where would that leave us, as prospective competitors in those same foreign markets, when we are taxing ourselves like fury in the cause of armaments? (Once again, I am not here asking us to consider the rightness or wrongness of such expenditures. I am merely trying to indicate how such processes bear upon the nature of our problem, as citizens who are necessarily, and properly, identified with the policies of our nation.)

At the very least, educators might, as I have been doing, point out the risks of identification where clearly manifested in errors committed by citizens of countries other than our own. The contemplation of such distresses might have a certain admonitory value. For high among the uses of history is its ability to teach by the patient study of past fumblings, and thereby to help transform the record of mankind's tragic errors into sources of understanding. And after all, if you want to learn by the study of mankind's mistakes, you must concede that you have a marvelously fertile field to work with.

What, then, is the range of relevancies that a close look at the term "identification" reveals? The first instance concerns not how we relate ourselves to our society but rather how we employ symbols to relate aspects of that society to one another. It seems to me obvious and inevitable that a highly developed technological economy such as ours must be rationalized by some sort of monetary medium to coordinate the almost infinite details of our country's production and distribution. However, this very function that finance performs in the allocating of our resources can lead to a quite faulty mode of identification.

Several years ago, we may recall, a quite destructive hurricane tore its way through New England. And some years before that, there had been the big Market Crash of 1929. Shortly after the hurricane, a writer in the financial columns of a New York newspaper pointed out that, whereas losses in the hurricane were extensive, they were minor as compared with those suffered in the Market Crash. Note here a failure to distinguish between material destruction and purely symbolic losses. Yet consider how vast the difference was, though both kinds showed on the books as a radical drop in the "value" of certain people's holdings.

After the hurricane, the countryside was in ruins. To this day, in my area, which was on the outward fringes of the storm, you can still find evidence of that disaster. Yet no matter how deep the plunge of the stock market, the material plant represented by those depreciated shares remained exactly as it had been. Not a single locomotive had been lost, not a single bridge had collapsed, not one tree was down. Materially, there had been no damage at all, except for an occasional speculator who, on seeing his stocks drop as though they had been bricks thrown out the window, threw himself out after them. Thus, to identify the Market Crash with the results of the hurricane would be like making no distinction between the actual destruction of a house and the destruction of a document attesting that so-and-so is the owner of that house.

How might that particular misuse of monetary identification serve an admonitory purpose, as regards our current predicaments? Having spent the most urgent years of my life on the study of symbolism, and having often been accused of wanting to turn the world into nothing but symbol systems, I would point out, on the contrary: My studies in the nature of symbols (or "symbolic action") have led me all the more strongly to realize the inexorable difference between the symbolic and nonsymbolic realms. Hence, I grow particularly disturbed at what seems to me a new, and much more dangerous, situation involving this same error of identification, this same failure to distinguish clearly enough between things and symbols.

In recent years we have heard much talk about the "gross national product," which is defined in terms of money. When our sum of economic operations is thus identified, it looks quite reasonable to conclude: Since these transactions amount to hundreds of billions of dollars, what's a mere $10 billion spent for improving the condition of the poor? Approached thus, in terms of sheerly monetary identification, the solution of the problem seems quite simple, involving little more than a small tax easily borne.

However, if you identify this problem in terms not of money but of materials, the conclusions are drastically different. For, as regards sheer materials, a merely symbolic allocation of $10 billion for such social services involves a corresponding allocation of goods and manpower. It means, for instance, that the resources employed for construction, medical aid, transportation and the like, in connection with our military activities abroad, simply cannot at the same time be employed for improvements at home. When the issue is approached in terms of monetary identification, the extent of the gross national product may seem able to allow for both. But when the same problem is considered in terms of material resources and manpower, one realizes that the monetary mode of identification in this case is misleading.

Perhaps I should pause to make clear that whether you favor putting our treasure over there or keeping it here, within this problem there lurks this tricky shifting of identification. My present thesis is simply that among our responsibilities as citizens in a democracy whose economic functions are rationalized in monetary terms, is the obligation to admonish ourselves against a "natural" tendency to use monetary or symbolic modes of identification, even in cases where more specifically materialistic terms might be called for.

But whereas an identification problem of that sort involves us primarily in an intellectual confusion, a more directly emotional kind of responsibility arises from the nature of political representation in a democracy. I refer to the fact that the interests of a nation are not necessarily identical with the interests of a party in power. Obviously, any party will use all the rhetorical and administrative resources at its command to make such identification seem absolute. This is a natural and wholly understandable aim of any political faction, be it in power or out of power.

But surely among the major virtues of a democracy such as ours is the fact that we are not constitutionally required to accept any administrative policy without question, regardless of the exigencies that may beset us. Insofar as a policy can be changed by orderly procedures of government, there is nothing treasonous in debating the advisability of changes. There is nothing in the United States Constitution that outlaws the swapping of horses in the middle of a stream. If the citizens want war when an administration wants peace, or if the citizens want peace when an administration wants war, it is their duty to peer beyond the kinds of persuasion and self-persuasion (in brief, the kinds of identification) that make administrative policy and national policy seem identical.

However, the problems of identification become more complicated in cases of this sort insofar as a national administration makes alliances with foreign governments or factions, or even is itself responsible for their holding office, as is apparently the case with Premier Ky. For though a decision to withdraw our fighting forces from Vietnam would certainly not involve "letting our boys down," so far as sparing them the horrors of war is concerned, there would be the further problem involved in the fact that we are now identified with Premier Ky and those of his cabinet who have not yet resigned. This situation is particularly awkward since the faction with which we are there identified is itself hard to identify with democracy. And so, alas! there is a tangle of identifications atop identifications atop identifications, some of them clearer than others—but let's hurry on!

All told, as regards such identifications, there would seem to be a complex of this sort:

First, there is a supranational kind of identity that comes to a focus in relation to one's religious or ethical convictions. We might call it in general "the realm of conscience." Below this comes national identification which, owing to our party system of government, is not directly equatable with any incumbent administration.

I had thought of putting vocational affiliations next in line beneath national identification. But unfortunately many of our vocational efforts become identified with the ethics of workmanship, and there are respects in which it would be hard to uphold such a scale, since many aspects of vocation involve matters of conscience.

Such thoughts, regrettably, require us to turn aside and introduce a contrary companion term to "identification." It usually goes by the name of "autonomy." By "autonomy" in this connection we would mean an exclusive reference to the principles intrinsic to any specialized pursuit. For instance, a man may say: "I am a biologist, a physicist, a chemist. I consider it my job to be as competent a biologist, or physicist, or chemist as I can be. This is an autonomous activity, having its own laws and methods. Let me go about my business. And it is not my business to dabble in matters of politics, and the like."

If only the lines really could be drawn there, there'd be no problem. But here enters that damned word "identification" again. And looking at any man's same autonomous pursuit as judged in terms of "identification," we'd be prodded to ask ourselves: "But with what other transactions is this autonomous specialist identified, whether he wants to be or not?" Adapting a tender-minded ancient parable to a present tough-minded purpose, and noting that any specialized or autonomous activity fits into some larger unit of action, we might sum up the relationship between autonomy and identification thus: "The shepherd, qua shepherd, acts for the good of the sheep, to protect them from discomfiture and harm. But he may be 'identified' with a project that is raising sheep for market." (I am quoting slavishly from my Rhetoric of Motives.)

As regards the "conscientious" kinds of identification, we should further note that they involve family relationships, relations to neighborhood projects, to schools, to lodges, and so on (all variously impinging somewhat upon vocational, factional, national and supranational identifications). There can be happy times when all those kinds of identification are working together, when the party in power is helping our nation do the things we can be most zestfully proud of, and when all other countries throughout the world are joining us and praising us, and when this spirit of good will filters down to our relations with one another, in all our minor identifications.

That's conceivable, is it not: There is sometimes a temptation among some of us to feel that a dominion could be as great as ours only by maximum reliance upon the powers to threaten. Maybe they're right. If so, may there be a God, and may God have mercy on us all. For if it's to be by threat, I fear there are much meaner times ahead. Yet everywhere I go in this country, I find, along with the squabbles that we all get into, a constant background of good fellowship.

True, there are the mean places. Each day the news assiduously hunts them out, that we newsmongers may variously identify ourselves with some persons in those selected areas of victimage. But there is also the humanity of our people, the fountain of good will that keeps welling up anew. And with this we would be identified, with this we must be identified, for otherwise the supersonic this or that, the moon shots, the great new realms of knowledge, the sheer genius of all such accomplishments, the whole thing becomes a damned lie, a crime against the Creator, for so much of it involves the raping and polluting of nature, not by deliberate intent but by pragmatic urgencies with which we happen to become identified, as we must, if only to go on living under the conditions which our own contrivances have imposed upon us.

One particularly dangerous form of identification is that whereby a man may personally be quite compliant, yet feels that his nation should be in every way unbending. Or, while he is himself the soul of unpretentiousness, he can think of his nation only in the spirit of the old German challenge, Deutschland über alles. And sometimes I wonder whether the largely anarchic relationship that prevails among all nations in the world today is having an influence upon tendencies toward juvenile delinquency, insofar as young people take the norms of national sovereignty as models with which to identify their personal conduct.

One notable device involves identification by antithesis, sometimes with paradoxical results. For instance, our Constitution was framed with feudal monarchy as the enemy. Yet by its very nature it removed this enemy; hence the very government itself took over this antithetic role, and laws formally intended to protect the individual against the Crown came to function as devices for weakening the various States' rights to control excesses of businessmen. Also, identification by antithesis is greatly responsible for much political oratory. A candidate would have considerable difficulty explaining to the voters exactly how his proposed policies would work. But if he says, "they are against the policies of so-and-so," that statement somehow makes things seem clear. Doubtless this prime resource of identification by antithesis is also influential in bringing it about that so many citizens vote not for someone but against someone else.

There is also what we might call "negative identification" or "lack of identification." Its manifestations range from unconcern for the sufferings of experimental animals to unconcern for the sufferings of the enemy in war. It ties in with the "autonomous" motive, in the sense that a bombardier might cause much havoc, not through any great feeling of aggression on his part but out of sheer obedience, in doing what he's told to do, and as thoroughly as he is able. Also, of course, such "lack of identification" is matched by heightened identification with those on one's own side, whose safety or rescue may depend upon the skill with which the technically unfeeling operation is carried out.

Such "lack of identification" can have regrettable results, but it is wholly devoid of emotional cruelty. However, it can become transformed into morbid gratification. Thus, I will never forget a story in a German magazine I read near the start of the First World War, before the British prohibited the exchange of mail between Germany and the United States. It had to do with a part of the front that for some time had been quiet, and the men on both sides of the line had built up undefined rules of distant camaraderie. They did not actually fraternize, but they came to accept it that neither side was aiming to kill men on the other side. The protagonist in the story got to know exactly when a particular enemy soldier would be exposed to gunfire. He bided his time, and one day shot this enemy dead. It was an unforgettable story. For of a sudden this kind of killing took on a quite different meaning from the professional killing that would have been in order had the troops been commanded to advance. Here some morbidly different motive had entered, a motive not unlike that of the various arbitrary killings we have been reading about recently (for instance, the boy in the tower at the University of Texas, who picked off victims at random).

But surely first prize for the vagaries and vaguenesses of identification must go to that tiny first-person plural pronoun, "we." Until a few years ago, when the Dodgers won a ball game, all Brooklyn proudly proclaimed that "we" had won. Now this purely private company is in Los Angeles, operating on a quite different identification. Or "we" as a nation advance funds to foreign countries from which "we" as private corporations receive this money back in payment for exports. By this ambiguity of identification, as a nation we become "idealists" while some of our nationals are involved in transactions that are, to say the least, quite realistic. Or whenever "we" fight a war, the range of identifications under the one head extends from men in combat to gamblers in war stocks. Yes, the marvels and mysteries of identification come to an ultimate focus in that scarcely noticeable, workaday pronoun, "we."

LETTER FROM LONDON

THE CATHOLIC CRISIS

RAYMOND WILLIAMS

The continuing crisis within the Catholic Church in Britain has been interesting to many people who, like myself, are not directly or personally involved. Some part of this interest can be attributed to ordinary curiosity about a row in any public organization, and especially in one that had seemed to the casual observer more or less monolithic. Indeed, some English liberals are still so suspicious of organized religion, and of the Catholic Church in particular, that while enjoying the row they miss its point: any sensible man, they both assume and conclude, would be bound in the end either to leave the Church or be kicked out. In this sense, the Catholic crisis is seen as similar to previous crises in the Communist Party: the "good men" eventually get out or are thrown out, and return to a point along the English liberal spectrum. I am neither a Christian nor a Communist, but I believe the crises within each kind of organization are of general significance: flash points within the long crisis of belief in advanced capitalist societies.

Two incidents in the Catholic crisis have been widely reported. Charles Davis, the leading English Catholic theologian, left the Church. Herbert McCabe was deposed as editor of the English Dominican magazine New Blackfriars. The incidents were related in that the editorial specifically cited against McCabe was a reaction to Davis' decision. Taking up a previous argument in New Blackfriars, McCabe admitted that the Church was quite plainly corrupt, but went on to argue that one should not therefore leave it; rather stay and work for change. The public argument then became confused, including such incidents as McCabe's attending Davis' wedding, and a still unresolved dispute about the future editorship of the magazine. In this climate, an incident in which a Cambridge chaplain interrupted an archbishop and stopped the meeting he was addressing, attracted wide attention. There was and still is a danger of reducing the whole argument to casual personal rows.

I see it differently—mainly because I know, in Cambridge, the young radical Catholics who started the magazine Slant, and especially Terry Eagleton and Adrian Cunningham who wrote the recent Slant manifesto, and who were among the main contributors to the recent New Left May Day Manifesto. I had been having my own argument with some of the Slant contributors; ironically, I had written a somewhat critical review in New Blackfriars at Herbert McCabe's invitation. My principal argument was that I saw a danger that among radical Catholics the New Left position would be reduced to the status of an argument within the Church, when it was really an argument about the whole society and (for Catholics) about the Church's relation to this. It is still the emphasis I would want to put. Internal rows in the Church, like internal rows in the Labour or Communist Parties, are of interest finally for their general confrontation of values, as part of the social and moral experience of the major crisis now occurring both within capitalist societies and within socialism. This, I believe, is how the young men around Slant also see the situation, though naturally enough, as members of the Church, they follow the internal crisis with special attention.

Their view, I think, would be that the Davis and McCabe incidents dramatized what is only the most obvious tension: between a cautious and conservative Church hierarchy, dragging its feet over implementing recent Vatican Council reforms, and an articulate and progressive section of the laity, concerned with freedom of speech and of conscience, and in general with a kind of modernization. The English bishops lag notably behind other European bishops in this kind of progressive thinking. Only two seem really to accept recent council decisions; the rest concentrate on reassuring what they see as a bewildered laity. But the Vatican Council gave the growing English Catholic middle class a new confidence and sense of purpose: a newly orthodox, progressive position on liturgical reform, lay participation, a more liberal moral theology, less authoritarianism, and so on. From the Slant point of view, however, this stopped far short of what was necessary. To them, the renewal that mattered was the connection of Christian action and organization with radical politics. The Church's primary job, they insisted, was not to reform and adapt itself to a more liberal and permissive climate but to change itself so that it could be the bearer of Christianity's primary message and mission of social revolution. In the Davis and McCabe incidents, as Slant sees them, this deeper crisis and the more obvious "modernizing" tension became confused.

Thus Davis' withdrawal from the Church was ambivalent to these young Catholic radicals. It was an effective indictment of the present state of the Church that it lost its best theologian. But they saw the Davis withdrawal as "liberal" rather than "radical": that is, he was setting up personal values against the Church as an institution, rather than stressing, with the Vatican Council, the necessary social structure of Christian belief, through which it could offer effective social and political change. When McCabe referred to the Church as corrupt, it was not primarily because it was an authoritarian and bureaucratic body, from which a liberal must withdraw in despair; but mainly because it was not effectively a Christian institution and community of a kind to challenge a corrupt society and change it. McCabe has an active concern with practical politics (he too signed the New Left May Day Manifesto) which goes far beyond the demands for liberal internal reforms.

It is here that the Catholic crisis engages with a much wider struggle in Britain. There exists among middle-class intellectuals a sort of consensus for change of certain kinds: permissive, liberal, modernizing; an ending of certain outdated habits and attitudes. But in the Church, as in the Labour, Liberal and even Conservative Parties, this apparently progressive position coexists with an unwillingness even to discuss more radical questions: Britain's involvement with a nuclear strategy and with imperialism; persistent social and economic inequalities; the human waste and deprivation of capitalism. Indeed, concern with these basic issues is still referred to as "ideology," the sort of thing that has to be left behind in much the same way, ironically, as older moral and ethical positions. Such opinion is strong when it comes to an issue like McCabe's being deprived of his editorship: that is an interference with free speech, and it produced a broad and powerful protest. But what McCabe was saying and meaning went far beyond this. His position, and that of Slant, is understandable only in the context of the New Left movement as a whole, which is concerned with changing the basic structures of the society and which, at certain crucial points, divides from liberalism in its emphasis on positive beliefs and concern as opposed to permissiveness and laissez faire.

To put the matter in this way is of course to sharpen the current conflict. The New Left joins with these liberals in opposing interference with free speech and personal moral decisions. It is then easy to see a broad, vague "radical" spectrum, opposing a merely conservative society (or a merely conservative institution like the existing Church). But probably the crucial conflict is within this spectrum. The New Left wants to build these values into socialism, where in the experience of Communist societies they have been affronted and denied. At the same time, it insists that to maintain these liberal values while accepting capitalism and its consequences is to reduce human concern to the merest gloss: a permissiveness for a relatively comfortable minority, in a relatively affluent society, which simply fails to notice the hard determination of the lives of others—the poor and exposed in our own societies, and in Africa, Asia and Latin America. Liberalism is then at best too weak and light a response to our whole contemporary experience; at worst, it becomes a way of avoiding it, by concentrating on the local problems of an embarrassed minority.

That is the crucial intellectual argument now going on in Britain; and the crisis in the Catholic Church is an essential part of it. It is complicated, in every sector, and there are constantly shifting alliances. Most of the New Left's thinking has come directly from the Socialist tradition: it is at once a renewal of a creative element in Marxism, and a redefinition of a Socialist humanism which has quite other political sources.

The radical Catholic contribution to the New Left has been, nevertheless, important: not only as a joining of Christian concern to this wider renewal; but specifically as a critique of liberalism, at the point where it divides from socialism. This is so difficult and delicate an issue, in the Western political tradition, that it is not surprising that the best work on it has come from Catholic thinkers who in a way, and often to their disadvantage, have been, or have seemed to be, outside that familiar consensus.

The point is still sometimes confusing and embarrassing: it is often very difficult for Socialists to criticize "liberalism," since certain liberal values have to be actively defended against open reaction and against the errors and failures of Communist societies. But the time came, and has kept coming, when socialism had to transcend liberalism, if it was to live and act at full stretch. The present struggles in Britain are best seen in this light. The Labour government is more or less openly abandoning socialism of any kind, and yet expecting the support of the Left because the Conservatives are waiting in the background. The New Left, in fighting both the government and the older order, is trying to alter the lines of the familiar controversy, and to draw new ones. The Catholic crisis is then an essential part of this difficult and continuing campaign.

"There was no limitation of any kind on the right of the UAR to move its troops up to the line at any time," he added, "and this made the question of the UN force's withdrawal or continued presence academic." "I am sure," he concluded, "that Mr. Eban did not mean what he seemed to imply, that the UNEF was on Egyptian territory to stay as long as the UN saw fit and to fight against the UAR troops, if necessary, to prevent them from moving up to the line in their own territory."

police under oath

Jamaica, N.Y.

Dear Sirs: About "The Perjury Routine" [The Nation, May 8], Irving Younger asserts two universal propositions as self-evident: "Every lawyer who practices in the criminal courts knows that police perjury is commonplace," and "policemen are committing perjury at least in some [series of cases], and perhaps in nearly all of them." William James once said that many people think they are thinking when they are merely rearranging their prejudices. In 1965, there were 265,750 police officers in cities and suburban areas of the United States, 27,000 in New York City. What is self-evident is that by no means all or nearly all of these policemen ever testify at all in court, and further that 95 per cent of all serious criminal cases are disposed of by pleas of guilty with no testimony by anyone in court. As to the veracity of police testimony in the remaining 5 per cent of the cases, Mr. Younger's reputed experience based upon a few years of practice as defense lawyer and as law teacher is flatly contrary to much greater experience of myself and my associates in the same fields. Since none has surveyed the legal profession on this point, how can anyone reliably assert that "every lawyer knows" that something either is or is not "commonplace"?

If the asserted propositions are not true, then they constitute group libel per se on an occupational basis that is all the more pernicious because it slanders hundreds of thousands. They illustrate the false syllogism or non sequitur at the smoldering base of all group prejudice—inferring a general rule from a few observations. . . .

The Death of the Heart

WHEN SHE WAS GOOD. By Philip Roth. Random House. 306 pp. $5.95.

SHAUN O'CONNELL
Mr. O'Connell teaches English at the University of Massachusetts.

> It was some months after the funeral, during one of those cold, fresh, wet springs such as they have in the middle of America, that the letters from the prison began to come directly to the house.

When she was good she was horrid. Lucy Nelson's righteous wrath drove her father out of his family into prison, pushed her own mind over the edge of sanity and herself into the grave. But the slight swell of rhetoric—"such as they have in the middle of America"—in this last paragraph of Philip Roth's sad, lovely novel tells us what it's all about. The middle of America—that flat, flat land, so fertile for crops, so arid for humans; all those square states. The middle of America—where right is might and families pray together to stay together.

> Liberty Center was a town of small white houses shaded by big elms and maples, with a bandstand in the middle of Broadway, its main street.

The middle of America—middle brow, middle class, middling—where well-meaning people can inflict upon one another exotic varieties of pain. These interstices of American life are not just backgrounds against which Roth's characters strut their stuff. The middle of America—a region of mind and heart as well, the vital center—is a fate which shapes their ends.

Lucy Nelson was a happy child, but happiness could not hold roots in the played-out soil of her family. She and her parents lived in with "Daddy Will" and Berta, her grandparents, because Myra, her mother, was ever her daddy's little girl; because Duane ("Whitey"), her father, was ever trying to turn over a new leaf; because times were tough: "Whitey took the Great Depression very personally." Lucy was quick to spy out the cynical patronizing beneath grandpa Willard's beneficence and discover the willful spinelessness of her parents. So she tried to free herself from this quiet desperation by flinging herself into Catholicism. But that didn't work; Lucy could not be born anew so she set out to redeem others. When her father came home drunk one night and mistreated her mother, Lucy called Saint Teresa, but when there was no reply she phoned the Liberty Center Police and had him locked up.

The boy that she marries, Roy Bassart, had his own ideal vision of American life. Back from a two-year army hitch in the Aleutians, Roy—a happy, dangling man—passes months being pampered by his mother and arguing with his father over the course of his future. When he is not busy copying girls' profiles from match-book covers or eating Hydrox cookies, "one of his oldest passions," he watches high-school football practice. One day, just as the ball is snapped, Roy sees a faint white moon above the high school and has a moment of ecstatic fulfillment:

> For the hour of the day, for the time of his life, for this America where it is all peacefully and naturally happening, he feels an emotion at once so piercing and so buoyant it can only be described as love.

The rest of his life is a falling off from this moment when all seemed possible and all was a beautiful, boyish paradise. He is drawn to hard, resisting Lucy, overcomes her scruples ("Trust me"), but gets her pregnant—he had been too shy to buy prophylactics and "interruption" didn't work.

Roy's uncle Julian—a World War II hero; a postwar, local laundromat tycoon; a hard-mouthed child-man—tries his best to talk Roy out of marrying Lucy, but Roy wilts before the force of her righteousness and his own father's insistence that he do the right thing by her.

Each unhappy family is unhappy in its own way, Tolstoy said. The family of Lucy, Roy and young Edward Bassart is desperately unhappy but not, perhaps, so special. Theirs seems a common American anguish. They flail at one another's roles: she wants Roy to be a responsible, unadventurous provider; he wants to play his own way at being an adult or he won't play at all. She pressures him—"When are you going to grow up?"—and he cuts out, home again to the permissive father figure, Julian. Back again, home again, each time destroying a bit more. Each, cruelly, pathetically, uses Edward against the other, and the child begins to grow strange. Finally everything lets go in one of the most intense confrontation scenes in literature. Lucy demands her rights; Julian blocks her; Roy is frozen; Edward screams. The events may be writ large but the tensions that cause them are not unknown in other American families.

Roth's characters are not "interesting" in the usual sense. They do not hang over balconies, drawn by the moon, nor do they write witty letters to the dead. They just try to live in the midst of this country and make a hell and a mess of their lives. They are unredeemed by special distinctions; their "ideas" are an agreed-upon myth of the world; their life patterns are unoriginal. Consequently, Roth does not stunt and strut his rhetoric; his style is suited to this tragedy of the mundane. Roy, for example, playing with the idea of becoming a "professional artist":

> He realized it was no easy row to hoe, but maybe the time had come in life for him to tackle something hard instead of settling for the easiest thing at hand.

That sentence doesn't soar and sing but it does its work; those four or five strung-together clichés do capture the quality of Roy's mind, boxed in banality. If Roth's style doesn't bedazzle, it also doesn't cry "Author, Author!" His prose is a clear window through which we see how some people lived in this time and this place.

The family is both the idea and institution which destroys people's lives. It is a norm to which everyone pays rhetorical obeisance, as does Roy when he will say anything to keep Lucy soothed:

> After all, the family was the backbone of society. Take away the family, and what do you have? People just running around, that's all. Total anarchy.

But the family is not something which very often works. Still, because other alternatives are impoverished, people continue to seek fulfillment in family patterns. Roy is a boy who would be good enough if left alone but he accepts the version of maturity—husband and father—given to him by his own foursquare father. Lucy rebounds from an unhappy family to become a wife and mother out of vengeance. "She would not repeat her mother's life, nor would her offspring repeat her own." She doesn't; her family turns out far worse. One generation is into another's skin; children recoil and stumble into marriage. Everyone comes from a divided house and helps create his own broken home.

The family is the destructive element because it violates the integrity of individuality. An incident early in the novel makes this clear. Willard brings his demented younger sister, Ginny, away from a "home," to Liberty Center. For a while this works. Ginny trails happily after young Lucy who "teaches" this simple woman in her 30s. But when Lucy goes off to school Ginny tags after and moans, "Lu-cy, Lu-cy," all day outside the window. Finally Willard brings Ginny back to the "home," > because she could not understand the most basic fact of human life, the fact that I am me and you are you.

Ginny cannot control herself so she is put away. But her affliction is common to others. Family life provides a context in which one can extend himself by controlling others while another can escape the freedom of self by surrendering his will. Roy sometimes finds safety in Lucy ("She was so strong, so good") but she cannot accept him as he is; he must be molded, redeemed. She wants him to be the man her father was not, but not so much a man that he will control her, a delicate balance Roy cannot maintain. He, like her father, refuses the grace that Lucy offers:

> They simply will not change! All they will do is get worse and worse! Why were they against a mother and a child? Why were they against a beautiful life, and for an ugly one? Why did they fight her and mistreat her and deny her, when all she wanted was what was right!

This, then, is more than the story of Lucy Nelson's self-righteousness; sadly, to be right is the only way she has learned to be at all. Her goodness, no private obsession, is the harvest of our no longer virgin soil, in this novel a spiritual dust bowl. It is the result of efforts at personal salvation through family life. This is a novel about a corrupt community, not only a personal aberration. Lucy Nelson lives in the middle of America, in the heart of dark American life; this novel is about the death of that heart.

A few years ago Roth wrote about the fantastic nuttiness of life in this nation. "It stupefies, it sickens, it infuriates, and finally it is even a kind of embarrassment to one's own meager imagination." When She Was Good preserves Roth's sense of outrage over the ugly growths on native grounds, but the novel belies his claim that American writers lack the imagination to match and contain American reality. He has given artistic life to people who are afflicted by themselves and thus afflict others. Writing this novel must have been a saddening task—long gone are the fun and games of Goodbye, Columbus—but he did it beautifully. Philip Roth has written a novel which cuts to the heart of a place, a tight, right American girl and, finally, the reader; he has written a great book.

IVOR KRAFT

Mr. Kraft is associate professor of Social Work at Western Reserve University in Cleveland. Formerly, he was child development specialist with the United States Department of Health, Education and Welfare.

All discussions of education and integration must begin with the citation of four key facts. Three-fourths of Negro Americans now live in the large urban centers. Of these urbanized Negroes, 80 per cent are compelled to live in ghettos. On every index of educational excellence and pupil achievement the segregated ghetto schools are grossly inferior to suburban schools. Finally, evidence shows that the situation is getting worse, not better: the ghettoization continues, the achievement gap widens.

What this means is that we have already taken the first giant steps toward building what will amount to a four-track system of education in American society. At the top, a small and exclusivistic private system; next, a public-private suburban network; below this, an inferior public (and partially parochial) stratum for the white poor, and at the bottom, a custodial public sector for the black ghetto poor. This is not, of course, an accidental stratification of our schools; it is a correct reflection of our class structure. At the top, the elite ruling class; next, the subruling, managerial and middle classes; at the bottom, the lower and under classes. When the boards and administrators speak of the "neighborhood school," it is this four-track system that is actually being referred to. A barrier of iron curtains is slowly descending among the various child populations now attending these stratified schools, and soon they will be even more rigidly isolated from one another than are the bosses, the secretaries and the charwomen in one of those big-city office buildings.

People who have trouble accepting this dire prediction should keep in mind that we have a large private and parochial school sector in this country. Nonpublic school enrollment is overwhelmingly white, and during the last decade it has grown enormously in our largest cities. In Philadelphia, for example, more than 60 per cent of the white elementary school population attends nonpublic schools. All across the country, children of top public school officials routinely attend nonpublic schools, as do about 40 per cent of the children of upper-income Negroes.

These facts, so essential to any analysis of the great educational debates of our day, are understood only by the more astute educators and critics. Among them is Peter Schrag, now perhaps the foremost of our newer educational journalists, whose articles in The Nation, Saturday Review and elsewhere are required reading for anyone who wants to know what is going on in the country's school systems.

Schrag's Voices in the Classroom, which first appeared two years ago, has now been reissued in paperback, and it can be recommended as a good journalistic account of American education in the early 1960s. Some of it is understandably dated; Schrag refers to a $20-billion annual expenditure for education, but the common figure now cited is closer to $40 billion. Also, Schrag, a reporter who knows how to hit hard and spit venom when the facts warrant, is not immune to the snow job that is typically mounted for transient journalists. He gushes over the schools of Jefferson County, Colo., and he is taken in by more than one useless scheme of compensatory education.

But Schrag has something that most

MARIANNE MOORE

"I look permanently alarmed, like a frog," says Marianne Moore thumbing through photographs; and from a poem, her pet crow Pluto laughs:
"This is a goddess detained in river fog."

RAYMOND ROSELIEP

educational journalists do not have: a racy style, and a scent for the charming anecdote. One that deserves to be a classic is the slum child's composition on "Kim, the Magic Ballerina," quoted in Voices in the Classroom:

> The Magic Ballerina danced and danced, and she danced her way to the witch, and she danced into the pot and was never seen again, and the witch lived happily ever after.

Pursuing many of the themes mentioned in his earlier volume, Village School Downtown is a case study in depth of the school system of Boston, a city whose "education faces the rear." The book is an often mordant exposé of a system dominated by conservative Irish Catholics, numbed by a stifling lower-middle-class mentality, fiercely dedicated to obsolescent practices, and so inbred and hypocritical that it will not even concede that it has a problem of racial isolation and inequality in its midst. Now and again Schrag drops a kind word about some of the teachers.

The Boston school people, like many educators—especially the big-city superintendents who dislike and fear the integration issue—are very good at pointing a sophisticated finger at solutions that must come from bailiwicks other than their own. Moral reform? Certainly, and it has to come from our spiritual and cultural leaders; not really a job for teachers. Housing? Of course, and the federal government must build homes to counter real estate discrimination, something that obviously cannot be done by school people. Jobs? Yes, indeed, and this is the responsibility of industrial leaders and government planners who must guarantee an expanding, dynamic labor market; educators cannot do a thing about it. So don't you see—these educators tell us while solemnly avowing their commitment to integrated education—that there is just nothing we as schoolmen can do to solve the problem? The inner city schools are going to remain black, but of course we will do our best to make them good. "Good but black," "compensatory education"—that is what we must strive for.

The educators certainly have a point in refusing to accept responsibility for the major repair of race relations in American society. No one can quarrel with the jobs-income-housing-politics attack, which does indeed go to the roots of the problem. But that does not get the schoolmen off the hook, and the report of the United States Commission on Civil Rights (CCR) tells us why.

Unlike the typical government document on education which is a crashing bore and as often as not out of date by the time it issues from the press, the two-volume study of the CCR, "Racial Isolation in the Public Schools," is a forceful, thoroughly documented analysis of the chief educational issue of our day. It deserves to rank with those famous annual reports issued by the state of Massachusetts when Horace Mann was secretary of the Board of Education, more than 100 years ago.

Marshaling scores of statistical tables and dozens of national surveys and studies, the CCR report shows how the inner-city school systems perpetuate themselves, how the cycle of inferiority inevitably breeds more inferiority, and how the school boards and admininstrators not only fail to put a brake to this process but actually conspire to accelerate it. The suburban schools at the same time spend more on education, attract the superior teachers, provide more attractive facilities, and because there is less competition for tax moneys in suburbia, the middle classes who flock to the suburbs can and will continue to improve education within a fiscal structure of lower tax rates.

Will the new federal expenditures, at current levels, redress the inequalities? No, says the report, because federal aid accounts for less than 8 per cent of all education expenditures, and at this rate it has not and will not bridge the gap between the poor inner cities and the wealthy suburbs. The suburban schools will continue to be superior in all respects: small classes, better teachers, more library books, easier access to specialists, better audio-visual equipment, more modern science labs, and the like.

The successes and failures of "compensatory education" in all-black systems have been debated by schoolmen over the past decade. The CCR reviewed eighty-five major compensatory education programs operative in 1965-66. On the basis of cold statistics (test and achievement scores) the conclusion is that they are almost totally ineffective. One of these was the much ballyhooed Higher Horizons in New York City, at one time purportedly reaching and uplifting 64,000 slum children. Former Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare, Abraham Ribicoff, once visited a Higher Horizons school in Harlem and declared that he had just undergone "the greatest single experience I have had and the greatest single lesson I have learned." A few years later the entire Higher Horizons venture was quietly scrapped as uneconomical and unsuccessful.

One way of achieving racial balance in the schools is by busing children from crowded inner-city schools to often underused outlying facilities. A few cities have successful busing projects, but most oppose the idea bitterly. Schrag recounts the story of Boston's paranoid fear of busing, symbolized by the redoubtable Louise Day Hicks. The CCR report shows how administrators and school boards across the nation have deliberately distorted the busing issue, subtly urging the people to think of it as a violation of their rights.

The fact is that in the 1963-64 school year more than one-third of our children rode buses to get to school, and not for the purpose of integrating the races. Through the years we have wisely moved in the direction of large consolidated school districts—particularly in rural areas—and thus it is more economical and educationally sound to replace small, inferior schools with better endowed centralized institutions. (In 1965 Kansas had 1,500 school districts; today it has 349.)

Some systems have used busing to preserve segregation. In the years between 1955 and 1958, Cincinnati had no trouble with the busing concept. They regularly bused 750 Negro children who lived in a largely white part of town to a school 5½ miles away with a 98 per cent Negro enrollment. The explanation was a bit tortuous, but it all had to do in some unfathomable way with the principle of the neighborhood school.

The CCR report explains why the neighborhood school has become an outmoded concept. In the old days, when populations were smaller and more dispersed, it was common for a school to draw its clientele from varied class backgrounds over a large stretch of territory. There was some real mingling of children from professional and laboring classes, from rich homes and poor homes. In this sense a neighborhood had functional and democratic variety, a multi-class character within a largely working-class nation. But today we have highly homogenized pupil populations, drawn from quite small and rigidly applied geographical attendance areas. In some of those rabbit warren high-rise housing projects all of the children in a given classroom may actually live in the same block, literally not more than 100 yards from one another. Here we have the so-called "neighborhood school" with a vengeance.

In many cities, school attendance zones are carefully gerrymandered to preserve class and race distinctions. A Negro child may walk past a "districted" school attended by a 90 per cent white population in order to get to his 100 per cent Negro school. Site selection and school design are other ways of perpetuating racial imbalance. Of 371 new elementary schools opened during the past fifteen years in sixteen American cities, 84 per cent immediately served either a nearly all-Negro or nearly all-white clientele. Atlanta, a city which likes to tell the world that it does all in its power to achieve model race relations, deliberately designs and places its schools so that they will be rigidly segregated by race. There is only one school in Nashville which serves all twelve grades, and it was deliberately set up that way to prevent residents of a small Negro neighborhood from sending their children to nearby white schools. Houston has a carefully planned school-expansion program through 1970, guaranteeing that its new building will be racially homogeneous.

Some cities have built schools for Negroes no worse than those for whites, but many have not. Milwaukee built forty-four new schools between 1950 and 1965; two of them served neighborhoods where Negro attendance exceeded 50 per cent. How do they get away with it? By a variety of stratagems, such as packing classes (with or without doctoring statistics for the official record), converting basements and auditoriums to classrooms, double shifts, bringing in "temporary" or portable wooden structures, renting space in church basements or housing projects, or by adding wings to ancient structures.

Of all the suggested proposals for desegregating the large urban systems, the commission finds the "educational park" idea the most promising [see "The Educational Park" by John Barden, The Nation, April 20, 1964]. According to this scheme, as many as 5,000 to 30,000 students are brought together in one large complex of buildings and services—actually a city of learning. The Syracuse plan provides for closing the present thirty-one elementary schools and reassigning all children to four new educational plazas to be built on the city's outskirts. There is a plan for East Orange, N. J., where 69 per cent of the students are Negro, which stipulates that all 10,000 children from kindergarten through high school will attend facilities clustered on one large site. Albuquerque, N. M., with 76,000 students, is considering a scheme based on separate parks for the elementary and secondary grades, each newly constructed center to serve a maximum of 20,000 children.

On the basis of the CCR report, we can say categorically that we do not need more "research" to prove that—no matter what efforts are made in the name of quality—educational segregation by class, caste and color yields not upward mobility but a reinforced immobility. All we need to do is look honestly at 100 years of segregated schools and at the record of failure of contemporary efforts at compensation. We do not need a new educational philosophy. John Dewey gave us one with remarkable prescience more than a generation ago. We do not even lack resources—we have them, but they are being poured from the skies over Vietnam, $30 billion worth a year. As for the strategies of integration, take your pick: the CCR report suggests at least six that are bound to work if we want them to.

The successful implementation of all these strategies depends absolutely on the two chief recommendations of the CCR. The first is that "Congress should establish a uniform standard providing for the elimination of racial isolation in the schools," and the second is that Congress "should provide financial and technical assistance to the states" in carrying out the needed remedies. What this means in practice is making massive federal funds available to the states, and then allocating them only to schools which are racially balanced, often defined as containing a Negro enrollment of between 15 and 50 per cent, but not more. This in turn means forcing the states to redistrict, to mix suburban with inner-city children in common schools.

Is this fantastic? Does it imply a revolution in the delivery of one of our basic social services, public education? It probably does, but it is not thereby technically or politically unfeasible. It can be done. Schrag (who tends to hedge on the issue of integration versus compensation) would probably agree, since similar ideas are hinted at in the concluding sections of Village School Downtown.

Neither Schrag nor the CCR report (which likes the word "substantial") tells us how much we can expect all of this to cost. My own surmise is that it will require federal expenditures upward of $50 billion a year over the next twenty-five years. This amounts roughly to $1,000 annually for each child in school. If we do it, it will go down in history as the biggest benign bribe ever made by the federal government to the states. Nor is it in the realm of fantasy, when we consider that we are now approaching an annual gross national product of $1,000 billion.

The great merit of the CCR report is that it is based on a strict commitment to a democratic public school system for this nation. Most of us were brought up to believe in the public school as the chosen instrument of American democracy. There is room for this belief—if we are thinking of the remote past or the future. But with regard to the recent past and the present, the sad fact is that the public schools have been since the turn of the century, and remain to this day, largely a chosen instrument of big business and corporate liberalism. (And American capitalism has never distinguished itself by demanding a fair shake for Negroes.) The schools have never been chiefly concerned with evoking the free and critical intellect, sponsoring high culture, preserving our democratic ideals, or even achieving "life adjustment" for the young. Their chief mission has been to turn out docile servitors of a business-dominated society. This has meant the three Rs, conformist consumership, loyalty to local interests, and harmless amusements (especially sports).

But now there is thunder and lightning on the horizon. The demand for integration can shatter the mold. A genuine democratic ideal, and a tough one at that, is being thrust forth for implementation, and by surly advocates to boot. Hundreds of American school boards, dominated by conservative puppets of the power structure, just cannot cope with this. The solution requires real change, massive new resources and prolonged political strife. The demand for an end to racial and class isolation in the schools is no less than a demand for the rejuvenation of American democracy. It will not be achieved painlessly.

Cult of the Majority

THE LEVITTOWNERS. By Herbert J. Gans. Pantheon Books. 474 pp. $7.95.

ELMER BENDINER

Mr. Bendiner, writer and editor, is the author of The Bowery Man (Thomas Nelson).

It has been eminently fashionable to scorn the Levittowns of America and to see in them a corruption of man and nature. Now sociologist and city planner, Herbert J. Gans, has written a voluminous study—The Levittowners—which lambastes such criticism as an aristocratic affectation.

Those who would conserve the countryside against the spread of shopping malls are denounced by Mr. Gans as more interested in trees than in people. Those who bewail the alleged cultural sterility of lower-middle-class suburbia are depicted as intellectual snobs who insist that America be made in their image. In short, he contends that the sniping at Levittown is part of a class war against the lower middle class and all its values.

Alarmed at the steady drumfire of anti-Levittown criticism, Gans moved into the New Jersey settlement at its inception and stayed there for two years as a "participant-observer" to investigate at first hand the life style of what had become anathema to his fellow intellectuals. Working under the sponsorship of the Institute for Urban Studies of the University of Pennsylvania, Gans lived the suburbanite life to the hilt. He cultivated his neighbors and conscientiously attended every meeting and Kaffeeklatsch that would admit him.

He supplemented his findings with questionnaires that provided him with hard data and impressive tables. These, however, do not greatly interfere with the book's readability.

Is life dull in Levittown? Only to "tourists" and "cosmopolitans," Gans replies. The inhabitants claim emphatically that it is not and Gans credits their views as most authoritative. Of course it may be said that a man who is paying a good deal of his hard-earned income for the first house he can call his own, and who is eager to be on good terms with his neighbors is unlikely to yawn and remark, "How dreadfully dull!"

Gans insists, however, that the Levittown life is precisely what the lower middle class wants and therefore ought to have. "Many working class city dwellers," he writes, "enjoy street life and urban eating or drinking places; upper middle class critics like crowds and cosmopolitanism. The lower middle class and the kinds of working class people who come to Levittown had no interest in either. Even previous urbanites had made little if any use of the cultural facilities valued by the cosmopolitan, and had no need of them in the suburb."

As an example of their lack of interest in institutions associated with the "vitality of the working class urbanite," the Levittowners voted to keep their community free of bars. To demonstrate their antipathy to cosmopolitan values they voted against attempts to expand their school's horizons beyond the severely practical. And they sided overwhelmingly with the builder's efforts to keep the community lily white, yielding only reluctantly after legal action had been taken.

What they want, Gans reports, "is a kind of interpersonal vitality along with privacy and peace and quiet. Vicarious excitement is something else again. Television provides programmed and highly predictable excitement but it can get boring. A fire or accident, a fight at a municipal or school board meeting, and marital strife or minor misbehavior among neighbors involve real people and known ones. The excitement they provide is also vicarious but it is not programmed and is therefore more rewarding."

Add to this tattle-tale gray Peyton Place a large admixture of "the Puritan ethic," as Gans describes the Levittown atmosphere, and you have as dreary a picture as any drawn by the most cosmopolitan of critics.

Life in Levittown, and probably anywhere else in the nation, becomes a "constant search for compatible people and a rejection of those who are different," Gans says. Although Jews, Catholics, Protestants, working-class, middle-class and occasionally upper-middle-class people live next door to one another, "propinquity" does not lead to integration. Each seeks his own kind, Gans reports, and sets about the business of excluding others. The "others" in Levittown are most frequently "cosmopolitans," upper-middle-class Jews or both. (The coupling of Jews and cosmopolitans is reminiscent and not reassuring.)

Gans has scant sympathy for these

"rejects" in Levittown. When he was there they campaigned for causes which he found laudable, but "their dedicated activism confounded the decision-makers" who were not accustomed to popular "feed-back" between elections, and "it was easy to think of them as malcontents and agitators."

He credits them with a value as gadflies but at the same time condemns them because "they could not see that what they considered the public interest was often only an impersonal but nevertheless upper-middle class (and therefore self-) interest."

He would have had them distinguish between demands that reflect their own class interests and the lower-middle-class needs of their neighbors. He suggests forlornly that their emphasis on principle would have defeated any real coalition, even in areas of prime interest to the community as a whole. "The class differences were just too great to be hurdled even for political advantage," he concludes.

The Levittowners is a thoroughgoing sociological study, but for the lay reader, who is likely to be a hapless "cosmopolitan" critic of Levittown, the book raises a number of disturbing questions.

For example, which is the more intolerable snob—the one who complains of "rural idiocy" or the one who says that those who live such lives are in fact rural idiots and would be happy in no other condition? In a democracy, Gans argues, the majority in any community ought to dictate the way of life. But is every fight for an expanded school program, better libraries, greater freedom of thought, or a political house cleaning to be considered an effort to impose values of an alien class because it runs against the grain of the entrenched and tyrannical majority?

So rigid a view of class values and so mechanical a definition of democracy, it seems to this reviewer, leads only to a deadly quietism.

If Gans were arguing only against the tactics of "cosmopolitan" reformers and radicals, he could, no doubt, make an eloquent analysis. But he goes much further and, despite a grudging admission of the stimulation that comes with any irritant, the implication given the reader is that such people should accept the standards of the community in which they live or go back where they came from.

In this tidy view of democracy the rebel gets short shrift. And Gans espouses a cult of the majority that can be as absurd and as deadly as the infamous cult of the individual.

Mind-Expanding Verbs

A WORLD ELSEWHERE: The Place of Style in American Literature. By Richard Poirier. Oxford University Press. 257 pp. $5.75.

ALAN TRACHTENBERG

Mr. Trachtenberg teaches American literature at Pennsylvania State University.

In A World Elsewhere, Richard Poirier sets out to rewrite the criticism of major American literature. He argues that our best books are interesting and vital for certain moments contained in specific sentences and paragraphs, rather than for the imitation of reality in entire works. The moments he chooses to celebrate by a brilliant verbal analysis are when the hero experiences a profound sense of release from confinement and authority. Poirier calls this experience an expansion of self. It is expressed in verbal style, not in dramatic action.

Works by Hawthorne, Henry James, Mark Twain and William Faulkner which we usually read as fictional accounts of heroes in fictional versions of the real world, Poirier now would have us read as verbal struggles by both author and hero to escape the historical world altogether, to expand the self infinitely into vacant space. At best the escape can be momentary, and heroes, writers and readers alike must return to a diminished sense of self; out of this conflict comes the unique quality of American romantic literature: "a sustained and acknowledged tension between the writer's commitment to visionary possibilities and his obligations to certain conventions of expression that tend to frustrate these possibilities."

This argument is difficult and elusive, and it may help for the moment to distinguish its leading ideas from its method. Poirier's method is based on a radical shift in what we consider "real" about literary works. In much recent criticism the work appears as a set of signals which register in the reader's mind and click off associations—archetypic, mythic, political, literary or generally cultural. Poirier wants us to curb our attention to the signals themselves, the isolated images and symbols, and respond instead to the way they are presented in the text—in particular, to the tone and presence of a speaking voice. What he means by style is the more or less tangible presence generated by grammar and syntax, the ambience of personality which inhabits the language. Let us not extract images and ideas, he argues, but experience them as functions of this verbal entity, style.

One of the best and most useful achievements of the book is the distinction, implied throughout, between metaphor and style, between what a reader recognizes in his mind, what he takes out and paraphrases in his own terms, measures and evaluates, and what he experiences, almost kinetically. Poirier reads fiction as a verbal drama rather than as a pattern of translatable meanings.

Taken as a sheer exercise in reading, the book demonstrates a kind of negative capability, a hushed receptivity to tonalities and modulations of the voice in the words.

In the practice of his method Poirier gives new and fresh readings to many familiar passages in American books. But as he moves from method to conception, the drift of his bias begins to appear. By reading like detectives looking for clues, he feels, we have "pacified" the "marvelous and eccentric vitality of American writing." True enough. But he continues: "By being historical about American literature, we have often missed the history which is particular novels, poems, or essays, the history lurking in their stylistic and formal characteristics." The key expression is "the history which is. . . ." It becomes clear that Poirier does not want to work out a relationship between style and history as we normally understand the term but to replace history with style, to complete in criticism what he takes to be the most significant drift in the literature itself.

The page-by-page argument is that the historical nature of American works lies in their stylistic activities, and not in the reality reflected in the action. If style is a struggle to bring into existence a certain presence, the struggle in American works is first to detach the reader from traditional styles, from inherited verbal patterns, and thus to free him to share the hero's expansion of self. The expansion in writers like Emerson, Thoreau and Faulkner is so radically new that it requires a dislocation of conventional literary language. This dislocation (and Poirier devotes most of his book to analyses of specific passages which exemplify it) serves the writer in his relationship both to his reader and his hero. To communicate his moments of transcendent freedom he needs to transport his reader from any conventional idea of literary reality. Likewise, the hero requires an unconventional language in order to give birth to his unconventional visionary consciousness of freedom. In Poirier's version of the relations between literature and history, literary conventions (such matters, in fiction, as the need for realistic dialogue) are verbal barriers to the expression of freedom, and correspond roughly to social and political conventions.

Another way to put this complicated idea is that American writers, unable to imagine real alternatives in action to their hero's (or their own) unhappy relations with society, have invented verbal forms which project momentary illusions of freedom. These forms tell the reader that the freedom is momentary and illusive, and thus they protect the free consciousness from the mistake of our believing it is real and competitive in a scale of values with other moments. To be truly free the moment must be unreal. Think of Huck and Jim, naked, on their raft. We can accept the image only because it is presented as a fundamentally impossible idyll. If the writer had presented the moment as something which could actually happen, he would have to contend with his reader's normal social judgments about whether it is likely or not. By presenting it as an essentially verbal experience, he frees the moment from judgment, transports us stylistically, and confirms its temporary reality by conceding its ultimate unreality.

To make style an escape from society, a substitute for history, Poirier invites his readers at the outset to accept the premise that freedom is the creation of consciousness, not political institutions. His source is Hegel, and his intention is to prove that literature "makes free" through its style, not through figurative versions of a social reality through which the reader might better understand his own nonliterary reality. My disagreements with the argument begin at the outset, for as I read Hegel, he hardly meant to detach the mind from history. Freedom for the philosopher developed in a process of conscious interaction with necessity. To claim that Hegel proposed that freedom consists in the displacement of external reality by imagined alternative forms seems a complete misconstruction. Poirier's stylistic emancipations have little in common with the Hegel of whom J. N. Findlay writes: "True freedom, he came more and more to think, can be found only in the laws and usages of some concrete community, in which the individual can 'find himself.' "

The utopian, anti-historical imagination in American literature has been described before, but rarely with such sweeping assertion of its centrality, its defiant role in shaping specific literary works. Poirier's final description of the works he finds most valuable is "extravagances of yearning that create the object they yearn for." In an important sense this description fits all works of literature that have an aesthetic wholeness: the emotion they create is self-sustaining. But the historical nature of aesthetic experiences cannot be dismissed out of hand. All literature, all art, by its nature, creates a "world elsewhere." But before this world is called "freedom" or consciousness, its strings of attachment with the other world of power and time need to be more carefully identified. Keats concluded with a question: "do I wake or sleep?" Poirier concludes with too much certainty that to sleep and dream is to wake.

The Gaze Behind the Lens

ACQUAINTANCES. By Arnold J. Toynbee. Oxford University Press. 312 pp. $7.50.

VARIETY OF MEN. By C. P. Snow. Charles Scribner's Sons. 270 pp. $5.95.

CALVIN BEDIENT

Mr. Bedient teaches literature at Emory University, Atlanta, Ga.

Almost all the subjects of Acquaintances are dead, but even if they were still alive, still vulnerable, how easily they could breathe as they took up this new book. For Arnold Toynbee's heart is a haven. Secrets, vices, open sores are safe with him, and as for malice, or penetration too deep for kindness, or the garlic breath of vulgar intimacy—from these his acquaintances are spared. Above all, they are respected, and this in our day is a mercy. Toynbee's emotion is so generous, his manners are so impeccable, that a portrait from his hands is as good as an absolution. Ever so gently, his mind blesses.

Yet which of his many subjects, I wonder, would be fond of his portrait? Itself destined for the attic, it would bring to mind old faded frontispiece photographs, all ghostly blue or humus brown. "Is that my face?" each would ask, looking into Toynbee's mirror. For none would have thought that his presence was so pale. The human craving to be watched, delighted in, weighed, preferred, would find little to feed on; for Toynbee's sense of human beings, if mild as moonlight, is also as dim, and here even his closest friends often dissolve into their careers, or into moments of modern history, or into incidents of Toynbee's life—into everything that is not quite themselves. Toynbee's mind is so saturated with "international affairs," his penchant is so obviously (as he says) for the tree of history instead of the "single leaves," that, as one reads this book, the title soon begins to provoke one's sense of irony—it is as if the galaxies have been mistaken for the lights of a town. How much better even hatred would be than Toynbee's bland and impersonal underwriting of one's existence. For, hated, one would at least be there, vivid, felt, individual, and not simply a glimpsed passenger on the great, crowded train of history.

Even as a book on Toynbee's own career, on history, human nature, life in general, Acquaintances draws a blank. It has no sparkle, no poetry, no profundity. It is all a dry rustling of disquisition and reminiscence. Though Toynbee's intellect is prodigious, an elephant among minds, it displays the usual defects of massive size: it plods, it comes down ponderously on platitudes. Of Nehru the author writes: "When Fate overthrows, in the end, a man of more than ordinary spiritual stature, Fate is teaching us all a lesson and is calling us all to heel." Despite the formality of syntax and tone, the interlarded ornateness, Toynbee's work has always been marked by a kind of childlike simplicity, an almost indulgent, cultivated naïveté, a sweetness of reason that is a little self-savoring; and in Acquaintances Toynbee becomes sweeter and plainer than ever.

How admirably restrained he is. Yet how innocuous, how determinedly civilized, how preciously grateful, generous, forbearing and good willed. Candor, the truth that cuts—these have not tempted him; yet candor has its civilized uses, and Toynbee might have learned from Shaw—whose ethics and metaphysics are so similar—that saintliness and sharpness are not incompatible.

What keeps human reality out of Acquaintances is not only Toynbee's finicky discretion and blindness to presence and preoccupation with the minutiae of history; there is also, at the bottom of this book, insufficient schooling in the disguises, transmutations, and ambitions of the ego. Intellectually, Toynbee subscribes to original sin; but his eyes tend to exclude the dark. He is, precisely, Victorian in his sentimental suppression of the flagrant, clamoring, animal insistence of the self. Selflessness is merely a hiatus in being: Toynbee does not recognize its rarity. Of a work by Prof. W. L. Westermann, Toynbee says: "He did not live . . . to see it published, but what of that? A scholar writes, not for himself, but for his readers." Too eager, too consoling, this dismissal of the self echoes through Acquaintances, calling attention to hollow spaces within it.

By contrast, C. P. Snow, in Variety of Men, takes us into the inner corridors of power. A hard presence and beak of a man, rapping out both sympathy and disapproval in the same sharp tones, Snow is equally at his ease with great scientists (Rutherford, G. H. Hardy, Einstein), littérateurs (Robert Frost, H. G. Wells), and politicians (Lloyd George, Winston Churchill, Dag Hammarskjöld and Stalin), all of whom except the last he has personally known. Snow moves among this gathering coolly, not as a cat that looks at kings but as a great cat among great cats. The glare of will, independence, genius and confidence that this group sheds is almost overpowering, but Snow holds up no tinted glass against it. With only mild reservations, he accepts the ego as one accepts a natural force, a geyser or a flood. The book presents personal power as spectacle; it is an aesthetic record of genius and will.

The title, Variety of Men, misleads and is a little inflated in that variety has not been sought; it merely comes as it will, and there is not much of it: the great tend to repeat one another, like a spread of stars—all are egos endeavoring to make themselves equal to the universe. Here the polemicist of The Two Cultures has wisely effaced himself; the book carries no sermons. On the other hand, Variety of Men lacks vision, it is not all of a piece but only a collection, a photo album of the great; nor does it move beyond personalities to human nature. Not even Snow holds the book together: though he makes judgments, states regrets, praises, is shrewd and analytical, lively and direct, he never quite comes into focus; we look over his shoulder, we listen to his voice.

Snow wrote the book, he says, "for fun." A "set of personal impressions," it is "modest in intention." Fair enough; all that was then necessary was that the book should be engrossing. And it is: Variety of Men is a delight to read. Though almost certainly more than an interest in "the variety of human beings" lies behind it, though a fascination with greatness and power seems to have fired it, it succeeds simply because it is vivid: it communicates energy: it contains reality. Here is an observer of men. Snow's eye has a kind of laboratory clarity, his sense of his subject is concentrated, his ear serves him well. Sitting for Snow, you would feel the heat of the lights, the intent gaze behind the lens.

Here, too, is an artist. Without raising his voice—which is tough, straightforward, vigorous — Snow can draw tears, as in the pieces on Frost and Rutherford. Though he seems rather brittle, his humanity is deep. He is very much his own man, but not cold. Intelligence, knowledge of the world, sensory vitality—the book has all these: but perhaps its real brilliance lies in its spirit, its attack. If these "impressions" lack formal beauty and move unpredictably, still they snap and clip along, and have their impact. One scarcely notices or cares that there are no pockets of silence, that the book lacks serenity and scope. It bears one along on its wave. A series of sharp impressions and forceful judgments, it is percussive. And this is the right spirit in which to record impressions — this swift, free-handed sketching of lines, unconscious, spontaneous. Variety of Men is alive.

THEATRE IN EUROPE III

HAROLD CLURMAN

Prague

All I knew of this beautiful city as I entered it was that here in 1787, at a theatre still in use, Mozart's Don Giovanni was first performed; that it had been the capital of an honorable democracy, betrayed at Munich by Chamberlain and Daladier and taken over by the Communists in 1948. I knew it had given evidence of its resistant spirit during the Nazi occupation and that it contained the oldest remaining Jewish cemetery and synagogue in Europe, part of a ghetto where in the 16th century the legend of the Golem (a giant robot fashioned by the chief rabbi to combat murderous anti-Semites) had originated. I had also seen several interesting Czech films and plays. In short, I knew very little about Prague or its people.

It was through its theatre that I came to know more. This statement may be taken as "symbolic." For I have often repeated a thesis central to my "ideology": a theatre may serve as a key to understanding a nation's character.

First a few facts. Prague, with a population of a little more than a million, has sixteen theatre groups, all of them nationally or locally subsidized and all of them repertory companies. Apart from the opera houses and musical theatres (the National Theatre offers drama as well as opera), and aside from "standard" pieces by Shakespeare, Lope de Vega, Schiller, de Musset, Machiavelli, Goldoni, Capek and Langer, one could see last May Williams' A Streetcar Named Desire and The Night of the Iguana, Miller's After the Fall, Ionesco's The Chairs, Giraudoux's Madwoman of Chaillot, Schisgal's Luv, Romain Rolland's Game of Love and Death, Dürrenmatt's latest play, Meteor, Camus' The Righteous, and a show dealing with the assassination of John Kennedy entitled Dallas.

One of the recently formed companies, calling itself the Gate Theatre, uses a house seating 400, and operates on a yearly budget of $120,000, supplemented by the government with another $60,000. Its most expensive ticket is $1.10. I paid $1.50 for an orchestra seat at Lorca's The House of Bernarda Alba in a larger house.

The younger companies interested me the most, though the older ones probably command better actors. I began with a version of Jarry's King Ubu at the already famous Theatre on the Balustrade (founded in 1958) in what appeared to be an obscure square of the "Old City." The production was a revelation and typical of present-day Czech theatre work.

The stage, like the auditorium, is tiny: no larger than those of our most modest Off-Broadway houses. But the company, under its brilliant director Jan Grossman (who also directed his own dramatization of Kafka's The Trial), was able to achieve an astonishing variety of movement within the extremely restricted area of the stage space. The set seemed to consist of little more than a shabby brass bed, which could be taken apart and converted into a series of steps, ladders and other contraptions to be used in many different arrangements, and creating "platforms" on which the actors danced, marched, leaped over, under and around in fantastic comedy routines. All this effected, not only without the slightest awkwardness but with utter freedom.

The actors served as stagehands, the stagehands as actors. At one moment one of the "grips" not only removed the props and furniture but also carried the leading lady off-stage. Were the actors trained for drama or for the circus! They all seemed to have developed acrobatic skills, an attribute I discovered to be common to the younger companies. One might have supposed that they had all been students of Graham, Robbins or Balanchine.

As played here, Ubu is a mockery of rule by dictatorship, a display of jubilant anarchy. Cast in the role of Papa Ubu was an actor who looked like the young Orson Welles with the avoirdupois of the present Falstaffian Welles. Despite his obesity, he was as agile as the slimmest of dancers, and much funnier than Arbuckle. (In The Trial he plays a minor role which he makes memorable through a series of sadistic sleight of hand tricks with a cigarette butt.) One can never tell at these performances who the leading actors are and who the bit players. Most of them alternate from central roles to subsidiary ones.

Improprieties are performed with deft delicacy: a man kisses a girl while buttoning his fly, another asserts his sportiness by pulling himself into a towering position by hiking his crotch. Garbage pails become crowns. The satire is defiantly gay; all the wild business of King Ubu is performed with exquisite precision. The audience roars its appreciation and does not leave the theatre till the stage manager decides to turn on the house lights.

I dwell on this production because it is characteristic. At another of the new companies, the Dramatic Club, I attended a scenic jape taking place, for the most part, at a discotheque. It showed young folk (not hipsters) in jocose rebellion against the working class as conceived before the "thaw" as well as the bureaucracy. The play (of untranslatable title and spare in structure) galloped from one set of mischievous dialogues to another, all of them marked by happy disrespect for authority. (One of the boys yells at a government employee, "Make up your mind!" to which the exasperated response is, "With us nobody makes up his mind." Laughter and applause from the audience.) Such pranks and fancy-free improvisations are referred to here as "happenings."

The stage at the Dramatic Club is even tinier than the one at the Balustrade. (I visited backstage where there was hardly enough room for four people to stand comfortably. The rather large company was packed into two or three dressing rooms, gaily perspiring.) But once again the actors, all recently out of a dramatic academy, virtually an obligatory preparation for the profession, are thoroughly schooled, capable of singing, dancing and performing extremely difficult and entertaining turns. (There are scenes in The Trial, on the whole a somber production, in which one wonders if one has not entered a gymnasium where the entire cast—both women and men—carry on like high-wire or trapeze artists preparing for an Olympiad.)

At the same Dramatic Club I attended the opening night of Gogol's Inspector General done with an élan, a freshness of humor, and an extravagance of characterization which were a joy to behold. Again one was amazed that so tiny a platform could contain so much spacious movement: talk about turning on a dime! The false inspector (Chlestakov) was played by the willowy Vladimir Pucholt, the scamp in Loves of a Blonde. He looks no more than 22. During the curtain calls (the only things on these occasions which are insufficiently rehearsed) in celebration of the first night a sparse "bouquet" of lilacs was handed him, while the leading lady was regaled with several roses, and a single flower honored the actor who played the Mayor. The cast looked like a collection of thoroughly thrilled college kids.

The program of plays at the Gate Theatre is more sober. The designer, Swoboda, one of the most original talents in all Europe, does most of the sets at this establishment as he appears to do throughout the town. The first production I saw there was a one-act play, Cat on the Rails, by a young Czech dramatist, Josef Topol. The play consists for the most part of a long duologue between a truck driver and his girl friend, both nearing 30. The tone of the play is one of lyric pessimism, with flashes of ironic humor.

The two characters, full of animal vitality, are physically passionate. Yet the man, unwilling to settle down and marry, is obsessed by a recurring sense of futility. He is youth without purpose or objective. He appears incapable of progress beyond spasms of desire. He tortures himself and the girl whom he adores, and she does him. They are both locked in a cave of carnal intimacy without issue. Their destiny is mutual self-destruction.

The writing is colorful, nervous and charming, romantically glowing and desperate. By itself this might not save the play from becoming static, though its audience is clearly fascinated by its verve and emotional tumult. The acting sustains the evening by being staged in constant motion, the two players using their bodies with the grace of ballet dancers and the vigor of athletes. The direction is choreography.

Preceding Cat on the Rails was a pantomime by the Belgian, Michel de Ghelderode, called The Masks of Ostend—macabre, frenetic and of a flaming hue, in a style reminiscent of James Ensor's painting. The entire acting corps of the theatre takes part in this phantasmagoria, all but the central figure masked, wearing costumes that are prettily grotesque.

The general import of this piece is the bedevilment of man, his inescapable frustration and defeat. A musical motif which is frantically giddy, harbinger of doom, punctuates the piece like a thread of hell-fire. This theme recurs at intervals in Cat on the Rails and serves as a sort of signature to the evening. Swoboda's settings for both pantomime and play are contrasts of light and darkness, with electrical effects in an ominous dazzle. In both pieces the surface is sprightly and glamorous, but one hears a note of warning which indicates that all is not serene in the effervescence of Prague. No such evening is conceivable in the Soviet theatre.

I have emphasized the strong accent on physical movement in all these productions. One wonders if the influence of the once discredited, now "re-established" Russian director, Meyerhold, who used actors as kinetic instruments, was not at play here. The surmise takes on definition when one sees The Three Sisters at the Gate, where the artistic director, also an actor, is Otomar Krejca.

Chekhov's characters are transfigured into extroverts. Mascha's infatuation with Vershinin is made entirely overt. He lifts her into his arms and carries her about as if she were a light-of-love. Her displeasure with her husband is unabashed. He himself is made petty as well as stupid. The atmosphere of the Prozoroff home sparkles; the girls are stylishly dressed. The furniture looks new, expensive and French. The thick light-gray carpet, which is never removed even in the outdoor scene, adds to a sense of opulence.

Russian visitors disapprove of this interpretation and I must confess to finding myself in the same case. If I were to guess at its intention I should say the director means to reveal Chekhov in a world without shadows, his play a tragicomedy in which the characters struggle and suffer despite their apparent well-being and material comfort.

At still another theatre I saw a well-designed production—all gleaming white statuary—of Dürrenmatt's Romulus the Great, which supposes that the last Roman emperor was devoid of any wish to rule or to preserve his realm. He welcomes the conquering barbarians with undisguised relief. Though neither the play nor the production is especially brillant, the audience responded to it with a peculiar sympathy.

The sum of what I experienced at these events, apart from sheer sensory enjoyment in the exuberance of the performances, gave me an insight into the Czech state of mind. Though they are said to be more solemn than the blithe, wine-drinking rather than beer-drinking Slovaks (who have their own excellent repertory companies), I discerned in the Czechs a deep and abiding vein of skepticism. They are not readily taken in by slogans. Where there is not some sly doubt about what is being imposed on them, there is an actual resistance, at times a kind of smirking sadness.

Remember, this is the land of Schweik, the soldier whose vociferous jingoism is a mask covering complete disaffection with the patriotic shibboleths he is forever mouthing. Remember, too, that Prague was the birthplace of Kafka, whose bleak world is pierced by shrieks of derisive laughter. "Socialist realism" does not rule the roost in Bohemia. An unequivocally social play like Havel's The Memorandum is a caricature of officialdom and the gobbledygook of trumped-up efficiency. Present-day circumstances, a prominent Czech artist told me, have made a realist of Kafka.

Almost every one of the plays I saw sounded a note of refusal, of hooting escape from an iron hand. The people may be in a bind, but their spirit is animated by something independent and distrustful of overlords. Czechoslovakia has known too many foreign masters ever to put its faith entirely in any external force.

A Dilemma of the Contemporary Church

CHARLES Y. GLOCK, BENJAMIN B. RINGER, and EARL R. BABBIE

This national survey of Episcopalians offers an analysis of a current dilemma of the church in America. "A most disturbing book . . . the church has two distinct roles . . . to care for the halt, the lame, the blind, the weary and heavy laden (to comfort) and also to make the church meaningful and influential in daily life (to challenge). . . . Watch for this book." —Prof. Edward C. Hobbs, Church Divinity School of the Pacific. $5.75

The Community Builders

EDWARD EICHLER and MARSHALL KAPLAN

This significant study describes in detail the development of new towns in America. The authors emphasize California, but include detailed discussion of Reston and Columbia, two new communities near Washington, D.C. This book will reward the attention of public officials and scholars in urban development, planning, and land economics. $5.50

The Cloak of Competence

Stigma in the Lives of the Mentally Retarded

ROBERT B. EDGERTON

By far the most unusual children's book of the year. Authors represented in this first anthology in English of Russian literature for children include Chekhov, Chukovsky, Gorky, Alexy and Leo Tolstoy, and Turgenev. The many selections —verse, stories, folktales, fables, poems, and excerpts from longer works—are arranged by age group (5 to 15 years) and reading interest. Here is a substantial sampling of what the Soviet child reads today! COMING IN JULY $10.00

The California Oath Controversy

DAVID P. GARDNER

"A contribution of the first importance to the educational history of the United States. It is more than that. It is a meticulous and impressively objective record of a situation and series of events about which there has been much excited but largely uninformed comment. And even more important, it focuses on the real issues in such a way that every intelligent reader is challenged to examine his own position toward them...I thought I knew what was to be known about this controversy but Gardner has brought out the key issues in a new and illuminating way." —Sidney Hook

COMING IN JULY $6.50

Modern Brazilian Short Stories

Translated by WILLIAM L. GROSSMAN

These 17 stories present a wide range of Brazilian themes and styles. Settings vary from the northeastern backlands to the streets of Rio and Sao Paulo. A striking irony tempers the underlying warmth of these stories with a certain wryness. The pervasive humanity that marks the work of Brazil's best writers transcends the provincial; the reader understands the people of these tales. $4.95

The Vermilion Bird

T'ang Images of the South

EDWARD H. SCHAFER

An extraordinary essay on the contributions of the tropics to the knowledge of the medieval Chinese, and the effects of the region upon their senses, sensibilities and imaginations. Written with sensitivity, vividness and humor, the book will delight students of Chinese history as well as readers with a taste for the exotic. A sequel to The Golden Peaches of Samarkand. $11.00

Morley and India, 1906-1910

the real heroes

San Francisco, Calif.

DEAR SIRS: When in his review of David Gardner's The California Oath Controversy (The Nation, June 19), Prof. George Stewart fails to see the tragedy in the personal lives of the nonsigners, he is obviously referring to the twenty or so esteemed members of the faculty who fought the case legally and won. Some of these had in their pockets offers from at least two centers of higher learning when they made their fight.

But . . . at that time one organization fighting the oath had a list of 1,776 nonsigners, faculty without tenure, teaching assistants, administrative staff, clerical workers and others who had no legal recourse. I know of much tragedy caused by their stand on the oath, mostly the inability to get jobs after the episode. These were the unsung heroes of those days.

Beverly Hills, Calif.

DEAR SIRS: Phil Kerby's advocacy (through Dorothy Kenyon) of abortion-at-the-woman's-will ["Abortion: Laws and Attitudes, The Nation, June 12] is symptomatic of the irreverence for life that we have seen in the American napalming of suspected NLF villages and the Israelis leaving the overrun UAR soldiers on the Sinai desert to die of thirst.

Therapeutic abortion should be thought of as "justifiable homicide" and entered into with the same grave concern. Sex education and contraception should be widespread and free to all—but not abortion.

DEAR SIRS: Sean Cronin's "MacDiarmid: Highland Red," in your issue of June 5, was an engaging and informative piece of journalism. As one who had a minor part in the publication of the first edition of Hugh MacDiarmid's Collected Poems, I can add a footnote to his article. . . .

The project of collecting for the first time the poetic works of Hugh MacDiarmid was suggested to me by M. L. Rosenthal some years ago when I was an employee of The Macmillan Company. Mr. Rosenthal subsequently worked with Mr. MacDiarmid in selecting the poems; matters of organization, and questions of cuts and omissions were necessarily involved because of the voluminous nature of the material. Mr. Rosenthal then prepared the edition for the press, but, as a matter of principle, declined to be identified as the editor of the book. He felt that an edition of a great poet should come before the public neither graced nor encumbered by the name of the literary journeyman who assembled the collection. . . .

The new edition of the Collected Poems, mentioned by Mr. Cronin in his account and described as a "revised edition" prepared by John C. Weston, offers in its introduction some disobliging and scarcely merited remarks about Rosenthal's handiwork. Among these is his insinuation that MacDiarmid's great poem, "The Drunk Man Looks at a Thistle," was cut into sections against the author's will.

On the contrary, the author responded very promptly and cordially to Rosenthal's suggestion that the problems of presenting portions of this major poem might be lessened if the organic parts were further distinguished by appropriate titles. Indeed, Mr. MacDiarmid cheerfully supplied the titles in question. . . .

The View from Hanoi

Columnist Clayton Fritchey recently paid President Johnson the great compliment of assuming that the continuingly sharp escalation of the Vietnamese War is not a blind, mindless lunging into a void but a real campaign strategy aimed at 1968. "The strategy," writes Fritchey, "is simple: Prosecute the war so aggressively that the opposition cannot demand much more without calling for an invasion of North Vietnam or the bombing of China." Then Johnson's own gothic attitude might, by comparison, seem almost civilized.

If this is Johnson's scheme, the Republicans so far have avoided the trap. Romney has reversed himself again, and now advocates no more escalation. Another alternative to the Administration's pell-mell intensification of the war has come from eight Republican Congressmen who proposed that bombing in the Hanoi area be halted for two months. If, during that time, the North Vietnamese reduced their own belligerency, then we would move the bombing line one step south, and thus, zone by zone, as each de-escalating quid was balanced by a de-escalating quo, the war could be trimmed down to the negotiating table.

The proposal is basically faulty, even dangerous, in that success depends on what could be accomplished in sixty days (and what act of reciprocity would we accept as an adequate response?). But at least the proposal brought the war into debate in the U.S. House of Representatives for the first time in weeks—a healthy release of poison from the body politic. And best of all, the Republicans treated the public to a discussion of the North Vietnamese as a people with a point of view and a pride that should be taken into consideration. As Rep. Frank J. Horton (R., N.Y.) put it: "The purpose of this plan is not to determine who is going to lose, but to save face so that both sides can de-escalate." The restraint of the North Vietnamese was noted by Rep. Bradford Morse (R., Mass.), who correctly pointed out that there is plenty of escalating that the North Vietnamese could already have done—more terror bombings of civilians, more use or their enormous standing army, etc.—if they were as fanatical as President Johnson tries to make them out to be.

Accepting the North Vietnamese as a sensible people with an ethics and a pride is the thing most needed by our leaders today. Evidence continues to mount that the North Vietnamese make an undistorted appraisal of the war and that what they say of conditions are at least as trustworthy as the estimates from our own side. To illustrate, compare the statements made in a Hanoi radio broadcast on June 2 with information supplied either by the Pentagon, by U.S. officers in Saigon (as told to responsible journalists) or developed independently by the journalists themselves:

SEP 27

SUMMER SCHEDULE

During August, The Nation will appear on alternate weeks: forthcoming issues will be dated August 14 and August 28.

Hanoi: "The basic U.S. concept of defense is mobile defense, unlike the French colonists. Yet after two years, the U. S. aggressors' rear bases remain insecure. . . ."

Richard Harwood from Saigon, in The Washington Post, July 11: "This morning at an American military outpost a mere 20 miles south of Saigon [McNamara] was informed that only four of fifty-six nearby hamlets and only one of twelve nearby villages were under the control of the Saigon government."

Hanoi: "The U.S. strategy of local war of aggression has entered a period of serious stalemate. . . ."

Richard Critchfield from Saigon, Washington Star, July 9: "The McNamara-Westmoreland debate came as many veteran observers in Vietnam agreed that the recent battles in the central highlands and along the demilitarized zone have set U.S. progress back about six months."

Hanoi: "We have fought 1 million troops of the Americans and puppets. . . ."

Pentagon and Saigon reports: There are now 466,620 U.S. land troops, 36,000 Navy, 53,000 allied (non-Viet), and 724,000 armed Vietnamese under our command, not counting the 35,000 U.S. supporting troops in Thailand, for a total of 1,314,620.

Hanoi: Claims 2,067 U.S. aircraft shot down over North Vietnam.

Pentagon and Saigon: It is admitted that more than 2,000 planes have been lost, but U.S. sources divide them differently: 600 shot down over North Vietnam, more than 1,500 aircraft lost in South Vietnam and elsewhere.

Hanoi: "The enemy has intensified his attacks on North Vietnam with the aim of preventing it, as the big rear, from supporting South Vietnam, the big frontline. . . . But the enemy could not materialize his plan, and he can never do so."

David S. Broder, The Washington Post, July 11: "As one White House adviser put it last week, 'Anybody who thinks that bombing is going to bring North Vietnam to the peace table is insane.' "

Since Hanoi's statements about the position and progress of the war agree broadly with the views of our own "experts," it seems prudent to believe Hanoi's view of its own strength, stubbornness and purpose. Thus, when Hanoi radio declares, "We are determined to fight them even if they have 2 million troops, even if the fight lasts for another five, ten, twenty years or longer," there is no reason to think that this is empty boasting or that Ho Chi Minh overestimates his capabilities. Some Pentagon experts say that Hanoi has half a million men under arms and that there are 2 million more of military age to draw from. Can President Johnson meet that? Does he have any idea what he says when he promises General Westmoreland "all the troops he needs"?

Compared to such a wild, open-end position, the simplistic proposal by the eight Republicans seems to embody the wisdom of the ages.

What Worries Detroit

A new note of urgency has entered the auto negotiations in Detroit in the wake of developments in the railroad and rubber industry labor disputes. Railroad management's success in imposing compulsory arbitration has not only irritated the entire labor movement but sent shudders through Detroit, where both labor and management far prefer free collective bargaining. On the other hand, the 100-day strike in rubber finally saw a break on the management front with General and Goodrich giving new contracts which substantially meet union demands, but the cost to profits and the lost wages for workers hardly suggests this example as one for Detroit to follow.

The real choice for Walter Reuther and the Big Three auto makers is to make free collective bargaining work reasonably well or face the mess in railroads, where compulsory arbitration now threatens to become the permanent system.

The difficulties facing auto negotiators are not the apparent ones. Walter Reuther has raised many crucial social issues at the bargaining table. Should blue-collar workers be placed on salary? Should auto workers have a guaranteed monthly income? Should profit-sharing become a standard part of wage payment? Should Canadian auto workers, who do exactly the same work as American unionists, be longer denied equal pay? The list is calculated to raise the blood pressure of editorial writers, but such issues are not as knotty as they seem. Profit sharing? In 1955, GM and Ford offered the UAW a stock-sharing plan. The current program of supplemental unemployment benefits added to unemployment insurance is already the basis for a "guaranteed annual income." And the richest industry in the world can afford a healthy wage package, and doesn't seriously deny it.

Then why are most observers and the bargaining participants worried about a strike, and the ramifications of a strike? For the same reasons that plague most collective bargaining these days. Given the impact of inflation as the cost of the war in Vietnam expands, general unrest in union ranks is widespread, first among the young workers (and almost 50 per cent of the auto workers have less than five years seniority), and then among the skilled workers.

The dilemma is this: If unions and management do agree to give skilled workers extra money, the cost is not prohibitive—but there is every likelihood of a revolt among the unskilled and semi-skilled unionists. In railroads and in autos this is a determining factor. However, if the skilled workers don't get healthy raises, revolt is viewed as inevitable. And in autos, the skilled workers were more or less given veto power over contract settlement terms.

The painful question now is: How can a reasonable settlement be sold to the ranks in the context of current circumstances, since every indication suggests that the first package accepted by union negotiators has little chance of approval by the membership? As of now there is no answer, and a strike in autos this fall appears certain. In itself, this isn't as disturbing to the UAW or the auto industry as would appear. In 1964, when GM was closed down for six weeks, it still made its highest net profit of all time. What worries Detroit is that Washington may not understand, and may seek to impose its own view on the auto industry negotiators. The imponderable factor is the course of events in Vietnam. In any contest between guns and real wages, real wages are the sure losers. Nor would Washington like the appearance of national disunity which a large scale shutdown in autos might imply.

B. J. WIDICK

Crime and Insurrection

As the battle raged in Newark, New Jersey Gov. Richard J. Hughes declared at one point that it was "plain and simple crime and not a civil rights protest." In moments when he was less distracted by the bloodshed and looting, the Governor also spoke of "rebellion" and "insurrection." In fact, there was both crime and insurrection (some of the crime on the part of the police) in a peculiarly American synthesis. Karl Marx would have disapproved of it as severely as Governor Hughes. He warned the workers against the Lumpenproletariat, which in time of upheaval emerged from its warrens to loot, burn and discredit disciplined revolutionists. But never having heard of Marx, young Negroes conduct their insurrections in their own way, and it is doubtful that the white establishment would be better pleased if they went about the business with more propriety.

The Negro who breaks into a liquor store or carries away a television set during a riot may be interested only in his booty, but in most cases his motives are more complex. Among the looters were Negro housewives who took over a supermarket and did their normal shopping without paying for the groceries. "The brother's got to take everything he gets," one of them said. "Whitey ain't about to get off of anything unless you make him." Some Negroes deplored the looting, but most approved. Since Whitey stood for law and order, they were against both. For the most part, Negroes who have the kind of jobs available in their ghettos make common cause with the jobless, and the half-educated go along with the completely uneducated.

According to Michael Harrington, the United States spends a smaller percentage of its wealth on welfare than any other advanced country. Like Robert Theobald, Harrington favors a guaranteed annual income that would go to the poor as a matter of social justice. The average American is not ready for any such dispensation. He does not object to spending 20 or 30 billions a year on a squalid war in Vietnam, but he begrudges welfare spending even on the present scale. His creed is to get all he can for himself, and the idea that a section of the population should be allowed to live without working is repugnant to him. That they may be unable to work, or that there are no jobs for them, makes no difference in this way of thinking.

And the affluent society rolls on. The revolt of the Negro proletariat is the retribution America has incurred for the gross materialism of middle-class prosperity, in which spending has become a religion and selfishness for oneself and the family ("nothing is too good for my kids") is the lodestar of the new white working class. Relieved of poverty (if he ever is), the Negro may do no more with his share of affluence than white America has done, but until he shakes off his role as America's socio-economic underdog he will visit shame and destruction on the nation that balks him in periodic outbursts of civil war.

Chicken Coop

Stupid ideas are supposed to die of exposure, but there is a kind whose emotional vigor lends them life beyond their term. An instance is the Civil Defense shelter program, which no one outside the Defense Department, with the exception of Governor Rockefeller of New York, has been able to contemplate without embarrassment. It is so preposterous in its Gargantuan inadequacy that we thought it had been safely interred, but the Defense people have now come out with a brand new pamphlet, "Designing Shelter in New Buildings," for the guidance of the architectural profession.

At first glance it is an impressive, not to say pompous, affair, heavy with charts, graphs and technical specifications, and prepared under government contract by engineers at Pennsylvania State University; but when one peers into its assumptions the structure crumbles.

The document starts from the suppositions that in the event of a full-scale nuclear attack, 10 per cent of the nation will be obliterated (that's 20 million dead) and that 75 per cent of its area will suffer radioactive fallout of varying severity. As a result, says the pamphlet, "most required shelter occupancy periods will be from two days to two weeks in duration. Others will have to remain protected for extended periods of time." Who says so? The pamphlet says so. What does it mean? Nothing.

But that is only a beginning. Comes next the question of an acceptable Protection Factor (PF). Taking the figure of 100 as meaning you would really be safe in your hole (for two days? two weeks? an "extended" period of time?), the handbook arrives at 40 as the figure to be aimed for. "Since, hopefully," say the authors hopefully, "the need for radiation protection will never arise, many clients feel they cannot afford to incorporate high level shelter which will adversely affect the function or cost of the building."

What this means, if we may translate, is that an air raid shelter that will fail six times out of ten is good enough for the American citizen because (1) it will make him think that nuclear chicken is a game he can afford to play, (2) he probably never will be bombed, and (3) if he is, he won't be in any condition to protest. Meanwhile, a lot of concrete will be poured and the Russians may be weakened by laughter.

It is not entirely surprising that the Defense Department is still promoting this fraudulent scheme; what is shocking—though regrettably not as shocking as it would have been a few years ago—is to know that a university of some reputation will lend its name to the wicked buffoonery.

Choose Your Poll

One would like to believe otherwise, but it has been difficult to escape the conclusion that an overriding majority of Americans support the Johnson Administration's conduct of the Vietnamese War. They do so without enthusiasm, but Mr. Johnson is able to point to the polls.

Not, however, to all the polls. An editorial in the December 19, 1966, Nation called attention to a referendum which got on the ballot in Dearborn, Mich., a city probably as conventional and conformist as any in the country. The question posed to the voters was: "Are you in favor of an immediate cease-fire and withdrawal of American troops from Vietnam, so the Vietnamese people can settle their problems among themselves?" Nearly 80 per cent of those voting answered the question, 14,133 saying "yes" and 20,621 saying "no." Forty per cent of the voters, then, were prepared to endorse the extreme position of unconditional withdrawal.

The Cleveland Plain Dealer got an even more astonishing result in a straw vote which it conducted on Sunday, May 28, of this year. Three points of view were presented, one by Rep. Mendel Rivers, an avowed hawk, another by Sen. William Fulbright, the third by Dr. Howard Zinn, who needs no introduction to Nation readers. Their essays were titled, respectively, "Escalate and Win," "De-Escalate, Talk" and "Withdraw." A high government official was also asked to present the Johnson Administration's case, but declined on the ground that he did not wish to enter into public debate.

The results of the voting, published on June 4, were:

Zinn	5798
Fulbright	1648

There may have been a proportionately heavier response from anti-war readers, but that would hardly account for such a lopsided result. The Plain Dealer has no comment, except that their readership certainly represents a cross section of the population and that they have noted a growing concern about the war. The explanation probably is that it is one thing when a pollster appears and poses a question to an unprepared citizen: unless the respondent has formed a definite opinion, he is likely to take refuge in a safe and respectable "support our President" or "support our boys" attitude. But when three positions are set forth and he has time to reflect, he is driven to a judicious choice.

In most of the media which come to the ordinary citizen's attention, the Zinn viewpoint is represented either as that of beatniks and draft-card burners, or simply ignored. If the anti-war policy got equal time and equal space, the results might well be nearer those of the Plain Dealer canvass than those that have been publicized in the past. The lesson is that the anti-war forces must redouble their efforts: the situation is far from hopeless.

ENGINEERS OF PROPHECY

WATER IN A CRYSTAL BALL

D. B. LUTEN and GORDON GOULD, Jr.

Mr. Luten, for most of his life a chemist, but now a lecturer in the Geography Department, University of California, is concerned with the influences of population and conservation pressures in the problems of natural resource management. Mr. Gould, formerly a student at the University of California, is now with the Peace Corps in Colombia.

In a year of drought, flood and great harvest, such as 1965, it was perhaps inevitable that a Senator, in this case Frank Moss of Utah, should ask: "How can a nation deal with such paradoxes—with such audacious [our emphasis] whims of nature?"

Quite apart from who should be called audacious, as we increase pressure on this part of our environment, so ever more often will the environment step on our toes. During the decades of increasing rainfall, we use more and more water and, lacking policy for retrenchment during the dry decades, we take it out on some other part of the environment. Hence our exhausted rangelands, our blowing high-plains crop land. Conversely, in the dry decades we move our cities out into the flood plains and, when the pattern changes, fight the mounting waters with ever greater flood-control districts. It is not at all surprising, thus, that alternations of floods and droughts should press more and more closely on each other.

Again, since our economy grows as by compound interest, exponentially, and our water "use" climbs at a similar but augmented rate, it is unavoidable that plans for the management of water should also grow in scale, cost, magnitude and grandeur. We are devising new notions of financing which enable us not merely to defer the amortization of water development to our grandchildren but also to hand on to them unresolved and ever-increasing water deficits.

In the Far West, Los Angeles, after exhausting local watersheds, has brought water for urban use, first from Owens Valley, then from the Colorado River, and then from Northern California. In the same period, irrigation water began to be moved southward from the well-watered Sacramento Valley to the drier San Joaquin Valley. In the East, the familiar example is New York reaching out from Manhattan, first up into Westchester County, then across the Hudson into the Catskills and, most recently, over to the Delaware River; meanwhile postponing demands on the Hudson itself, because of its poorer quality.

Now, as the climax to all these ventures, and with a scope that is characteristic of water development, comes the Continental water plan. The first proposal for this is The North American Water and Power Alliance (NAWAPA). It has been studied in considerable detail by Ralph M. Parsons Co. of Los Angeles, a substantial corporation engaged in large-scale engineering and construction ventures. It has also been the subject of a Senate Interior Committee hearing under the prodding of Senator Moss. Although, because of its vastness, it has not yet been worked out in detail, and although information reaching the public has been limited, especially concerning the northeasterly ramifications of the proposals, still quite enough data have been released to permit a general description and to warrant certain reactions.

The proposal describes the magnitude and growth rate of the "demand" for water, notes the general deficiency of supplies in the arid Southwest and the increasing "inadequacy" of even the abundant sources in the humid Northeast and the Mississippi Valley. It then turns to the unoccupied Northwest, starting with the upper reaches of the Columbia basin and looking beyond to the headwaters of the Frazer, the Peace, the Liard and the Yukon. Here it sees supplies ample for its objectives. Fortunately, they lie at high altitudes and, in general, NAWAPA proposes to generate the hydropower needed to move water to the objectives, with a great deal left over, to pay in some degree for the undertaking.

The facilities proposed do not, perhaps, stagger the imagination, but they do exceed anything of the sort thus far undertaken on this earth. Some half dozen dams, each close to 1,500 feet high, are proposed. (The Empire State Building is 1,472 feet high, including the TV mast.) As for breadth, imagine a dam of that height stretching across Manhattan Island and both the East and Hudson Rivers! These dams are, in large measure, to restrain rivers running seaward in Canada's Northwest Territory and southeastern Alaska. They would create numerous reservoirs, some of them large. The most spectacular would be a lake 420 miles long extending southeasterly from well up in British Columbia down into Montana almost to Flathead Lake. It would lie just to the west of the main ridge of the Rocky Mountains, filling what is known as the Rocky Mountain Trench. Dams across the Columbia, the Kootenay and the Frazer Rivers would create this lake. It would serve as reservoir, but also as conduit to move water down into the United States.

From this assembly point, water would be moved by two general paths:

(1) Southward, first to Flathead Lake, then into Clark Fork, then under the Bitterroot Mountains into the Idaho Wilderness lands. Reservoirs and power plants would assemble water from a number of streams in this neighborhood: five forks of the Salmon River, the Clearwater, Lochsa, Selway Rivers and Moose Creek. Some portions of these streams would continue to flow westward, as now, into the Snake and Columbia Rivers, primarily to generate hydropower for the immense pumping burden in the next southward hurdle. Five rivers, the Bitterroot, the Bighole, the Beaverhead, the Madison and the Yellowstone, lying east of the Continental Divide, would be dammed and in part sent under the Divide to add to this southward flow.

All these streams would be assembled in a reservoir on the East Fork of the Salmon River and from its head a tunnel under the Sawtooth Mountains of central Idaho would bring all of the southbound stream into the upper Snake River valley. Thence it would proceed southward roughly along the Nevada-Utah border, splitting into two forks, the westerly one continuing southward to supply water to southern Nevada, California and northwestern Mexico. The total supply (see also next paragraph) mentioned for Mexico, 20 million acre-feet, is more than the Colorado River's present average flow.

The eastern fork would tunnel under the Wasatch Mountains into small reservoirs high on the western tributaries of the Colorado, the San Rafael, Fremont and Escalante Rivers, then by tunnel completely under Lake Powell* to reach down into central Arizona, but also down into Mexico and then northeastward along the east face of the Rockies as far as Denver.

(2) The second path would take water from the Peace River, move it southeasterly into the Athabasca drainage, thence to the Saskatchewan, thence into the Qu'Appelle, with a diversion southward into the Missouri near Williston, N. D., thence into the Assiniboine, with another diversion through the Souris River into the James and southeasterly out of the James across the headwaters of the Red River and into the Mississippi near the Twin Cities. The main stream would go on east into the south end of Lake Winnipeg and thence, via the Winnipeg, Sturgeon and upper Albany Rivers, Lake Nipigon and the Nipigon River into Lake Superior. Associated with this segment are proposals for a host of still ill-defined waterways connecting Lake Huron and James Bay and going on up into Quebec and as far as westernmost Labrador, presumably to provide waterways for moving iron ore.

The associated hydropower and pumping structure is, of course, enormous. One of the pumping tasks alone is startling in its magnitude: a stream of 86,000 sec-ft. must be raised 2,400 feet to get it out of the Salmon River country in Idaho. The electrical energy for this lift is a big number: 86,000 x 2 x 365 x 2,400 = 150,672,000,000 kwh./yr. To put it into realistic terms, you must know that each American's share of electricity is 4,000 kwh./yr. (0.5 kw.); so this pumping burden comes to the amount of electricity used today by 40 million of us, or about one-fifth of our total electricity use. Power transmission lines may become so prevalent in our wildlands that we shall have more wirescape than landscape.

The irrigation water might increase our cropland by 7 per cent and our crop production by 15 per cent. The added volume might be envisioned as flushing out the pollution of Lake Erie but, in fact, would be a minor increment to the existing flow of water through that lake. It might be envisioned also as postponing for hundreds of cities and industries the moments when the truth about pollution by sewage and other wastes must be faced. However, these moments will almost certainly arrive before NAWAPA. Canada would get an immense amount of additional hydropower in its western regions, where it is needed least, and a wonderful system of boreal barge ways, open for at least a few months each year.

The proposal would provide benefits for thirty-three states. Practically, this means it would cause sixty-six Senators to think deeply. NAWAPA has been extolled in hundreds of editorials throughout the country, is the subject of a vigorous promotional campaign involving, among other items, the almost daily use of seventeen prints of an attractive color film.

It was described as "grand and imaginative" in an editorial in Science two years ago. Nonetheless, to the degree that conservationists have become aware of the proposal, they almost universally oppose it. Why, then, are we out of step?

By intruding reservoirs into the heart of the wildlands of Idaho and, to a lesser extent elsewhere, NAWAPA would ruin a large fraction of the vestiges of such wildlands in the Western states. Wildlife habitat in all these regions would be modified, almost always adversely. The time is now past when one can argue that reservoirs are an asset to either wildlife or wildlands by saying: "You can't drown a duck." Synthetic fisheries could be created, but this is trivial compensation for the losses. High-density, water-oriented mass recreation thrives on reservoirs, but no reservoirs serving such purposes have yet become saturated, and the projected lakes are at the end of the line.

When it is asserted that we shall need NAWAPA, the question is raised almost explicitly whether we need wildlife, too. If we decide for NAWAPA, we should say aloud that we can no longer afford wildlands, that, in fact, we are a society of declining living standards.

No one, of course, has undertaken to compare our needs for these wildlands a century from now with our needs for NAWAPA's benefits. In fact, no one is competent to do this: we do not know what our population will be, nor how urbanized; we do not know what our social traditions will be; we do not know what the relation of man to nature will be; as noted below, we do not know what water demand will be, and we do not know how electrical energy will be valued. Any engineer who is willing to say that the benefits clearly will outweigh the costs is flouting professional ethics.

*This supply would be kept separate from the Colorado River, perhaps because the latter comes into a role more of drain for used water than source for new.

The anticipated modification of the landscape does not end with the Northwest. The Nipigon River, once the peer of all trout streams, would become a "conduit." Everywhere, rivers would be regulated; everywhere, the natural processes of the landscape would be modified. All told, flooded land would approximate the area of the state of Maine. No one can say that these modifications would serve the purposes for which they are being designed, but we can say with some confidence that NAWAPA would create more problems than it could solve, for such is the way of resource-management technology.

NAWAPA seems not to have questioned the nature and magnitude of future, especially far future, "needs" and "demands" for water. Ian Burton and Robert W. Kates, in a review of three books published by Resources for the Future (Economic Geography, January, 1964) have hit this nail on the head. They say: "Demand for [water] . . . is not to be interpreted in conventional economic terms. No one knows the . . . amounts of water that are demanded or would be demanded at various prices. Water 'demand' for the base year 1960 is really an estimate of the amount of water actually supplied. Similarly, projected 'demand' for the year 1980 is really that amount of water expected to be supplied given various assumptions. . . . [The authors] are caught in the prison of their own assumptions . . . [namely] that things will change, but only in the way and at the speed that they are now changing. . . . The danger which we foresee is that projections may become self-fulfilling prophecies."

NAWAPA's proponents have seemed happy to accept estimates of greatly increased needs. Perhaps these serve their purposes, which may well be the continued expansion of civil engineering and the construction industry. Their premises are, then, subjective and self-serving.

NAWAPA's proponents have not explored alternate approaches to the problem. The plan has been described as "imaginative," but imagination has been limited to engineering schemes for moving water. Other matters should also be considered. The first of these is the manner of our "use" of water and alternatives to it. How do we "use" water? By and large, we use it to carry things.

Irrigation water helps plants to carry nutrients from roots to foliage, and upon evaporating from the leaves, to carry heat away, to help cool the foliage. This is a "consumptive" use. No water is actually destroyed, but it is vaporized and liquid water is "consumed." But also, in irrigation, more water must be applied than is evaporated in order that some will drain from the fields and carry away the mineral salts of the incoming water and of the weathering soil. Such drain water is "used" but is not consumed.

Power plants use water to carry away waste heat. For each pound of coal whose heat of combustion is converted to electrical energy, 2 pounds burn to give heat which must be carried away by cooling water. Because the water is only warmed and is not immediately evaporated, we tend to call this a nonconsumptive use. But it appears that such water for cooling does evaporate fairly quickly, and so perhaps it is better considered a consumptive use. However, if it is evaporated, 1 pound will carry away as much heat as 100 pounds of water merely warmed. Should we then think of power plants as extravagant users of water in a nonconsumptive fashion, or as fairly parsimonious users of water consumptively? The amounts are 1 acre-foot of water warmed per year for each American, or 0.01 acre-foot evaporated for each of us. These are interesting numbers in that our consumption of potable water (0.1 a-ft./capita/yr.) is their geometric mean. Thus, depending on how we assess the consequences of power plants, either they are a dominant part of our use but nonconsumptive, or a trivial part but consumptive.

A complication in assessing and in forecasting water use by power plants is that those which are located on tidewater often do not have to obtain permits for water withdrawal and may thus appear, in the statistics, to use none at all. Be all this as it may, as long as we generate electricity from fossil or nuclear fuels, we shall use cooling water, and the amount used will grow at much the same rate as electricity use grows. Finally, the minerals in the water used by power plants will usually return to streams from which the water was withdrawn and will increase its salinity in proportion to evaporation.

Cities and industries other than power plants use water to carry away something not wanted. Most of such waste is organic, oxidizable, and perhaps sewage is reasonably typical of it. Where the water resource is ample, we dump used waters into the streams with confidence that natural processes will take care of oxidation and that salinity will be adequately diluted.

When pressure on the water resource increases, we have been accustomed to provide partial oxidation in sewage treatment or industrial waste treatment plants. Beyond this, we are now beginning to think of three additional possibilities: desalination of sea water, tremendous diversion schemes like NAWAPA, and the separation of excessively used from unused waters. Already, in southwest Arizona and in Pakistan as well, this third alternative is being undertaken. We can easily think of a fourth and a fifth possibility and, if we do not explore these and unveil numerous others, we should never brag of our "imagination."

The first of these additional alternatives is the complete renovation of used water, which means removing saline minerals and complete oxidation of organic materials. While desalination of sea water has a future, it also has some very obvious technical hurdles. The partial desalination of modestly saline waters could escape some of these obstacles and could provide more useful water than desalination. The leading process for doing this is known as "electrodialysis." If electrodialysis were combined with a complete oxidation of used water, we could abandon the entire idea of "waste water."

It is likely that our legislative agencies will, and in the near future, become so annoyed with the quibbling and pettifogging tactics of water-pollution engineers, regarding degrees of tolerance and of alternative ways of getting by, that they will propose that all water be returned to streams in a condition no worse than when it was removed. The possibility is mentioned by O. C. Herfindahl and A. V. Kneese in their recent book, The Quality of the Environment, although the authors do not hold it to be economically attractive.

How this might be done is a problem for technologists, and it would be presumptuous for anyone not intimately familiar with the field to forecast. But let us be presumptuous for a moment and note that three years ago G. H. Teletzke suggested in Chemical Engineering Progress (January, 1964) that air alone, under high pressure and at 300°C, will oxidize sewage almost completely in a few minutes. The provision of high-pressure reactors in the volume needed sounds terribly expensive, so let us suggest further that they be provided as caverns at perhaps a mile deep in the ground to make the attainment of adequate pressure easy. A cavern 100 feet across should suffice for a million people.

The second additional alternative involves a change in economic viewpoint; it is suggested simply to remind Americans that although daily they hear water spoken of as "our most valuable resource," still the speaker would usually be hard put to identify any American who pays for water. What we pay for is the management, the entrapment, storage, transport, purification and delivery of water. Only when a city has paid for water rights previously owned by someone else, as Los Angeles in Owens Valley, can it be said that water itself is bought. A thoroughgoing review and perhaps a revolution in water resources law is in order. If New Yorkers were charged enough for water itself to diminish their use of it, we suspect the income might run the entire city. As an example, too far from home, water users in the Ruhr Valley, Germany, have for years been charged the cost of restoring effluent waters to a tolerable quality.

So much for imagination in seeking alternative solutions of the problem. And let no one imagine the field is exhausted.

In the preceding catalogue of objections, we have challenged NAWAPA's thoughtless belief that no competition with other resources is involved, have challenged their forecasts of water need, and have challenged their imagination in solving the problems of "use."

Another area of objections is quite different. It deals with the matter of planning, of forecasting, or problem solving. Once upon a time, people who forecast population changes did so in ivory towers, quite separate from society in the sense that society paid little attention to their projections. Today, though, many elements of the society, in their concern for the future, quite systematically seek out all possible information. As one result, the ideas of forecasters may now influence events. As an example, it is quite clear that the forecasts of continued growth in California, by stimulating investment in public services, in housing, and so on, are themselves in large measure responsible for that growth. The prediction of 40 million people in California by the end of the century, when received with confidence, initiates a program which, it may almost be suspected, requires for its completion the presence in California of 40 million people by the end of the century.

So long as projections of resource needs were for limited periods of time, it may have been a reasonable assumption that population growth was foreordained, an independent variable. But as soon as we start talking about 100-year programs, it becomes clear that population may be dependent on the program. When demographers undertake population projections they always recognize that the essence of the future is that it cannot be perfectly known. But the engineers tend to discard the assumptions, the host of "ifs" in the demographers' projections, and are far too prone to say, "in 2000, the population will be. . . ."

If we find it necessary to make long-range plans, and probably this is unavoidable, then we are confronted with a new sort of problem—an evaluation of the effect of our plans upon the future for which they are projected. When we speak of short-range plans, they often seem to have a self-fulfilling quality. When we speak of long-range plans they seem, surprisingly, to have a self-defeating quality. Thus, if a hypothetical man of great reputation forecasts that science and technology can solve all the problems of supporting a growing population and that no limits exist to the capacity of the world to support humanity, a forecast which is manifest nonsense, then he may encourage a world in which humanity will eat itself out of house and home, a world quite different from that envisioned. On the other hand, if he foresees dire disaster, he may encourage a course of action of such prudence, providence and conservation as again to avoid the fate foreseen. Both forecasts are self-defeating.

Perhaps we shall come closer to fulfilling our long-range purpose if, instead of foreseeing a "solution," we foresee a shortage and thereby stimulate innovation, perhaps even a termination of population growth! About all that can be said with confidence at this time is that the problems of long-range planning need consideration, a lot of consideration, and by people with far more perception than engineers or planners.

Quoting from a letter by D. B. Luten to Science:

"NAWAPA is a program of bankruptcy. After the water 'for as long as 100 years' supplied by this development has all been 'used,' what next? And if we do find a way to wiggle out of the predicament of A.D. 2065, how about that of 2165? No problem of population growth stemming from a static pattern of family size and death rates can be solved either by emigration or by technology. It can only be solved by a changing pattern of family size or of death rates. Science, technology, emigration, can only postpone the issue. If the time gained by postponement is not used to find a solution in smaller families, then the problem will only have been enlarged. At today's growth rates, in each 35 years the piper's bill is doubled. It would seem the part of providence to attack the issue now rather than when time has come to an end. It would seem the part of providence not to lull an audience by telling them they may go their way secure in the knowledge they will be cared for.

"If we must build NAWAPA, let us wait until we know our doom is at hand, and when our last realizable ambition is to amaze future archaeologists."

PACEM IN TERRIS II

WORLD WEB OF CRISES

ELISABETH MANN BORGESE

Mrs. Borgese, world known as a critic and writer of fiction, is a member of the staff of the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions, with particular responsibility for organizing its international studies. She participated actively in the preparations for Pacem in Terris II.

The center for the Study of Democratic Institutions held its convocation, Pacem in Terris II, at Geneva from May 28 to May 31. A more difficult moment could hardly have been chosen. Escalation in Vietnam made it impossible for the North Vietnamese and the National Liberation Front to participate, and their refusal engendered a host of other complications. The South Vietnamese, whose invitation to the assembly had been made contingent on acceptance by North Vietnam and the NLF, had sent none less than their Foreign Minister, Tran Van Do. He was not admitted to participate.

The Soviet Union, on the other hand, withdrew its delegation, both in solidarity with the North Vietnamese and because of the exacerbation of East-West relations in the Middle East crisis. The German Democratic Republic followed suit, but withdrew its withdrawal the following day. If one adds to this the departure of the representatives of the UAR, due to the urgency of the Middle East crisis, the absence of U Thant, whose inaugural message was delivered over Telstar, the absence of Ambassador Goldberg, the withdrawal of the State Department which, according to The New York Times, considered the convocation an all-too-open forum for anti-American propaganda—it becomes easy to imagine the harassment of the organizers, forced to rearrange programs and speakers' panels from day to day, and to see to it that even those who were not present physically were properly represented so that there could be a "dialogue." That this was achieved must be counted as a near miracle.

There are differences as well as similarities between Pacem in Terris I, which took place in New York a year and a half ago, and Pacem in Terris II. The differences are both organizational and political.

PIT I maintained a clear division between active participants and audience. The participants were relatively few and came overwhelmingly from the "developed" countries. Ceremonial and formal speeches were scheduled every day. The audience, comprising some thousands of listeners, remained passive and anonymous.

PIT II brought together some 300 people: a rather exceptional group, representing eighty-two nations and including a remarkable number of former or active cabinet ministers, ambassadors, Members of Parliaments, scientists, dignitaries of various churches, editors of leading newspapers, judges of the International Court. The Nobel Laureates were eight. Among the American participants were Justice William O. Douglas and Paul Hoffman, and U.S. Senators Fulbright, Claiborne Pell, Clark and Brooke.

This group was not divided between active and passive. Except for a ceremonial opening, there were no formal speeches. Two to three panel discussions convened daily (on coexistence; on the Middle East crisis; on Vietnam and Southeast Asia; on Germany and Europe; on economic development; on international law; "beyond coexistence"; on interdependence), with four to six participants each, and several hours were reserved each day for brief interventions from the "floor." Some of these proved outstanding: Pastor Niemoeller's discussion of the German problem, Martin Luther King ("The U.S.A. is superbly equipped to take the risks of peace"), the Reverend Castillo on the dangers of the Latin American situation, Bishop Crowther on apartheid, Marya Mannes on the needs and hopes of the younger generation, and a few more.

In political terms PIT I had been basically an expression of peaceful coexistence between the United States and Russia. This was so noncontroversial that it was possible for high representatives of the two governments to speak the same language. Vietnam was mentioned once or twice, rather casually; coexistence with China was too remote an issue even to be considered.

PIT II had been planned as both an extension and a specification of the problem of coexistence. "The original object of this second convocation was not merely to continue the discussion at the first and to strengthen the ties that were formed there," President Hutchins said in his opening remarks. "Having established, apparently, that conversation among men of different faiths and ideologies was possible, the Center planned now to direct attention to what the discussion was to be about, namely, the immediate practical steps that must be taken if the world is to hold together and humanity is to survive."

In fact, however, the basis for discussion had sadly narrowed since PIT I. The consequences were graver for the Americans than for the others; for whereas the Soviet line was forcefully delivered by the Poles, the Chinese found an ardent, eloquent and learned spokesman in the now Canadian Paul Lin, and the cause of North Vietnam was adequately defended by the representatives of Cambodia and Indonesia, the State Department found no advocate for its foreign policy. "There is one point that unites us all," Kenneth Galbraith noted during one session, "transcending nations, creeds, politics or ideologies, and that is criticism of the American policy in Vietnam." It should be immediately added that other aspects and phases of American policy—quite particularly the Marshall Plan—were highly praised, both by Americans, all of whom delivered their criticism of current American policy in a spirit of dignity, loyalty and patriotism, and by non-Americans, who never degraded their criticism with cheap anti-Americanism.

Thus Senator Clark concluded his brief statement, in which he illustrated the attitude of elected officials in the United States toward international law, with a stirring exhortation. "Gentlemen," he exclaimed, "do not despair of the United States!"

To sum up: While PIT I comprised a dialogue between official U.S. and official USSR. PIT II represented a world without State Department and without Kremlin.

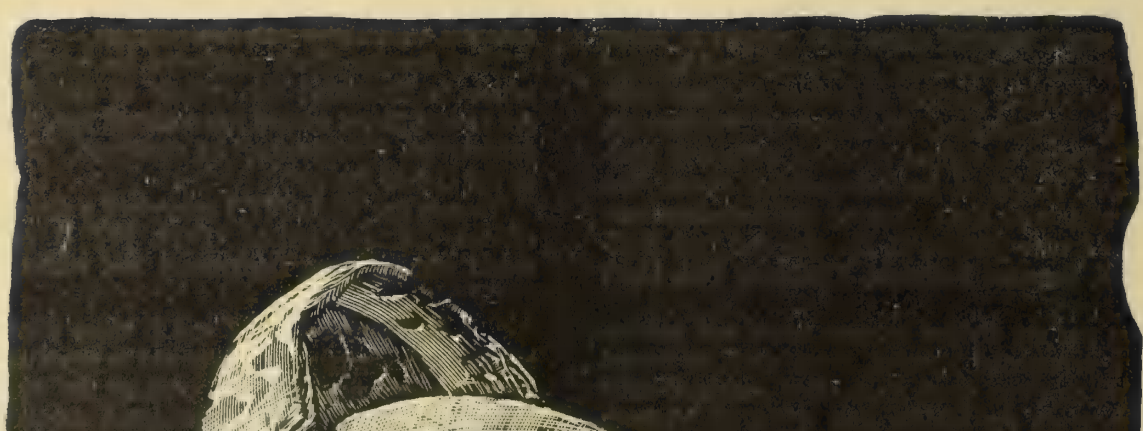
But between PIT I and II there were similarities sufficient to create a continuity and to establish the Pacem in Terris convocations as something sui generis, something that may become a permanent, regular feature of international and intercultural life; similar in a way to the Pugwash conferences of scientists and scholars.

One of the characteristic and unique features of the PIT convocations is that they mix authorities of high political standing with private individuals of high intellectual standing. This formula has been criticized, especially by Eastern Europeans. It raises problems of protocol, complicates organization, and curbs the freedom of "dialogue." Certainly it would be easier to restrict participation to those who bear no political responsibility. But would the deliberations be as significant? Hutchins suggested in his opening remarks: "Let us agree that everybody is here in as private a capacity as his position permits, that the object of this gathering is not to repeat propaganda lines with which we are already too familiar but to understand and to be understood, and to seek courses of action that the frozen official attitudes of governments may have prevented them from noticing."

The PIT admixture of official and unofficial elements is further complicated by another unusual combination: the convocations deal both with general issues, in most theoretical and abstract terms (What is coexistence? Where do we go after coexistence? Where does international law stand today? How must the international machinery be transformed to insure peace and justice?), and with the most practical, political, even tactical questions, such as whether or not to stop the bombing in Vietnam; how to judge the withdrawal of the UN forces from Egypt; or what to think about the Alleinvertretungsprinzip of the German Federal Republic.

This formula, too, has been criticized as politically ineffective. Yet to look at the universal in view of the particular, to consider practical problems in the light of general, theoretical and ethical considerations would seem not a bad formula. This is "practical philosophy." It is, at any rate, the formula of the institution responsible for the PIT convocations: the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions.

What is trivial and threadbare does not get far in such a context. This was demonstrated by the discussion on Germany—a historic occasion, in any case, since it brought together representatives of both Germanys at an international gathering for the first time in postwar history. Both the Westerners and Easterners delivered their straight party line—the West brandishing freedom, speaking in the name of Germans West and East, and demanding reunification on a prewar basis, and in the frame of an Atlantic (atomically armed) community; the East standing on the here and now, demanding, first of all, recognition of the existing reality, and willing to negotiate and go forward from there toward unification within a pacified and de-atomized Europe. If each one succeeded in exposing the flimsiness, self-contradiction and inconsistency of the other's argument, a third German, far above the level of party politics, exposed the flimsiness of the whole argument. In an impassioned address the venerable Pastor Niemoeller put the German problem into its place. Time has passed, he pointed out. "The German problem" today is no longer what it used to be. "Fifteen years ago we were forced to trade unity for armaments." Today the two Germanys are a reality, and if free elections were held in both parts, the situation would not change one iota. Those who think that the younger generation of East Germans wants to return under the capitalistic Western system are subject to a grave illusion. But that, Pastor Niemoeller added, is not really the problem today. The German problem becomes a tiny affair in the wider context of the war now taking shape in Viet-



Macpherson; Toronto Star

When Politics Are Left To The Generals nam, in the Middle East, in Africa, in Latin America: a war of the nonwhite, poor, underdeveloped majority of mankind against a small, white, wealthy and overdeveloped minority.

If indeed this convocation had a "message," Pastor Niemoeller gave the keynote address: the apparently separate crises, confrontations or interventions ravaging today's trouble spots are, in reality, intimately connected, all aspects of the same big struggle. There can be no détente in Europe and, therefore, no solution to the German problem as long as East-West relations are poisoned by the atrocity of the Vietnamese War (Niemoeller, Jules Moch and others); likewise: peace in the Middle East can only be the fruit of cooperation between the United States and the Soviet Union. Such cooperation, on the other hand, can be obtained only through a quid pro quo in Southeast Asia. The East-West conflict furthermore, in its ideological aspect (communism versus capitalism) is obsolete and being overlaid with the North-South conflict, as described by Niemoeller, of which Vietnam and the Middle East are fleeting episodes but which, in the coming years, is bound to expand in Southeast Asia, to erupt in Aden, in Rhodesia, in South Africa, in Latin America, as well as in the cities of the United States. "There will be a new Vietnam" is becoming a term of common usage. "Vietnam" is being generalized as was, at its time, "Quisling" or "fifth column." The traditional norms of diplomacy, of power politics and war can no longer be applied to this situation. It is a world revolution.

Most impressive in this connection were the interventions of the Rev. Gonzalo Castillo-Cárdenas of Colombia and of Bishop Crowther of the Union of South Africa.

Father Castillo pointed out that the problems of the Latin American countries are far deeper than the occasional disturbances caused by Castroist subversion; that "political, military and psychological conditions exist which are leading Latin America toward a painful repetition of the Vietnamese experience." These conditions include: The persistence of social and economic structures which frustrate the legitimate hope for liberation of the great masses of people; the stubborn insistence that the only solution to the problems of Latin American economy is the free and untrammeled expansion of North American private enterprise, when, in reality, such expansion is equivalent to the legitimization of economic colonialism; the permanent and very effective intervention of the United States, bent on preventing internal social revolution, and the political emancipation of the masses. The forces of this revolution are being suppressed with means quite similar to those used in Vietnam, including napalm made in the U.S.

Bishop Crowther, just expelled from his diocese of Kimberley, South Africa, spoke of racism and coexistence. "Racism is war," he said. "It is war within the soul of the discriminator. It is war within the soul of the victim. It is aggression against the human personality. Wherever racism is found there is war in the spirit. For this to become activated in the visible pain and cancer of physical war requires factors of which our human history is all too full." And then he predicted: "The next decade could well see in southern Africa the emergence of a situation which could show up Vietnam as a merely localized conflict. The rejection of apartheid by those who have suffered so long could well lock into the world-wide movement which rejects racism as the delineation between the haves and have nots."

PIT II brought forth a host of suggestions, proposals, resolutions, both short-range and long-range. Numerous, and clamorously received were the resolutions, individually or collectively endorsed, calling for cessation of the bombardments of North Vietnam. (These resolutions were presented simply as matters of information, since the convocations themselves do not endorse or even consider such motions.) The most significant resolution was one drafted collectively and read into the record by Chester Ronning of Canada, former Ambassador and High Commissioner in India and member of the Vietnam Control Commission, and one signed by all the scientists present at the convocation and presented by Linus Pauling in a stirring address. Suggestions for ending the Vietnamese War, whether Senator Pell's, those of the scientists or others, agreed more or less on the following points: (1) Cessation of the bombings; (2) negotiations for a cease-fire among all parties concerned; (3) phasing out of American troops and phasing in of international troops; (4) free elections in South Vietnam in which the whole population would participate; (5) the right to self-determination for the people of Vietnam and the eventual withdrawal of all foreign troops; (6) amnesty for political opponents or prisoners, and asylum for political refugees.

But PIT II had more to offer than such short-range programs, of which there are no lack today. Among the papers prepared in connection with the convocation was a study by Brigadier General Said Uddin Khan of Pakistan, suggesting—on the basis of a historical, social and economic analysis—the creation of a neutral Southeast Asian Commonwealth, independent of both China and the United States; dependent for its development on a multilateral program of aid modeled on the Marshall Plan and channeled through the appropriate organs of the UN. This "Commonwealth" would include Burma, Thailand, Cambodia, Laos, South Vietnam, North Vietnam, Malaysia, Singapore, Indonesia and the Philippines. Its organs would have merely advisory powers; their functions would be research and planning. The Commonwealth would be divided into two Federations: a Peninsular Federation (Burma, Thailand, Cambodia, Laos, the two Vietnams) and an Archipelago Federation (Malaysia, Singapore, Indonesia, the Philippines), with which, possibly, a third Federation—Australia and New Zealand—might be associated. Japan could play a constructive role in the economic development of this new "Commonwealth"—a role that might offer a desirable alternative to the present, American-dominated SEATO course which is up for reconsideration in 1970.

The plan is set forth with some detail and divided, for its enactment, into different phases. It was not formally discussed by the convocation (nor were any of the other papers prepared in advance and circulated among members or panelists), but the Southeast Asian participants, meeting in a caucus, discussed its main points and agreed to urge the Center to organize a conference "on neutral ground somewhere in South East Asia to study the proposal now under consideration" which would be "in conformity with the United Nations concept of regional cooperation." "It should be understood that invitations to participate on a full and equal basis would be extended to persons from North Vietnam, South Vietnam and the rest of South East Asia. The objective of this Conference would be to permit the people of South East Asia, without outside interference, to address themselves to the resolution of their own problems."

If the convocation had yielded only this project, it would have been a respectable result. For the "Commonwealth" formula, with variations and adaptations, may have wider applicability. Let us suppose that curing the Vietnamese malignancy would ease the secondary ills now besetting East-West relations in Europe. Is it absurd to imagine a "Commonwealth" that would plan and coordinate, on an advisory basis, the economic, financial, cultural, technical and mutual-security arrangements between the Common Market nations on the one hand and the Warsaw Pact nations on the other; each one of these two groups constituting a "Federation"? It is only in such a context that German reunification could ever take place, or that even the formula for a reunited Berlin, ringed by a UN control zone, ringed further by an expanding demilitarized zone, as suggested by Jules Moch, would be very much worth considering.

It is indeed encouraging that on July 14 Willy Brandt proposed just that. "I consider it worth the effort of the institutions of the European communities to try to get the Soviet Union and the countries of Eastern Europe to form a committee of cooperation to broaden trade, to promote an increased exchange of technological knowledge and thus lead to growing cooperation between East and West. This would not be a stiff arrangement between the Common Market and Comecon but a meaningful complement to my desire to broaden the system of bilateral ties."

Not that the "Commonwealth" formula is a cure-all, or that there exists any formula that could be applied to all trouble spots. But it is no secret that the State Department is today giving the most careful consideration to the possibility of creating in the Middle East regional organisms, analogous to the European "Communities," to secure peace and stability in that part of the world. The first hint of this came on June 12 from Presidential Assistant Walt W. Rostow, as reported by The New York Times. "We would hope that out of the frustrations and tragedies of postwar Middle East history we might see emerge a new decision to achieve dignity and stability for all through regional cooperation."

Development is the key to peace in that region, as in all others. Thus the convocation made its own the motto proposed by Pope Paul in Populorum Progressio—that peace must not be based on economic development but that peace is economic development. One whole session —improvised—was dedicated to this problem. While there was much, obviously, to criticize—as is well known, the gap between developed and developing countries is growing; bilateral aid breeds neo-colonialism—there was also some ground for optimism. Real progress has been achieved in a number of countries. Paul Hoffman mentioned Chile, Iraq, the Ivory Coast, Morocco, Thailand, the Philippines and Yugoslavia. "Looking beyond these individual success stories," he continued, "we can find even more significant reasons for encouragement. One element of tremendous importance is the fact that the poverty of most of the developing countries does not stem from any lack of resources but from their underutilization." A careful analysis reveals "that the developing nations are currently using only some 20 per cent of their natural resource potentials, and only some 10 per cent of the potentials latent in their human resources. This means that four-fifths of their natural wealth and nine-tenths of their human productive power remains as yet untapped."

Another encouraging factor, Mr. Hoffman continued, is the change that has taken place in recent years in "what might be called the basic philosophy of development aid." "There is now a much better understanding that aid should be regarded solely as a tool for speeding development and not as an instrumentality of the cold war or as a means to achieve a preferential trading position." In conclusion Mr. Hoffman pointed to the changing role of economic affairs in the frame of international law and organization: "Economic development is, among much else, an important tool for conducting meaningful dialogue about peace. . . . Thus one of the great strengths of the United Nations as compared with the League of Nations is that the League was an almost completely political body. But in the case of the United Nations, 85 per cent of all those who work for our world organization and the family of related agencies—and 85 per cent of all its revenues are devoted to stimulating economic and social progress. This, I am convinced, is as it should be."

Mr. Hoffman's observation leads to the final and most comprehensive of the topics considered by the convocation: the changing structure of international law. On this topic, too, a panel was improvised, under the chairmanship of Justice William O. Douglas, and with the participation of four judges of the International Court of Justice at the Hague (Zafrulla Khan, Pakistan; Philip Jessup, U.S.; Manfred Lachs, Poland; and Luis Padilla Nervo, Mexico. Are there many international meetings, one wonders, able to improvise a panel of this sort?).

Justice Douglas introduced the topic by pointing out that the International Court speaks for international consensus. Its judges come from different legal systems, but these systems have "many golden threads in common."

Justice Padilla stressed the need for international legal norms to be adapted to the current conflict "between civilizations, races, economies, ideologies and generations," and for new forms of international life and international organization to be created "which will set new norms to respond to the needs of new generations."

What was most remarkable, however, and most encouraging, was the contribution of the Polish member of the panel, Manfred Lachs. It is well known that the concept of international law sustained by the Soviet Union and its allies has, until quite recently, been most conservative. This was evident at PIT I, where American and European advocates of an expanding, progressive international law found themselves aligned against an adamant defense of the classical, restrictive concept, based on the inalienable sovereignty of national states, and applied through diplomacy, treaties and sanctions.

But at PIT II Justice Lachs emphasized more vigorously than anyone else the obsolescence of present international law and urged its "adaptation to the great changes wrought by the scientific and social revolutions." "International law does not address itself to a timeless situation, but to a grim and changing reality." Rapid change, thus, is the first characteristic of the present situation of international law. The second is its expansion, both vertical, in the sense that it tends to include spheres (economic, social, cultural) which thus far were beyond its scope, and horizontal: covering an ever-growing number of nations and legal systems and customs. The third characteristic, finally, is that international law is no longer necessarily enforced by sanctions but is to a certain extent self-enforcing: that is, as Lachs put it, "people would lose more than they would gain from a violation of international law." American international lawyers call this "cooperative international law," whose only, or chief, sanction is exclusion from the benefits of participation.

This has been a very synoptic view of a discussion that rallied some hundreds of the world's greatest minds, resulted in more than fifty hours of video tape and about twice that much in sound track, which was covered by some 300 journalists and other representatives of the mass media. Many details have been omitted, in order to stress the unity of the discussions, the description of which has taken us full circle: Starting with the unitary, economic and racial foundation of the various apparently disconnected crises facing the world today, we have come around to the need for the development and expansion of international law and international organization. How this international law will have to be worked out in practice, how the available international organs and organizations can be made able to administer such a law, are questions that were barely hinted at during this convocation. It is to be hoped that future PIT convocations will carry on where this one left off—if there are future convocations.

As Pacem in Terris II came to its close, war broke out in the Middle East. International law was ignored; human rights ceased to exist; truth was blotted out. Ideology yielded to power politics. World order is that much further removed; we are that much closer to Armageddon.

Then came the emergency session of the UN General Assembly. Many of the delegates called upon to deliberate there were present and participated in the reasoned, decent discussions of PIT II. Somewhere in the back of their minds there must be echoes of those discussions. If these could contribute, however slightly, to create that "common language among the delegations" that Premier Kosygin augured in his opening address, our efforts would not have been in vain.

LETTER FROM BERLIN

C. AMERY

Mr. Amery is a German novelist and journalist who has done postgraduate work in American universities. He is the author of Capitulation: The Lesson of German Catholicism (Herder and Herder).

On June 2, a quiet, conscientious Berlin student by the name of Benno Ohnesorg was watching a rather lively scene in front of the opera house.

The Shah of Persia and his wife were visiting in Germany; vast police preparations had been made to protect them from the wrath of Persian students in West Germany and Berlin. These preparations had, in turn, stirred the convictions of the German students, and a series of booing, placard-carrying demonstrations materialized wherever the Shah turned up. On the night of June 2, he was attending the opera, and a small police army had been assembled to confront the crowd.

Suddenly, while the strains of The Magic Flute filled the opera house, the police charged. They had a plan: they encircled the crowd rather than dispersing it. And then they began beating. Not students only but any spectator within reach. The terrified demonstrators and onlookers tried to break away. Some of them, including Benno Ohnesorg, managed to escape to the right. He was seen fleeing into a service yard down the street. There, pursuing policemen and others waiting surrounded him and a few others. A shot was fired. Ohnesorg, with bruises on his body and part of his skull missing, was brought to a university clinic, where he soon died. The bullet, it was found later, had been fired from behind and at close range. The gunner was a policeman named Kurass, well known as a crack shot on the police range.

If the incident was tragic, the immediate official reaction was infuriating. Berlin's mayor, formerly a Protestant minister and once a special protégé of Willy Brandt, displayed the reflexes of any "good German" by endorsing his police, and denying any undue brutality on their part. Police press headquarters issued two totally false versions of the incident (in the first, any shooting was denied; in the second, it was styled as self-defense) before admitting a possible malfeasance. Kurass, however, is not in custody and has filed suit against some student leaders for defamation. The police Gewerkschaft (trade union) of Berlin has been muttering threats about "ending the soft treatment of public criminals," and when public excitement mounted, the usual crooked retreat was made into qualifying statements, "impartial" investigations and general obfuscation.

But the students were awake. Benno Ohnesorg's funeral did not take place in Berlin but in Hannover, West Germany. The students streamed in and 5,000 of them from all over the republic followed the coffin under black flags. The overwhelming majority of these mourners were neat and well-groomed, further from Maoism or beatnik manners than most other German youth.

Up to now, Germany's students have not been known as a particularly active group. Their complaints have been mild, their patience with overcrowding, bad cafeteria food, lack of library facilities, astounding. Political groups had to recruit their few dozens of members from the fringes—either Right or Left. This youth had been spared the convulsions of the Weimar era; it had never seen dead and wounded on the streets.

This explains the electrifying effect of Ohnesorg's death. The first testimonials of students and other young people after the attack at the opera showed deep shock. "These policemen had unbridled faces," one girl said. (She was beaten over the head several times and kicked when lying on the ground.) These young people had never before seen the face of public violence.

And indeed, this physiognomy deserves close attention. Police brutality in handling crowds is not new and not confined to Germany. [See editorial "Was this Violence Necessary?" The Nation, July 17.] But the almost instinctive efforts to cover up, the refusal of police to face the consequences of their acts, the instantaneous "solidarity" of all higher-ups, the attempt to blame the victims for what had happened—need watching in a country with Germany's past.

Among the higher-ups, the Berlin newspapers were particularly ugly. The city's press is almost completely dominated by Herr Axel Caesar Springer, the Hamburg tycoon. He controls all but one of the Berlin dailies, the most important of his holdings being Bild Zeitung, a sheet built on headline sensation.

At one time, the students of the Free Berlin University were the darlings of the Springer press. That was when teams of semi-professional tunnel diggers undermined the Berlin Wall, when the Frontstadt atmosphere assiduously fostered by the papers nourished a parochial anti-communism. But since then, the climate at the university has changed: impatient with the intransigence of official East-West policy, eager for new approaches, the students began to favor left-wing causes. At the root of discontent, however, is another and strictly academic issue: the status of the university itself.

The Free University—largely under American sponsorship—was founded in 1949 with the most liberal constitution of any in Germany. It knew a high degree of student participation in all university affairs, but the old-fashioned majority of the faculty was unable or unwilling to work with such a liberal instrument and in the last two or three years relations between faculty and student body have become increasingly tense.

Since then, the Springer press has managed to isolate the students almost completely from the rest of the Berlin population, creating the impression that a bunch of "rowdies," of beatniks and longhairs—led, of course, by East German provocateurs—was terrorizing the peaceful citizenry of the Frontstadt. This divisive strategy has worked only too well. After Ohnesorg's death, students all over Germany started a unique kind of political action: they went on the streets of Berlin, Bonn and Frankfurt, involving the public in personal discussions. They found embittered misunderstandings, distrust, fear of open argument. The fact is that a new scapegoat has been gradually emerging. The Jews being unavailable, and indeed showing themselves such good Prussians in their recent Sinai campaign (at least, that was the impression given by the Springer press), the new scapegoat is the German intellectual. More exactly, the German student. Now, however, it is likely that the shot at the Berlin opera will echo for some time to come, and that the Shah, able to crush opposition in his own country, has inadvertently started a freedom movement in the West.

THE PAINTERS' UNION

Ventilating the House of Labor

BURTON HALL

Mr. Hall has been an attorney for insurgent, rank-and-file groups in several unions, including Painters' District Council No. 9.

In the past few months, the Brotherhood of Painters (AFL-CIO) has been rocked by a series of scandals, and there is a promise of more to come. Increasingly, the action centers around a growing rank-and-file movement, based most strongly in New York City and in San Francisco, which is demanding an end to unrepresentative machines within the union. As the rank-and-filers press their fight, they come more and more into conflict, not only with local leaders but with the top officials of the labor establishment. Every success they win points to new explosions ahead.

However, the federal court of New York gave a boost last month to the long and, until now, seemingly hopeless struggle of the house painters for honest trade unionism. The impact of its crucial decision may before long be painfully felt by the entrenched bureaucrats of "labor business," from George Meany and W. Willard Wirtz to the officials of the Brotherhood.

Until 1966, two local-area chieftains of the Painters' union enjoyed power and prestige that seemed unchallengeable. In the San Francisco Bay area, Ben Rasnick, chief of Painters' District Council 16, waging unremitting war against rebellious rank-and-filers, could count on the solid support of the Brotherhood's top officials, and on the refusal of the United States Labor Department to intervene within his domain. In New York, Martin Rarback, secretary-treasurer of Painters' District Council No. 9, whose domination of working painters and paper hangers has long been an ugly legend among union people, could similarly depend on the Brotherhood's top officials, as well as the bureaucracy of the AFL-CIO and the Labor Department, to back him up. Rasnick and Rarback, together with the Rafterys, father and son (the son recently succeeded the father), seemed for years to be the solidest pillars of domination of the union establishment.

Then both Rasnick and Rarback were hit by scandal —and more than scandal. Last year, Rasnick was indicted for the murder of two insurgent union leaders, Lloyd Green (financial secretary of the rebellious Painters' Local 1178 in Hayward, Calif.) and Dow Wilson (recording secretary of the huge, rambunctious Painters' Local 4 in San Francisco). Last spring he was convicted of the Green murder, sentenced to life imprisonment, and still faces trial on an indictment for the murder of Wilson. In New York, Rarback was indicted for receiving bribes of $840,000 or more to sell out the working conditions of painters in connection with City Housing Authority contracts. Some thirty-two employers and former city officials were implicated in the same case. The bribes to Rarback are alleged to be part of a larger conspiracy to rig bids for CHA contracts. So far, lawyers for Rarback and the employers have managed to stall the trial, which is now expected to take place this summer. But meanwhile, Rarback has been accused, by persons ranging from ordinary union members to the Senate McClellan committee, of a wide pattern of "sweetheart" dealings with employers and labor racketeers.

At this point, the outsider may expect to be told that the "honest" and "respected" leaders of our nation have been striving to clean up the mess that has so suddenly exploded in two cities. But the real situation is just the opposite. George Meany and Secretary of Labor Wirtz have come out, along with the leadership of the Painters' union, in defense of those regimes, and against the rank-and-file movement.

Last October, when Rasnick (unbeknown to himself) was on the verge of indictment, he asked the Brotherhood to place trusteeships over three of the San Francisco local unions (including Local 1178) that opposed his rule. No sooner was he indicted than the Brotherhood's top officials obliged, reckoning, however, without the spirit of the membership. The three locals, along with Local 4, barred the doors to Raftery's trustees and forced the Brotherhood to sue its locals to enforce the trusteeship. When they did, the federal court in San Francisco took a close look at the situation and ruled the trusteeships invalid, saying that they had not been established in good faith for any lawful purpose. What makes the case nationally interesting is that the Department of Labor has taken the position—and takes it to this day —that these trusteeships are entirely valid.

(As background, it should perhaps be mentioned that Norman Call, the confessed murderer of Dow Wilson, has testified under oath that a man identifying himself as Rasnick told him that the leaders of the International wanted Wilson "eliminated." Also interesting is the longstanding friendship of Raftery and General Secretary, O. B. Satre with top officials of the Labor Department.

Rarback, too, was indicted in October—and his New York City domain likewise became the stage for one of Raftery's trusteeships. The day after the indictment, Raftery appointed a "special trustee" for District Council No. 9, and within twenty-four hours of that appointment, the special trustee reappointed all of Rarback's assistants and appointees to positions of power in the New York District Council. Still more, a month and a half later, the special trustee reappointed Rarback himself as "coordinator" of a newly created "Organizing and Educational Department," from which post he has exercised all his former authority over the Council's affairs and dealt, openly as well as secretly, with employers. The New York trusteeship did, however, make one change of major importance: it canceled the election for Rarback's former post that had been scheduled for June, 1967, the effect being that Rarback could continue to rule—unofficially but indefinitely.

That set off the train of events that led to the court decision. The New York painters asked the Department of Labor to take action under the Landrum-Griffin Act against the phony trusteeship. When the Department refused—in the same pious manner that it has refused to take up any one of the more than two dozen Landrum-Griffin complaints filed by New York painters within the past six years—the New York members, along with representatives from San Francisco area locals, went to George Meany and the AFL-CIO Executive Council with a long train of grievances against their union. To speak with Meany at all, they had to catch him in the corridor at the Executive Council's meeting, and there won from him nothing more helpful than a short, angry denial that he, Meany, had had anything to do with the affair.

And so the New York painters, on their own, went to federal court against the combined power of the District Council and the Brotherhood of Painters. The Department of Labor soon came into the court battle, ranging itself solidly behind the Rarback and Raftery regimes and, when it appeared that the members were winning, Meany broke his silence of several months to declare that the Painters' officialdom was exemplary by his standards.

What happened in the court battle, aside from the ardent partisanship of the AFL-CIO and the Labor Department, is best told in the opinion handed down on June 16 by U.S. District Judge Marvin E. Frankel.

The plaintiffs, rank-and-file members, moved for a preliminary injunction on what the court called "lengthy and detailed affidavits." Sketching them briefly, the court's opinion said that > the affidavits made, and documented, allegations that there had been long years of corruption in the District Council; a long tenure of tyrannical repression by the Council's Secretary-Treasurer, Martin Rarback; management of the Council's affairs over many years for the personal interests of Rarback and his allies at the expense of the working membership; and a steady pattern of indifference or collusion by the Brotherhood despite numerous appeals by dissident individual members.

Citing the reappointment of Rarback and his supporters, as well as the trustee's failure to investigate charges of corruption, the affidavits alleged (as the court's opinion put it) "that the trusteeship amounted to a 'front' or 'cover' for retaining control by the discredited—or at least seriously suspect—Rarback regime."

By contrast, the opposing affidavits of the trustee and of General President Raftery swore to their own good faith but (again quoting the court's opinion) "left wholly or partly unanswered questions of a serious nature."

Like: "What, if anything, had the Trustee done about the alleged problems of corruption? What investigation, if any, had he made before reinstating all the members of Rarback's administration other than Rarback himself? What had led to the new role of Rarback and how important was that role? How did it happen that after years of inaction, the indictment of Rarback had led to the instantaneous imposition of the trusteeship?"

To find answers to these questions, the court ordered a full-scale hearing, at which witnesses could testify as to the real story behind the District Council No. 9 trusteeship. What was revealed casts a bleak light on the nature of the trade union establishment in the 1960s.

The plaintiffs testified openly and answered freely on cross-examination. Among them were such militant intra-union rebels as Frank Schonfeld, the Bronx painter who has been leading a struggle against Rarback since 1960; Carl Blum, the woodwork finisher (a craft within the painters' jurisdiction) who has led, and been blacklisted for, the struggle of his fellow finishers against employer chiseling on wages and hours and against Rarback's "sweetheart" dealing with employers, and Bill Papson, Frank Loria, David James, Harold Robins, Sam Winn —rank-and-filers who have borne the brunt these many years of Rarback's domination of his opponents within the union. Their testimony was in marked contrast to the testimony of the special trustee, which Judge Frankel's opinion described as part of "a train of evasive, misleading, and plainly untrue testimony for defendants." Except for the special trustee himself, no official of the Brotherhood came forward to testify and be cross-examined, under oath, as to the reasons for the establishment of the trusteeship.

The evidence at the hearing told, first of all, of the long years through which the officials of the Brotherhood, from General President Raftery (father and son) down to General Representative Harry Altman, had backed the Rarback administration's betrayals of the union membership, its "faithless representation" of the working house painters. When woodwork finishers (headed by Carl Blum) brought suit in court, accusing Rarback of selling them out to their employers (the federal court in that case upheld their charges, finding "a wealth of facts and acts" indicating sweetheart dealing), Rarback pleaded the Fifth Amendment to every question, except as to his name. Since the AFL-CIO Ethical Practices Code forbids a union official to stay in office if he chooses to invoke the Fifth Amendment in regard to union business, the finishers demanded an investigation. Under urging from Meany, so the court's opinion in the trusteeship case recounts, "General President Raftery proceeded to call a meeting—to which was invited none of the 21 plaintiffs who had filed the complaint of 'sweetheart' dealings, held by this court to state a valid claim —at the end of which he concluded that 'the complaint involved no charges of misuse of union funds or corruption in any form.' "

The evidence showed the pattern of Rarback's hegemony—and of the consistent backing of Rarback by the Brotherhood's officials. Moreover, it showed (still quoting from the court's opinion) that, > while it has dealt harshly with members who were not compliant, the Rarback administration appears to have been an amiable one for at least many employers who have not been zealous to honor the rights of union members. Contract provisions governing hours, safety and other working conditions have been violated on a wide scale. Inspection and enforcement measures have lain fallow. Members who complained and protested have been "blacklisted" by employers, with no defensive or retaliatory measures being taken by the union. . . .

Why, then, had the trusteeship been established? The first announcement, made by Raftery in appointing the special trustee, had mentioned "dissension and controversy among the membership," as well as damage to the "image" of the District Council, all due to "widespread publicity" concerning "allegations" of corruption, collusive bidding, bribery, etc. But when it came time for Raftery to indicate the reason in his official report to the Labor Department, he left a blank in the box labeled, "To correct corruption or financial malpractice," and checked, instead, "To assure the performance of collective bargaining agreements or other duties of a bargaining representative." And this became the official response of the trustee when he was questioned in court. Asked why the trusteeship had been established, he replied that it was not established because of dishonesty or wrongdoing but because "turmoil" among the members, and a "power struggle" on the part of rank-and-filers seeking to clean up corruption, had caused the Rarback administration to be "lax" in enforcing its collective bargaining agreements. It was, said the Labor Department, in a brief submitted after the hearing of evidence, a perfectly allowable reason for a trusteeship, so what was all the fuss about?

The brief went on to argue, ardently, that the officials of the Painters' union were distinguished leaders and that any worker who challenged them was clearly misguided, demented, or maybe un-American.

During the hearing, the judge repeatedly pointed out to the union's attorneys that some testimony from an international official who could say why the trusteeship had been established was necessary to their case. Raftery and Satre were easily available; General Vice President Di Silvestro was in New York City; General Representative Altman, the Brotherhood's factotum in the New York area, was actually in the courtroom during most of the hearing. But the brass remained mum..

The trustee talked of numerous reforms instituted, he said, by himself. But the evidence showed that he had allowed Rarback to write and edit the new, "impartial" newspaper published under trusteeship auspices (the trustee admitted that Rarback had used District Council No. 9's newspaper as his private organ, to vilify his opponents and distort their views, and to trumpet his own virtues). It showed that under the trusteeship Rarback and Altman had used their prerogatives as officers to hold "special" meetings, at which they traduced their rank-and-file critics and boasted of their own virtues—meanwhile denying to ordinary members the right to answer, or even discuss, their denunciations. It showed that, as the court's opinion delicately put it, "the practice of electoral frauds has continued into the period of the trusteeship," and that, in intra-union discipline, "due process has not flourished under the Trustee." It showed that Rarback continued to exercise considerable authority over business agents, and that "representatives of key employers continue to deal with him as the effective negotiator and decider, whether or not his decisions need the formal imprimatur of the Trustee." It showed, finally, "that plaintiffs are correct in their assertion that Rarback's continued dominance, and anticipated resumption of the post for which the Trustee has indefinitely postponed an election, must be plain for anyone to see."

Though in an earlier affidavit, the trustee had sworn that charges of corruption were the "main bases" for the trusteeship, he had taken no interest whatever in the charges of corruption in the Rarback regime. He reappointed all of Rarback's men. He admitted that the bargaining agreement was not being, and had not been, enforced in the area of city-contracted work (the area giving rise to the indictment of Rarback), but he had done nothing whatever to find out who was responsible. As for democracy in the Council, his actions had been entirely on the side of the entrenched officialdom and against the rank-and-file critics. Said Judge Frankel, > although his mission purportedly includes the restoration of democratic processes in the Council, the trustee has revealed that this objective amounts to "window dressing" to all practical intents and purposes. In these circumstances, the Trustee's decision—said by him to have been made jointly with Raftery—to allow an election at the end of this month only for offices other than the Secretary-Treasurer's is revealed as part of a larger plan to maintain the political status quo in the Council with the least possible disturbance and without genuine reform. The "freeze" the Trustee has ordered, considered in the light of the way he has handled his stewardship, makes his role in effect one of caretaker for the Rarback forces. The reinstatement of Rarback to a strategic post reenforces this effect. Together with the retention of the whole Rarback apparatus of personnel, it makes probable the return of a Rarback slate to all the places under the one from which Rarback stands suspended. For the membership, long accustomed either to obey or face the retaliatory power of those in charge, will be reluctant to attempt rebellion against a group now at the helm with the apparent strength of the Brotherhood behind them.

The unchallenged evidence of continued official indifference to corruption, of official "neutrality" which aimed at keeping the Rarback regime in power and suppressing rank-and-file opposition, of continued sellout or other betrayal of the workers' rights, left the court with the finding that "The primary reason for establishing the trusteeship was to maintain the status quo in the Council as nearly as possible and thwart the efforts of Rarback's opponents to achieve power by democratic means." Accordingly, the trusteeship was invalid under the law, for it "was not established, and has not been maintained, in good faith for a lawful purpose." The court had no choice but to invalidate it and order elections for all District Council offices.

But the evidence had shown that the practice ("vividly demonstrated to have continued into the Trustee's era") of "stuffing the ballot boxes with fictitious votes" made it highly improbable that under its current officials, the District Council would ever conduct a fair election. So the court ordered that the election for Secretary-Treasurer and business agents—the "entire election process" and not merely the counting of ballots—was to be supervised by the American Arbitration Association. The prospect, therefore, is that the new elections (scheduled for September 16, 1967) will finally assure rank-and-file house painters of a fair and honest election.

The process of upheaval appears to have begun already. On the day the court's decision was handed down, the insurgent Frank Schonfeld was elected chairman of Local 1011, one of the larger local unions of the District Council, despite a propaganda barrage captained by the Brotherhood's general representative, the same Harry Altman, which denounced Schonfeld as "Frank Skunkfeld," a "Commie," a "Trotskyite" and a supporter of the Arabs against the Jews (Local 1011, a former Yiddish-speaking local, is predominantly Jewish). The movement that has erupted in Local 1011 shows signs of sweeping the entire 10,000-member District Council.

Where does that leave the Brotherhood's top officials? With rebellions on the road to success in San Francisco and New York, and with still nascent rebellions in Cleveland, Chicago, Buffalo, Philadelphia and Washington, among other cities, and following upon the heels of the Rasnick and Rarback scandals, their throne—for the first time in well over half a century—is beginning to shake. And the top officials of the Department of Labor (almost to a man, former top officials of the building trades and building service unions), may soon be made to face the embarrassing fact that they have taken no action, all these years, to protect the rights of union members victimized by the Rasnicks, the Rarbacks and their cohorts. Not since the McClellan hearings of 1958-59 has Congress investigated internal union dictatorships—and never has it taken a close look at the way in which the Labor Department, a peculiarly wheelish-and-dealish patronage body, has carried out the enormously important responsibilities which the Landrum-Griffin (or Kennedy-Ervin) Act placed upon it.

Perhaps the uprising in the Painters' union will be seen as the opportunity for such scrutiny. At the least, the painters' uprising may challenge the conservative regime in the AFL-CIO—and in its bureaucratic core. That in itself could signal the beginning of new vitality for the almost forgotten labor movement.

Soldiering in Innocence

BATTLES IN THE MONSOON: Campaigning in the Central Highlands, Vietnam, Summer 1966. By S. L. A. Marshall. William Morrow and Co. 408 pp. $6.95.

JOHN N. MORRIS

Mr. Morris is a poet who will be an associate professor of English at Washington University this fall. He is the author of Versions of the Self (Basic Books).

I once knew a Marine Corps machine-gun platoon sergeant whose favorite author was Jane Austen and who kept R. W. Chapman's Oxford edition of her works on a shelf above his barracks bed. Though not a man of wide culture, he had tried other novelists, but always he returned to her. She was more satisfying, he said, because she was more realistic. Given the nature and distractions of the art they practice, it is too much to expect of soldiers that many of them should display such sensitivity to the written word. Military men are, of course, great traffickers in the symbolism of things and gestures, and salutes and braid are sometimes capable of subtler meanings than the outsider easily perceives. Their apparent unambiguousness lulls attention. Thus, when General Westmoreland, concluding his performance before Congress this spring, responded to applause with a salute, his intention was clearly to reassure us, to acknowledge as his own the traditional American understanding of the army as a servant of the people, represented by the legislature to which he seemed to defer. His gesture of respect was intended to convey that he was not the instrument of the Executive will alone but of the rest of us as well, and that he was content that this should be so. But this particular salute, suggesting as it did that reassurance on this point is something we need, struck me as implying with at least equal clarity the precise opposite of its intended meaning.

General Westmoreland was, I am sure, personally innocent of any sinister intent. But it is in the nature of any war to corrupt communications. Every war, to be sure, has its own language, which those at home can never speak or perfectly understand. But the truth about this one seems particularly difficult to tell—and the difficulty is one which it is particularly important to overcome. For there is more to the Vietnamese War than the political and moral issues about which so many of us draw confident conclusions. No doubt these are the major considerations. But for good or ill, combat in Vietnam is already and irrevocably a fact of American experience. For the increasing thousands of Americans who have fought there the primary moral dimensions of the war are naturally and rightly very different from those that we at home perceive. Whatever we think of the martial virtues, or whether we think them virtues at all, to soldier is to live the moral life intensely—or so says the Iliad. And, however dimly, it is thus that those who return from this worst war in our history will conceive of their experience. If we are to understand them, the quality of their experience as a felt thing must gain entry to the imaginations of even those who most deplore its monstrous occasion.

And we must understand. The Vietnamese are the principal victims of this war, but not the only ones. The role of those innocent Americans—I do not speak of the jovial murderers to be found in every army, including the North Vietnamese—who daily risk their lives to no purpose or for an immoral one, is, in a strict sense of the term, tragic. To think of them in such fashion is not to indulge in the pleasures of literary or aesthetic emotion. To accord them the measure of respect they deserve is to begin to see them as clearly and take them as seriously as for sound political reasons we had better do. For when they come to understand the futility, if perhaps never the immorality, of the projects in which their innocence has been abused, it may well be they, who fought the war, not we who oppose it, who will become the unassimilable, volatile and irresponsible community of subversion and dissidence.

In this effort of understanding we have so far had little assistance. Celebrations of heroism, of course, tell no truth. On the other hand, the sober prose of The New York Times almost never comes close to the actualities that underlie its abstractions. But from Brig. Gen. S. L. A. Marshall, the military historian and author of such works as Men Against Fire, The River and the Gauntlet and Pork Chop Hill, more was to be expected. The experience of combat is something he clearly understands. "Composing the large battle are any number of small fights, little connected, and sometimes at cross-purposes one with the other," he reminds us, in passing, in his new book, Battles in the Monsoon, an account of campaigns last summer in the central highlands of Vietnam. "Each is local and limited in the feelings of the men who engage. Company fights company, platoon goes against platoon. How the regiment or brigade fared as a whole is something that has to be computed later." General Marshall's business, here as in other of his books, is to make sense of this chaos, while providing us with a sense of its reality. In group interviews conducted while memories are fresh, soldiers detail to him their recollections of an engagement and emend the accounts of one another. In General Marshall's hands the result is often a narrative—at once abstract and particular—in which both the pattern of the action as it can only in retrospect be understood, and the immediacies of the experience of combat are rendered in a manner that carries conviction even for someone like myself who has never been to war. In short, General Marshall can tell us what we need to know.

But not, by and large, in Battles in the Monsoon. Many of the virtues of his earlier books are indeed present. He makes comprehensible the incredible complexity of individual engagements and the ingenuity, foolishness and courage with which soldiers respond to danger. He clearly describes the new tactics that have evolved in Vietnam. But something is wrong. The difficulty is not merely that his understanding of the Vietcong and the North Vietnamese is, to say the least, a very simple one: they are the enemy. Political feeling is not absent from this book, but it is not directed against soldiers. The men he writes about do not exercise their lethal skills against Communists but against the VC, "Charley," the NVA—abstractions that have the dangerous habit of materializing, gun in hand. In this respect at least, our army remains as unpolitical as we could wish. The real defect of this book lies elsewhere and expresses itself in a certain crudity of language—and therefore of feeling—that suggests to me, because it is new in his prose, that General Marshall's scarcely acknowledgeable notions about this war are disorderly and troublesome to him. Perhaps I read too much into his phrases, but it seems to me that the tasteless geniality with which he often writes betrays an uncomfortable sense of the moral vulnerability of our army in this war, a vulnerability which, in his loyalty to the military, he must somehow defy.

"As the first light fulled," General Marshall writes, "Puff the Magic Dragon came flying up the valley. This C-47 mounts three 7.62 mm mini-guns, today's high-polish edition of the old Gatling, each of which can pour out 5400 rounds per minute; it's a blast." Marshall is not to be blamed for the grisly whimsy of the name given this machine—inspired, one supposes, by a children's book—for men have often invented friendly names for things not pleasant but necessary to think about. But the prose sets one's teeth on edge. Note the attempts at modish sprightliness—"fulled," "mini-guns," "high-polish edition"—and that light-hearted phrase, "it's a blast." Battles in the Monsoon is spoken of by the blurb writer as "packing even more excitement than Pork Chop Hill," and for this conception of battle as a particularly exhilarating spectator sport Marshall's way with language is largely responsible. When Marshall says that a Lt. Carl V. Hunt, Jr., "gunned this blighter down," he is resorting, as vainly as a sports writer, to a variation in phrase that is supposed somehow to render the uniqueness of this member in a series of similar actions. "Bright" writing of this sort is not suited to these occasions, for it trivializes them. The language of advertising is similarly vulgar and cheapening, as when the encouragement of the North Vietnamese to defect is spoken of as persuading them to "come on over to the L&M (Legal & Magnanimous) side."

There is, it seems to me, something a little desperate and certainly disquieting about this insistent geniality—especially since it is new to General Marshall's prose. For at least in those earlier works of his that I have read, Marshall is a serious and intelligent man. The River and the Gauntlet is not only a first-rate piece of reporting and military analysis; unrhetorical, intimately engaged with its subject on every level of feeling, it contrives without false sentiment to treat the disasters that overcame the U.S. Eighth Army in November of 1950 in tones of such somber irony as to permit us to contemplate that defeat as something very like tragedy. Soldiers and officers seem always to be struggling with ignorant and admirable persistence against circumstances over which no one has much control and for whose disastrous consequences no simple blame can be attached. Battle, in these narratives, is implicitly conceived of as a paradigm of our more general situation.

This sort of seriousness Marshall has abandoned in Battles in the Monsoon. The reason, I believe, has to do with the nature of the present war, which presents itself to Marshall as the first in which the energies of our armies have not been continuous with the will of the people—even if that will, as at the time of the Korean War, expressed itself indistinctly and sporadically. Marshall's stance has always been adversary; he has always been critical of incompetence and cowardice, in soldiers and governments. (One of his virtues as a military journalist has been, and still is, to admit that some soldiers—and now and then he names them—behave badly in combat.) But never before has he felt the army he properly loves to have been betrayed. Such rhetoric as "treason by a rabble" is scarce here, but the emotion that this phrase of his expresses, manifesting itself in the new, willed, defiant "toughness" of his prose, corrupts too many pages of Marshall's latest book. When so intelligent and sensitive a soldier as he misunderstands so much, what may we expect of the rest? And when General Marshall can find it reasonable to call "some senators" "poltroons," what (on second thought) may indeed have been General Westmoreland's thoughts that day in Congress?

Mr. Mirsky teaches Chinese at Dartmouth College. He is one of the contributors to Peace in Vietnam: A New Approach in Southeast Asia (Hill and Wang).

On June 4, John Mecklin, sometime Public Affairs Officer in Saigon, published a long review article in the Sunday New York Times book section. In it he lamented that Bernard Fall (whom he otherwise praised) tended "occasionally to lean too heavily on debatable materials. For example, he contends that the Vietcong revolt in the late fifties was spontaneous and indeed contrary to the wishes of the Hanoi government."

Mecklin's survey of books worth reading on the Vietnamese War omits mention of The United States in Vietnam. Had he read it he would not have so casually rapped Fall's knuckles, for the origins of the struggle are shown definitely to have been what Mecklin suggests they were not.

There are many for whom certain unresolved questions on the war create a paralysis of will or of decision. Did Hanoi really start the war in the south? Was communism about to engulf Indonesia? Was it stopped only because the generals in Jakarta took heart from United States determination in Vietnam? Haven't the Chinese been stirring up trouble for fifteen years in Southeast Asia? Good questions such as these cause men of good will to stand frozen in their tracks muttering despairingly that it's all too complicated.

Help is on the way. George McT. Kahin is professor of government at Cornell and director there of the Southeast Asia Program; he is a leading Western scholar on the area. John W. Lewis, associate professor of government, has written substantially on modern Chinese politics. Between them they have written the most lucid and fully documented study of America's Vietnamese expedition yet to appear.

Their book is broad in scope and absorbing in detail, relying on a great range of sources in several languages and offering its documentation discreetly, but usefully.

After a succinct but comprehensive historical chapter, The United States in Vietnam covers the period from the French war to Geneva (the treaty itself is discussed with an admirable clarity which should retire several hardy myths), and then proceeds through the Diem period to the beginning and enlargement of the Americanization of the war. There are two excellent chapters on China's foreign policy (showing Peking's striving since Bandung to get on with regimes of any persuasion which avoid entanglements with Washington) and on America's other Southeast Asian involvements. Six maps, four tables, and 50 pages of appendices (including the Geneva and SEATO treaties, various NLF statements, Hanoi's Four Points, and the Honolulu declaration) make up the volume.

The essentially civil nature of the war, despite frantic obfuscations from two Washington administrations, has been known for several years. Not only have Fall, Devillers, Lacouture and Chaffard shown it to be so but the State Department's own White Paper of 1965 inadvertently proved it as well.

The question hitherto not adequately treated is the extent of Hanoi's involvement. It is here that Kahin and Lewis make their most substantial contribution; it is the subject which John Mecklin, David Halberstam and other agonized journalists will not face.

> In sum, the insurrection is Southern rooted; it arose at Southern initiative in response to Southern demands. The Liberation Front gave political articulation and leadership to the widespread reaction against the harshness and heavy-handedness of Diem's government. . . . Contrary to United States policy assumptions, all available evidence shows that the revival of the civil war in the South in 1958 was undertaken by Southerners at their own—not Hanoi initiation . . . not as a consequence of any dictate from Hanoi but contrary to Hanoi's injunctions (my italics).

The evidence here is striking, convincing, and new. In 1956 and 1957, various political groups in South Vietnam began to gather in the maquis to oppose Diem's oppression of all those enemies he conveniently labeled Vietcong. This has been previously well shown by Devillers. Less widely known, however, is that in 1958 there came into being in the south a clandestine radio, calling for resistance to Saigon and using the name National Liberation Front. In 1958 and 1959, the Hanoi Radio regularly attacked these southern broadcasts, first of all as being American sponsored! Other charges were that they were sowing dissension among classes, stirring up violence and, worst of all, creating a situation in which a return to Geneva and a political settlement from which Hanoi felt sure of emerging victorious would be impossible.

The crucial evidence for this antagonistic North Vietnamese attitude, cited by Kahin and Lewis, is found in Vietnam Presse Bulletin d'Informations Confidentielles, a series of monitorings of Hanoi broadcasts made in Saigon and circulated with circumspection among leading government figures in the Diem regime.

Not until September, 1960, did Hanoi give support to the National Liberation Front. Even then, material aid was slow in coming. As late as 1963, General Harkins (Westmoreland's predecessor) was able to state that: "The guerrillas are not being reinforced, or systematically supplied by North Vietnam, China or anywhere else." (Washington Post, March 6, 1963.)

There is much else of interest in this book. In a chapter entitled "The Global Context" Kahin's long experience with Indonesian affairs enables him to show that the government in Java, with the blood of hundreds of thousands of "Communists" still fresh on its hands, called for American "imperialists" to leave Vietnam. Foreign Minister Malik is unmistakable on this point as are editorials in the army's newspaper Berita Yudha.

The United States in Vietnam should be the "Information, Please!" of the peace movement. It is hard to imagine anyone reading this book and continuing to maintain that we should stay in Vietnam. The foundations of such belief whether moral or geographical can no longer bear much weight.

The problem of shoring up these foundations within Vietnam itself was recognized early by President Eisenhower. In Mandate for Change he wrote that it ". . . was almost impossible to make the average Vietnamese peasant realize that the French, under whose rule his people had lived for some eighty years, were really fighting in the cause of freedom, while the Vietminh, people of their own ethnic origins, were fighting on the side of slavery."

Thich Nhat Hanh, a Vietnamese Buddhist monk and scholar, is a voice from "the inside" insisting on the same fact:

> The peasants are too frightened to do anything but support the Vietcong, according to the informants in America. This is simply not true. The fact is that the Front has the support of a considerable number of the peasants because it has been able to persuade them that this is in fact the struggle for national independence. The spirit of patriotism among the peasants is very high. They are not informed about world history or ideological struggles; what they see is a large force of white Westerners doing their best to kill their fellow countrymen many of whom fought against the French. The peasants do not see the victims of the American military effort as dead Communists, but as dead patriots.

Those who met Thich Nhat Hanh in this country last year will not soon forget his modesty, his intensity or his presence. Since then he has traveled in Europe, had an audience with Pope Paul, and been warned not to return to Saigon.

What can we learn from Vietnam: Lotus in a Sea of Fire? It is unique in that it describes in the tones of a Vietnamese an ancient, complex and fascinating culture, not mired in the ooze of the dead past and inhabited not by mindless rice eaters who sporadically terrorize their neighbors but by human beings who "cannot help being intensely patriotic . . . who know very well that no patriotism can be expressed through support of a government that is in fact a puppet, created and maintained by external power." These peasants are "constantly torn between an almost instinctive support of the Front in its battle against 'imperialism' and the desire to follow the advice of their religious leaders who warn them against supporting communism in their country."

Thich Nhat Hanh and his supporters in the Buddhist church and laity know very well, however, that: "In the past ten years anti-communism has become Vietnam's most profitable business." He is at great pains to separate himself from such a business and returns repeatedly to Buddhism as an expression of faith, a state of mind, and a potent political force. The first part of his book is, therefore, a meticulous and learned history of Buddhism in Vietnam. He then turns to the impress of foreign occupation and the reaction of devout and patriotic Buddhists who have acted, he insists, in response to the call of the Vietnamese people for succor and leadership. He suggests that not until the Vietnamese are free to settle their own affairs can the violence of seventy-five years come to an end. It is to the condition of a people agonizing in decades of such violence that the Buddhist church cries out.

In July, 1949, Dean Acheson sent a memorandum to Philip Jessup, recently appointed chairman of a committee to examine the situation in Asia since the collapse of Chiang Kai-shek. In it we see the historic interest of this country in Indo-China, an area into which we plainly have not stumbled by mistake:

> You will please take as your assumption that it is a fundamental decision of American policy that the United States does not intend to permit further extension of Communist domination on the continent of Asia or in the southeast Asia area. . . . What I desire is the examination of the problem on the general assumptions indicated above in order to make absolutely certain that we are neglecting no opportunity that would be within our capabilities to achieve the purpose of halting the spread of totalitarian communism in Asia.

How falsely this rings when we listen to Thich Nhat Hanh (now in exile from his own country) reflect on quite another interest:

> The peasants are not concerned about ideology: no one can frighten them with stories of the evils of Communism. With their property already destroyed, they do not fear that the Communists will take their property, and if one speaks to them of freedom and democracy, they say, "Of what use is freedom and democracy if one is not alive to enjoy them?" So it is clear that the first problem of the Vietnamese peasant is the problem of life itself: how to survive in the midst of all the forces that threaten him; how to cling to life itself.

An Elite Conscience

LANGUAGE AND SILENCE: Essays on Language, Literature, and the Inhuman. By George Steiner. Atheneum Publishers. 426 pp. $10.

DAVID J. GORDON

Mr. Gordon teaches English at Hunter College. He is the author of D. H. Lawrence as a Literary Critic (Yale University Press).

George Steiner's vigorous new book deserves to be vigorously challenged. It is written with great moral intensity and rhetorical resourcefulness but with high-handed logic; to adapt a phrase of Henry James's, it sets our imagination against our judgment. Two large, seductive ideas dominate its pages: (a) A long-standing ideal of humane literacy has been shattered by our knowledge that Nazi barbarism "sprang from the core of humanistic civilization," and by the vulgarization of language in mass-consumer (especially American) democracies; (b) language, now in a state of unprecedented crisis, is being superseded by mathematics, music and silence, but may yet be saved by something called communism (a blend, it seems, of Karl Marx and Marshall McLuhan).

It is shocking that Nazi barbarism sprang from a high civilization. (But why "core"? The phrase "Central European Humanism" is used throughout in the curiously private sense of "uniquely objective and cosmopolitan.") And it is shocking to know that a man could read Goethe or Rilke at night, and gas other men in the morning. To Steiner this knowledge destroys "the hope grown almost axiomatic from the time of Plato to the time of Matthew Arnold, that culture is a humanizing force, that the energies of spirit are transferable to those of conduct." For "if the humanities are humane, why did they fail before the night?" Literature may even be directly responsible for inhumanity by deflecting our concern from the real to the imaginary.

Steiner would make literature the scapegoat for all human sins. But literature cannot bear so much or redeem so much. Plato knew that the arts humanize us by exercising our feelings, not by supervising our conduct. The creators of Iago and Raskolnikov knew that intellectual sophistication does not preclude inhuman behavior. (How many Nazis, by the way, were so sophisticated?) Steiner does not take the opportunity to correct the excessive claims for the humanities made by Arnold—and by Henry Sidgwick and F. R. Leavis, whom he later implicates. One reason, clearly, is that his own bent is strongly Arnoldian.

It is he who will not surrender a religious claim for the Word: "Language is both miracle and outrage, sacrament and blasphemy." Inherently it is neither, and Steiner is led by his absolutism into flagrant overstatements and inconsistencies. The only way to read a classic is to be possessed as by an epileptic seizure; he who does not read this way "may technically be able to read print, but is illiterate in the only sense that matters."

He sees the writing of literary criticism as "a defeat . . . a bleak coming to terms with the ash and grit of one's limited talent"; yet "the dominant characteristic of the present literary scene is the excellence of"—among related forms—"the critical essay." The teaching of literature is demoralized and demoralizing, yet "to guide someone through Lear or the Oresteia is to take into one's hands the springs of his being." "Language itself is a supreme act of community," but "the living truth is no longer sayable." Resembling a prophet of the Word, Steiner tends to announce Divine Judgment unless we Repent Now. "Our civilization, by virtue of the inhumanity it has carried out and condoned, [has perhaps] forfeited its claim . . . to literature"—unless it accepts the "beautiful" temptation of silence.

One surmises from all this that the creative use of language is felt by Steiner as a defiant act accompanied by guilt, and that submissive renunciation or exalted identification are strategies by which the creative impulse can be liberated from inhibition. At one point he approaches an insight of this kind: "Does the act of speech, which defines man, not also go beyond him in rivalry to God?" But he really seems to mean "God" in a literal, metaphysical sense rather than a metaphorical, psychological sense (disconcerting in a writer who does not commit himself to any theism), and he retreats into ineffability: "It is just because we can go no further, because speech so marvelously fails us, that we experience the certitude of a divine meaning surpassing and enfolding ours."

What I find irritating in much of this is the covert moral snobbery. Steiner seems to ask us to join an "elite of conscience" (a phrase he used recently in The New York Review of Books) in order to get a kind of vengeful pleasure in scorning others: those who don't suffer enough in remembering the Nazis (we must still envy the actual victims: see the essay, "A Kind of Survivor"), those who tolerate the vulgarities of democracy, and those who lack the vision to see that the era of verbal primacy is at an end and that a new era of total sensibility is at hand.

How does Steiner persuade us that language has degenerated to a point of unprecedented crisis? He trots out the familiar false comparison of past peaks and present averages: "Compare the vitality of language implicit in Shakespeare . . . with our present vulgate." (Why not a comparison of unlettered Anne Hathaway and erudite George Steiner to illustrate the progress of literacy?) He asserts, unreasonably, that buyers of paperbacks do not read them with the same involvement that men used to read books.

But Steiner's chief evidence is that certain innovative modernists, such as Hermann Broch and Samuel Beckett, raise the question in their art of getting beyond language altogether. Steiner consistently confuses the idea of surpassing fiction with the idea of extending it. Fiction that explores its own limits is still fiction; what actually goes beyond language is irrelevant to it. And the relation of literary experiment to social health is more complex than he indicates. I agree that such experiment, when it is not mere horseplay, reflects an exacerbation of sensibility for which an oppressive society is partly responsible. But it also reflects a salutary ability, partly made possible by a relatively free society, to master disturbing ideas by means of artistic play.

Steiner has little sense of language as a mental activity. "Reality now begins outside verbal language. Mathematicians know this." What can this mean? Mathematics is also a language, a symbolic system, a way of talking about what we presume to be the real state of things. Since he externalizes mental life in this way, it is only somewhat surprising that he should unwittingly describe his own qualities in his objections to those he calls Masters: the prophetic stance and underlying puritanism of F. R. Leavis; the arrogance and snobbery of Claude Lévi-Strauss; the contempt for the irrational of Georg Lukács; and the apocalyptic bias of Marshall McLuhan.

Steiner is at his very best in a handful of more modest pieces buried in the middle of his big book—on Günter Grass, Arnold Schoenberg, the Bible, Shakespeare, Prosper Mérimée, and Mann's Felix Krull. Giving his conscience a holiday, he here takes pleasure in, and lets us take pleasure in, his sensitivity to literary texture, his access to wide and relevant allusion, and his ability to phrase truisms attractively and even delicately.

But the heavy hand of high seriousness tends to stifle such pleasure in the first and last thirds of his book. He hates the "frivolity" of literary studies in the West, and admires their "desperate seriousness" in Communist countries: "To shoot a man because one disagrees with his interpretation of Darwin or Hegel is a sinister tribute to the supremacy of ideas in human affairs—but a tribute nevertheless." The implication of this statement seems to me inevitable, although Steiner, an avowed anti-Stalinist, would, I trust, wince at having it spelled out: killing for an ideal one regards as high is preferable to what one regards as frivolity; an ideal of humane literacy, carried out absolutistically, has become itself inhuman.

Language and Silence left me wondering about the problematic nature of an elite conscience.

GWENDOLEN M. CARTER

Miss Carter is director of the Program of African Studies at Northwestern University.

The American interest in Africa is almost a contemporary phenomenon. For all that, or perhaps because of it, the wealth of excellent material being produced by scholars and publicists now bids fair to outstrip that on other developing areas. Those who have been close observers of its spectacular drive to independence during the last decade know the fascination of Africa's vast variety of peoples and landscape; they know of the complex interaction between its traditonal mores and rapidly spreading modernization, of newly discovered historical records and archaeological sites, and of the wealth of music, art and literature which it has long produced. Both they and those who are being introduced more summarily to Africa through the daily headlines will welcome this season's crop of publications which includes some unusually attractive and perceptive works.

A superb combination of readable history and brilliantly chosen illustrations has been produced by the indefatigable Basil Davidson in Africa: History of a Continent. Unlike so many titles, this one does not claim too much. The artificial division between North Africa and Africa south of the Sahara that so much work has perpetuated has been swept away by the breadth of Davidson's historical scope and the keenness of his perception of relationships. Not only does he record the great heritage of Egypt, and the historic trans-Saharan links of mutually advantageous trade and more one-sided political conquest but for once Ethiopia is given its due share of attention: its unique Christian tradition; its unusual interaction of Christians, Moslems and Jews; its little known religious and secular art treasures. Against such a background, and within such a context, the relatively short colonial period falls into a balanced perspective as a great molding factor with both constructive and destructive effects, but only one of the decisive influences by which contemporary independent Africa has been shaped.

Basil Davidson's A History of West Africa to the Nineteenth Century shares the clarity of phrase, vividness of presentation and perspective of his larger book. This more limited and thus more integrated survey tells the story of West Africa's economic, social and political growth and ruptures from the full establishment of the Iron Age by 1000 A.D., through the rise and fall of empires, the dislocations caused by the slave trade, and the organization of new states and lines of trade, to 1800, the eve of the imperialist thrust from Europe. No less significant, be it noted, than the impact of outside powers upon West Africa in this period were the counter influences of massive involuntary movement of peoples from West Africa to Brazil, the Caribbean and the United States, and of raw materials to stimulate the Industrial Revolution in Europe.

Basil Davidson is a British author and journalist, with many books on Africa to his credit. He works closely with professional historians like Prof. Roland Oliver, who read the manuscript of Africa: History of a Continent, and Prof. J. F. Ade Ajayi of Ibadan University, Nigeria, and F. K. Buah, headmaster of a Ghanaian secondary school, whose names are joined with his in writing the History of West Africa. Another African scholar, Dr. J. C. deGraft-Johnson of the Department of Economics at the University of Ghana, has also written of pre-colonial Africa in African Glory: The Story of Vanished Negro Civilizations. First published in 1954, and recently reprinted, African Glory seeks to discover the origin of the Negro, as well as to identify those ancient civilizations in which the Negro played a significant part.

Beginning with Egypt, Carthage, Roman Africa, and the conquest of North Africa by the Vandals, Dr. deGraft-Johnson pieces together a story of almost constant interaction between peoples and areas that is relevant to his theme. He writes next of the Arab invasions of which the first, fired with religious zeal, won North Africa for Islam, but the second was largely destructive. Already, however, had come the rise of Ghana, founded in the fourth century and at its height fifty years before it was conquered by the Almoravids in 1076. Within a decade, the latter had extended their rule from Senegal to Spain, and pressed southward the tribes of the Akan group that today inhabit modern Ghana. In the Western Sudan was rising the Mali empire whose most illustrious emperor, Mansa Musa, led a spectacular pilgrimage to Mecca in 1324, and developed the commercial city of Timbuktu whose university was a great Islamic center of culture.

Once Dr. deGraft-Johnson begins the account of the African empires, his historical reconstruction takes on form, vigor and color. Whether describing the rise and subsequent breakup of the Mali and the Songhai empires, or the Portuguese in Africa, the slave trade or his own Gold Coast (subsequently Ghana), he is pithy and vivid. He ends this new edition with an epilogue geared to 1966 that notes how African leaders, like Nkrumah, by then out of power, had denied the freedoms in their own country for which they had originally fought. Yet he affirms his faith in the potential stability of his continent if it secures wise and skillful leadership.

Another type of historical analysis, one that uses both the approaches and techniques of modern social science, is ably presented by Martin Kilson of Harvard University in Political Change in a West African State: A Study of the Modernization Process in Sierra Leone. American attention has recently been drawn to this small country by the 1967 army coup that followed its general election and the (momentary) accession to office of a new Prime Minister. For those who are sometimes skeptical of the usefulness for practical politics of academic studies, it is worth noting that Dr. Kilson ends his detailed study with the conclusion that the post-colonial party process "leaves few grounds for optimism," and that "a movement toward full-fledged authoritarian rule in the near future would be no surprise."

Sierra Leone has never wholly bridged the gap between its Creole community in the peninsula area—descendants, like the Americo-Liberians, of freed slaves—and the indigenous Africans in the hinterland. Both, though to varying degrees, experienced the revolutionary effect of the colonial system in creating social and economic change, and ultimately political participation. Educational institutions were established relatively early for West Africa—Fourah Bay College, now the University of Sierra Leone, dates back to 1827—but Creoles and outsiders long received almost all the advantage from them. Yet, unlike Liberia, those from the hinterland became the dominant political influence, and it was they who carried Sierra Leone to independence. The interaction of many subtle and significant factors in this complicated equation are skillfully analyzed by Dr. Kilson in what is likely to become a basic study.

Moving from West to East Africa, a massive and comprehensive collection of articles entitled The Transformation of East Africa: Studies of Political Anthropology, and edited by Stanley Diamond and Fred G. Burke for the Eastern Africa program of Syracuse University, brings together a wide range of studies of historical, political, economic and social factors affecting this huge area. Arising out of papers for a faculty-student seminar on Problems of Nation-Building in East Africa, this work is a useful compendium of background material.

The last two books to be considered here are very different in their purpose and their presentation, but both deal with the area often termed "the white redoubt" because of its refusal to yield to the pressures of African nationalism. R. J. Hammond, in his competent and illuminating Portugal and Africa, 1815-1910: A Study in Uneconomic Imperialism, focuses on Portuguese policies and attitudes concerning Africa, especially those affected by British policies and attitudes in that period. He contributes materially thereby to an understanding of one of the great paradoxes of colonialism in Africa: why by far the weakest of colonial powers is the only one to continue to dominate large areas of that continent, notably Angola and Mozambique, and even to retain its hold on Portuguese Guinea in West Africa.

Other studies, already referred to in this review, have pointed out the early outreach of Portugal—so isolated geographically on the European continent—to Africa and beyond. These contacts, its long-standing territorial claims in Africa, and their translation into colonial control in the 19th century have been coupled with as yet unshaken Portuguese determination to retain what they have acquired. Whatever judgment one may make on the Portuguese brand of colonialism—United Nations censures of its racial policies, in which the United States has joined, and fighting by African nationalist forces within all Portuguese-controlled areas, illustrate how widespread is the opposition—it is important to understand the basis of its strength. Professor Hammond, an economist at the Food Research Institute at Stanford University, has added materially to the all too slight body of information on the views the Portuguese themselves have held on imperial issues, and provides new insight into the period with which he primarily deals for the contemporary scene.

Nathan Shamuyarira's Crisis in Rhodesia is the most personal, and the most pressing of the books in this review. It provides a detailed, highly readable account both of the inequities in the distribution and use of land, life in the towns, education, and political opportunities suffered by the majority Africans in Rhodesia (who outnumber the resident and dominant whites by sixteen to one) and of the rise and course of the African nationalist movement. Shamuyarira, editor of The African Daily News from 1956 to 1963, and thereafter a lecturer at the University College in Salisbury, Rhodesia, left his country to study for a Ph.D. at Princeton University just six hours before the police arrived at his home with a warrant for his arrest. The most telling commentary on the built-in color discrimination in Rhodesia, with its resultant waste of human resources, is that because he is working for African political rights there is, in his country, no place but jail for a man of Shamuyarira's intelligence, experience and integrity. [See "Eleventh Hour in Rhodesia" by N. M. Shamuyarira, The Nation, November 8, 1965.]

Africa includes sharp contrasts within and between its countries and areas. We are fortunate that so many serious yet readable studies are being published to enable us to view its vast panorama with more perspective and more balance. This dynamic continent more than repays all efforts to understand the history, the struggles and the aims of its many and varied peoples.

THEATRE IN EUROPE IV

HAROLD CLURMAN

Berlin

The theatre in West Berlin is well supplied with new and old texts from the drama of all lands. It is thoroughly sound in orthodox techniques, established and rich with honor in the community. But I was more interested in the theatre of East Berlin because of the sharp difference between what one may see there and what one sees in New York, London, Paris and West Berlin itself. I refer to the Komische Oper ("Comic Opera"), to some extent to the Deutches Theater (whose production of the picturesque Soviet allegory The Dragon I saw last year) and, of course, to the world-renowned Berliner Ensemble.

What struck me in the productions of East Berlin, as it had in Prague, was the sheer sense of play: the exhilaration in the variety of physical action, color and movement, by which meaning may be conveyed. When I saw Topol's Cat on the Rails in Prague, for instance, I seemed to "get" even more of its quality and message without knowledge of the Czech language than I did when I read the script in a good English translation by George Voskovec. In Prague and East Berlin the stage action is speech.

Hence my conjecture that the great Russian director, Meyerhold, for a long time taboo in the Soviet Union because of his "formalism," was probably the indirect influence on the theatres of Prague and to some degree of East Berlin. Meyerhold said that "Words in the theatre are only a design on the canvas of motion." This was not meant to be taken literally (though it is true that he tampered with texts—including those of the "classics"—a practice held to be heretical). It is obvious that Brecht, the founder and leader of the Berliner Ensemble, couldn't have minimized the importance of writing in the theatre (he was above all a poet), but the emphasis on the plastics of movement, the almost choreographic treatment of groups and of individual performances, scenic business, tricks and turns are among the most striking features in the theatre of both East Berlin and Prague. This is theatrical theatre, where playing is the play and the text is not altogether the thing.

I attended the first night of a new mounting of Verdi's La Traviata at the Komische Oper. Its director, Walter Felsenstein, a resident of West Berlin, rehearses his operatic productions for many months. The Komische Oper, like other theatres in East Berlin, is subsidized by the government.

Opera under Felsenstein is endowed with an authentic dramatic life. The actors do not deliver their arias from stage center, face front, with an eye on the conductor. They are characters of a drama which is not sliced into set pieces, and they move and act in accordance with dramatic necessity.

Every role is individualized. In the gambling and ballroom episodes of La Traviata, for example, there are no "supers": one can "read" each character among the guests, follow the line of each person's special behavior and yet discern the pattern of the whole. All this in settings perfect in taste, exquisite in opulence (where demanded) and, best of all, expressive of style and content.

During the penultimate moments of the death scene in La Traviata one catches glimpses of the whole course of Violetta's and Alfred's history—particularly the former festivities—in brilliant miniature. The juxtaposition of these sparkling fragments of the past and the approach of death adds irony to pathos. To see a Felsenstein production is to suspect that opera might be the greatest of theatrical forms. This surely is "total theatre."

The productions at the Berliner Ensemble are no less totally theatrical. Three elements prevail at the Ensemble which we rarely find in Brecht productions elsewhere: elegance, charm and abundantly raffish humor. The actors move in grace and laughter while, at the same time, preserving a certain proletarian plainness without a trace of coarseness.

That such attributes should mark the production of The Threepenny Opera is perhaps not surprising, but that they should also appear in The Bakery, considering the play's subject matter, is astonishing. The script was composed by Brecht's "heirs" from scenes only partly finished in 1929-30. It is a propaganda play in the playwright's "epic" style, dealing with the economic hardships of the period. The atmosphere is steeped in the dull gray of poverty. Yet there is no heaviness at all in the staging, but great charm, while the drabness of the circumstances presented is transformed into a spectacle of subtle, visual interest, even beauty. In nearly all discussions of the Ensemble its purely aesthetic aspect is overlooked. Externally, the Oriental, particularly the Japanese theatre, has served as an inspiration for effects which seem to have been born in Berlin.

My intention at the moment is not to describe the productions of The Threepenny Opera or of Man Is Man. What concerns me now are matters of principle and instruction which may be extrapolated from the experience of having seen them.

Nowhere in the Western world is such "teamwork" to be seen as at the Ensemble. There are several remarkably fine actors in the company (one of them plays the central role in Man Is Man), but the productions are so much of a piece that I very nearly forgot to look at the programs to learn their names. The productions are so wholly integrated that one hardly thinks of individual persons or passages. They are "works" in which acting, design, direction, seem to have been created by a single artist—not the dramatist, the director, this or that actor but all of them as One. They have created something greater than the sum of its parts. This is the perfection of theatre craft.

It is important to remember that these productions (The Bakery, The Threepenny Opera, Man Is Man) postdate Brecht's death in 1956. They are the work of young directors trained at the Ensemble. It should be remarked that the latest success at the Ensemble is a production of O'Casey's Purple Dust. The Ensemble is not a one-dramatist theatre.

There is a general significance in these bits of information. For what I persist in calling "true Theatre" is not a display of great personalities, geniuses and stars of whatever sort but a unified effort that represents something more than its component individuals. Of geniuses and personalities we in the United States have our share; they come out seasonally. One way of recognizing a true Theatre is that its value extends beyond the brilliance of its immediate personnel.

The Moscow Art Theatre, for example, founded in 1898 by Stanislavsky and Nemirovitch-Danchenko, has exercised an enormous influence on the modern Russian theatre (and elsewhere) long after its prestige was established and after its founders' deaths. This did not come about solely through the eminence of the parent organization (the Moscow Art Theatre is now considered "a museum" by many Russians and others) but through the students of its ideas and practices in many independent and frequently aesthetically divergent groups.

Similarly, the Berliner Ensemble, indisputably Brecht's creation, now retains its vitality through the development of principles and procedures bequeathed by him and put to use by people of a later generation for new audiences. A Theatre is not so much the product of a talent as of a concept, a ruling idea. Through its seminal power it survives those who plant it. A true Theatre inspires not only dedication to its idea but generates a common way of work, a fundamental technique, a characteristic style. A Theatre is the expression of a culture or at least a powerful current within a community. Indeed, it is not too much to say that a Theatre may contribute to the formation of a culture, a statement supported by many historical precedents.

When the Berliner Ensemble moved into the delightful old playhouse where in 1928 The Threepenny Opera was first produced, the following lines (written by Brecht) were inscribed on a plaque in the lobby as an indication of the Ensemble's spirit: "The Berliner Ensemble is about to give its plays amid ruins. These performances will be staged in this beautiful building not only for pastime but to have audience and company together establish a harmonious 'us': so that this House and much else besides may stand fast."

Attendance at the Ensemble is now greater than when I first visited it in 1956. Every performance I attended was sold out. The audience, it seemed to me, was composed largely of young folk. It is also noteworthy that while the people in the streets of East Berlin are for the most part shabbily attired, they come to the theatre almost formally dressed, as for a festive occasion.

Another interesting sidelight: the Alfred of La Traviata at the Komische Oper was an American from Atlanta, Ga. He is not a "defector" but an alien resident of West Berlin, permitted to work with Felsenstein in East Berlin. The day I was informed of this I encountered Carl Ebert, whom I had first met in Los Angeles where he lives. I asked him what he was doing in Berlin. He told me he was staging Stravinsky's The Rake's Progress at the West Berlin Opera House. I inquired whether he was satisfied with his cast. "It's very good," he replied, "the three leads are Americans." Our country, I repeat, suffers no lack of talent.

THREE POEMS AGAINST VIOLENT DEATH

I

A nail. Twist it and it breaks.
Screw it slowly and the juice rusts it away.
But hammer it, and the nail grows,
Blackening the earth. It becomes a huge nail,
Driven through the leaves,
Bigger than whole cities.

II

On a road near Da Nang, twenty young men
Scrape their legs and die.
They dream of becoming wet flowers
That hang in the trees over their heads.
They dream of twisting their soft bodies
Around a bush, where they could lie for months
Turning brown, cracking at the sides,
But under the tanned bark would be a stubborn
Green thread. But now they scrape at the ground
And bite it with their teeth. While, behind
The trees the horizon walks up and down
On legs of yellow lights, and the planes
Know themselves, and are very clean.

III

America shakes the bombers from her hair.
There are men in the streets, but who can See them? Men in Chicago and in Vietnam.
While the President walks in our houses;
No one on the street can talk more softly.
Stars listen, sharpened and deadly;
For the ceremony has awakened inside of bullets.
Its corroding cloth has been fitted for trees
And flesh; for women whose youth will be scalded
Like an egg. In Asia men scrape at the ground/With a fire
In their minds and their bodies burning.
America shakes the bombers from her hair.
No one on the street can talk more softly.

Individuals Against the Crime of Silence

A Declaration To Our Fellow Citizens Of The United States, To The Peoples Of The World, And To Future Generations:

1 We are appalled and angered by the conduct of our country in Vietnam.

2 In the name of liberty, we have unleashed the awesome arsenal of the greatest military power in the world upon a small agricultural nation, killing, burning and mutilating its people. In the name of peace, we are creating a desert. In the name of security, we are inviting world conflagration.

3 We, the signers of this declaration, believe this war to be immoral. We believe it to be illegal. We must oppose it.

4 At Nuremberg, after World War II, we tried, convicted and executed men for the crime of OBEYING their government, when that government demanded of them crimes against humanity. Millions more, who were not tried, were still guilty of THE CRIME OF SILENCE.

5 We have a commitment to the laws and principles we carefully forged in the AMERICAN CONSTITUTION, at the NUREMBERG TRIALS, and in the UNITED NATIONS CHARTER. And our own deep democratic traditions and our dedication to the ideal of human decency among men demand that we speak out.

We Therefore wish to declare our names to the office of the Secretary General of the United Nations, both as permanent witness to our opposition to the war in Vietnam and as a demonstration that the conscience of America is not dead.

On September [illegible] 1965 a Memorandum of Law was incorporated in the Congressional Record of the 89th Congress of the United States of America in which eight leading American attorneys, after careful analysis of our position and actions in the Vietnam War, came to the conclusion that we are violating the following accords: The Charter of the United Nations, The Geneva Accords of 1954, the United States Constitution.

To Protest—To Object—To Dissent has long been an American tradition. The following are a few among the many who have signed this declaration to be on permanent record.

The Three Revolutions

As the newscaster finishes his graphic account of the shooting and looting in Omaha, or Chicago, Boston, Tampa, Cincinnati, Atlanta, Kansas City, Buffalo, Rochester, Minneapolis, Milwaukee, Newark, Detroit, Providence (the list is necessarily incomplete) the network swings into the commercial, urging the listeners-lookers to fly on Pan American because, among other vital reasons, the meals come from Maxim's of Paris. This juxtaposition, or the opposing inducements of TWA, radiate with the speed of light to whatever U.S. city is on the verge, or in the throes, of riot. There is no connection between any particular enticement to the good life of the credit card and the expense account, and any particular riot, but the general relationship is clear and need not await the Presidential commission's report.

The American dilemma is that it is the wealthiest country in the world and the most addicted to the pursuit of luxury, yet it contains some desperately poor people. This is the formula for social revolution, which we now see in its early, inchoate stages. Social revolution is a potentially creative process, but disagreeable and frightening. It evokes two types of response. One is likewise creative, in that it seeks to remove the causes of injustice and discontent. The other is counterrevolution in its classical form—the use of force to keep the status quo.

Poverty is of course widespread in the United States and crosses race lines. According to a survey sponsored by the Social Security Administration, at least half of all retired persons exist below the poverty level. These millions, black and white, are excluded from the "gains of "productivity" enjoyed by workers and investors.

Fortunately, beneficiaries of old-age "security," such as it is, are no longer fit for riot duty. But the chronically unemployed young men of the Negro ghettos are. They are not resigned to their nether role in the Great Society, and being despised as well as poor gives them the additional stimulus to fight, often in repulsive ways. It also lends a racist appearance to their insurrections—class conflict in the guise of race conflict.

Some semantic political distinctions are involved here. It suits the President's political purposes not to acquiesce in Governor Romney's contention that the biggest riots so far, those in Detroit, sprang from "national" causes—as if a score of eruptions, large and small, extending from Boston to Portland, Ore., could be anything but national. Mr. Johnson perhaps has got himself off the hook—for now—with his commission, but this does not quiet discussion. Some liberal middle-of-the-roaders—Governor Rockefeller for instance—keep talking because they seek solutions for the basic problems. With a different class approach, social revolutionists are striving for the same objectives. The history of past revolutions shows that though many men of good will have tried to reform society in a desperate situation, they have seldom succeeded in mediating between the revolutionary hotheads and the inplacable counterrevolutionary interests.

The latter, in the current American impasse, see only a conspiracy that will fit their particular form of paranoia—or the use of paranoid disguises for a future seizure of power. In the mildest form, these groups (which include Negroes) blame "agitators" from outside their city, still better outside the state, best of all outside the country. Thus the Episcopal bishop of upper North Carolina, the Rt. Rev. John A. Pickney, is reported by The New York Times (July 31) as viewing the rioting as "part of a Communist plot to take over the world." So far, most inflamed Negroes seem to be satisfied to take over a fifth of blended whiskey or a TV set and, despite Stokely Carmichael's sojourn in Havana, they show no signs of embracing "international Communism." There is, however, some substance to the apprehensions, real or pretended, of the promoters of this latter-day Red scare. Sooner or later, sporadic local uprisings are pretty sure to escalate into action organized on a national scale with some degree of liaison and discipline instead of extemporaneous looting. And then what?

Mayor Cavanagh of Detroit, less imperturbable than he used to be, would rely on a federal anti-riot force of 1,000 men in each major city. Viewed from a purely military standpoint (which is the way many white backlashers view it) the present city, state and federal forces seem adequate for what these people want, which is only to keep the rioters and marauders out of white neighborhoods, residential and commercial. As long as this can be done, riots—even in their own cities—are of little concern to most whites. The situation may change when Negro veterans return en masse from Vietnam or a bigger war, but generally those of the white majority who do not own property in black neighborhoods seem to have little to worry about in that line.

Nevertheless, the Presidential commission will have to come up with remedies for the Negro revolution, and unofficial thoughts along these lines will continue to be offered. For instance, in a full-page advertisement in The New York Times (August 1) Life, first declaring its horror at the prospect of an armed white backlash, calls for stronger police action against rioters and no concessions that would only whet the appetites of the rioters for more of the same. Life feels that economic, political and social reform should hold to the present sedate pace.

In this view, the urgent need is for firmness. When firmness has achieved its objective—the dissociation of the respectable Negro community from the rioters—white Americans will have a duty and opportunity. "In a thousand ways," says Life, "they can make it clear that they respect and even cherish their Negro fellow citizens. . . . If white America cleared its conscience on this fundamental point (whether whites will or will not accept Negroes 'to full membership in U.S. society') the police power undoubtedly would feel free to deal less timorously with riot and arson."

White America has been answering that question for some time and it is doubtful whether the 1967 riots have changed anything, except to make white America more inclined to get away from black America. In the same issue of the Times in which the Life ad appeared, an exhaustive survey by Steven V. Roberts noted the "disastrous" upward trend of apartment rents in New York City. One of the reasons: "White people are willing to live in fewer and fewer areas of the city." The desired areas are those that are not only fully segregated, but "insulated" against integration. Those white New Yorkers that can afford it want to live in a lily-white neighborhood with a buffer of the less fortunate in racially mixed areas between them and the black neighborhoods. For the most part, the whites in these semi-integrated neighborhoods would migrate to the fully unintegrated neighborhoods if they had the money.

Events and trends leave little doubt that if white America is to accept, much less cherish, black America, it will amount to a social revolution. There is no indication that any such regeneration is in prospect.

Another kind of revolution is more likely. For almost the first time since the cold war began eviscerating the American ethos some twenty years ago, the word "Fascist" is appearing in respectable print as a possible development. The racial (or class) situation is fairly desperate, and by all indications will get worse. The one hope of a reformist solution lies in an early end of the Vietnamese War. But at his July 31 press conference the President, in reply to a delicately phrased question, replied bluntly that we are rich enough to sustain the war and spend for welfare at home. As he put it: "I would hope that not many people would feel that because we have a problem at home is any indication that we would ignore or surrender our interests abroad."

Mr. Johnson either does not foresee a swing toward fascism in the United States, or he is willing to take his chances. He evidently agrees with the argument that because the war has not reduced federal spending on poverty, it has no connection with the Negro insurrection. This flies in the face of two salient facts. One is that spending to alleviate poverty was never anywhere nearly high enough even before the Johnson escalations. The present ratio is $2 billion for the war on poverty to $27 billion for the war in Vietnam, and the war has given a purblind House of Representatives leverage to oppose increases for welfare, if not to cut it to a still more inadequate level. The other consideration is that dollar totals do not reflect skilled manpower, always in short supply, and material resources. Surgeons who are attending American wounded in Southeast Asia could be operating in U.S. hospitals, construction firms that are building U.S. bases in Vietnam and Thailand could be clearing slums in the United States, and so on.

Three revolutions are in play. The one that is at its beginning is the Negro revolution. The one that shows no sign of developing is a responsive moral and social revolution involving an abnegation of white supremacy. The present odds are on the Fascist revolution, although it too is in an early and perhaps still reversible stage. But, as the radio commentators used to say in the 1930s, it is later than you think.

Politics As Usual

Pressed for pronouncements on the Detroit rioting, Ray Girardin, the police commissioner, countered with: "Maybe I should be denouncing all lawbreakers and looters and making fiery speeches, but I'd rather spend my time finding out why they did what they did." This spirit of sober inquiry is in striking contrast to most of the statements made by prominent politicians from the beginning of the Newark disorders to the end of the trouble in Detroit—although it is not really ended there or in any other American city where Negroes and whites live in different sections and in a state of smoldering hostility.

The prize for the most irresponsible comment on the situation was won handily by the Republican Coordinating Committee with its blast of July 24 at the President. The New York Times, which rarely deviates from moderation in its editorial expression, called the GOP press release a "flagrant outrage," "the most transparent kind of seedy politics," a "shabby statement" at an "execrable level" of politics, "replete with demagogic tales." This last referred to the assertion that "factories for the manufacture of Molotov cocktails have been uncovered by the police," and "hate mongers are traveling from community to community inciting insurrection." Challenged on the Molotov cocktail story, Senator Dirksen walked out of the press conference which had been called to launch the statement; later, J. Edgar Hoover—surely not one to overlook organized subversion—testified that he had no intelligence on which to base a conclusion of conspiracy.

The GOP statement was not something tossed off by a publicity man with an overheated imagination. It was composed by former Gov. Thomas E. Dewey, Rep. William C. Cramer of Florida, and Gov. John A. Love of Colorado. It was approved unanimously by the entire coordinating committee at an all-day meeting. The committee includes Ray Bliss, the Republican national chairman, General Eisenhower, four former Republican Presidential nominees, sixteen Congressional leaders, eight governors and six members of the National Committee. President Johnson, by his own politicking in connection with Governor Romney's request for federal troops, certainly provoked partisanship by the Republicans, but nothing could excuse laying the entire blame on the President for a situation which has been allowed in both parties to fester since the failure of Reconstruction after the Civil War.

Responsible Republicans were shocked by the GOP statement and hastened to dissociate themselves from it. But it was no more blatant than many of the other reactions to the riots. Governor Reagan called the rioters "mad dogs." Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D., Va.) called for control by "brutal force"—and this was said after there had been time for reflection. Another disquieting development is the manner in which the chief Congressional inquiry into the riots was turned over to Sen. John L. McClellan's Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations. Sen. John Sherman Cooper (R., Ky.) fought to include in the empowering resolution authorization to search for "economic and social" factors. His proposal was rejected by a vote of 6 to 2, with some members of the committee arguing that stress on social factors would amount to "condoning lawlessness." Unless wiser heads on the committee can bring influence to bear, the prospect is for an inquiry patterned on the one which dealt with Mafia-style criminality, competing with the old-style Red hunt of Senator Eastland's subcommittee.

The cardinal trouble with old-fashioned politicking in the situation now confronting the country is not only its inhumanity but its certain ineffectiveness. In its external military operations, in space exploration and technology generally, the United States is the marvel of the ages. But the Negro insurrection is a warning of its internal weakness. Its white majority has been indifferent to the accumulated grievances which have led to the growth of a bitterly disaffected black minority. To attempt to treat a national illness of such gravity with politically motivated proposals is sheer quackery. Sober self-examination is in order. On a visit to Cuba, James Reston wrote that with all the faults of the Castro regime, "there is a sense of common life and purpose." Why is that lacking here? These are the kinds of questions to which politicians should be seeking the answers.

Sic Transit Charlie

In his advancing age, Charles de Gaulle has been tripped by his sense of history. The flagship Colbert, as it sailed up the St. Lawrence River, led him to a shore where he was met by an incredibly enthusiastic welcome, fit for a king. And indeed a king he was—for a day. The shadows of his French ancestors in Quebec and their sons of today may well have mingled in his mind with the memory of the crowds idolizing him at the liberation of Paris. It would be sad, though, and too easy, to ascribe the unprecedented, undiplomatic behavior of the French President to the sentimentality of a great man growing old. That would be entirely out of character.

General de Gaulle has always followed the lead of history by pushing it along, and not too gently at that. He has always known where he was going, regardless of whom he pleased or displeased. History bore him out more often than not: in the victory of the Allies, in the liberation of colonial territories, in the thawing of cold-war blocs, even in the forced reappraisal of Britain's attitude toward continental Europe. He is a master of the shock technique and greatly enjoys his self-appointed mission to bare unpleasant realities.

In his Canadian trip, he chose to apply the shock treatment to the split personality of Canada, to split it further apart as a first step, and mine a bonanza of French influence to the detriment of British and American control. It is unfortunate that such a coup had for a target one of the best friends of France. For once, the endorsement of the French Cabinet notwithstanding, President de Gaulle seems to have acted on the basis of fiction rather than facts: the French Canadians are asserting their French heritage but the majority of them wish to obtain equality as Canadians, not as French. And France does not wish to reassert sovereignty over Quebec. History cannot return to the days of Montcalm any more than geography can ignore the 2,500-mile common border of Canada and the United States. Ironically, a long section of this border might even dissolve if Quebec were amputated from Canada. This could hardly be the General's wish.

THE VIOLENCE

Why did it have to happen like this? Can it all be laid to outside agitators and the Communist conspiracy, as the actions of Congress seem to indicate they believe? Or was it simply the police brutality of a Fascist state, as the assertions of Stokely Carmichael, Adam Powell and others indicate they believe? Was it the aborting of the war on poverty into a war on peasants, or the glorification of violence by the mass media, or just the latest embodiment of an old American custom? Or unemployment, or educational shortcomings, or price gouging of the poor, or racial prejudice, or broken homes, or intolerable living conditions, or pollution of air and street?

The lash of violence has many strands, all of these and more; its core is human nature itself, which can't be changed, but can and must be liberated from the cruel, restricting, poisonous cords which have made it into the scourge of American society.

The following pieces demonstrate the diversity and the dimensions of the problem, coming as they do from the major scenes of the recent violence. The crisis will hardly be resolved by the all-too-predictable formation of another committee. Nor is it much help to set aside a day of prayer to God, who created the human nature inside but not its present bondage, which is the work of unbelievers.

The only fruitful course for government must be, at the very least, the re-examination and reordering of our national purpose and productivity. Nothing less will do. And all of us ordinary citizens must, to begin with, look into our hearts and see our neighbors there. —Editors

NEW YORK

'Nothing Worth Saving'

PAUL GOOD

Mr. Good is a free-lance writer who specializes in reporting developments in the civil rights movement.

Summertime and the livin' in Harlem ain't easy. New Haven Railroad commuters cutting through the black ghetto heart from white suburbs where children play on lawns and sailboats get a glimpse of what the living is, perhaps summed up in the tenement fact of a black child staring from behind an iron window grating in baking August, breathing air like dirty soup and watching the trains go by. Playtime, U.S.A. Inside, the tenement walls are sour with the defeat and despair soaked off black generations. Outside, on sidewalks, black youths congregate, with summer joblessness 15 per cent among them; they walk down streets where fewer than 20 per cent of the stores are Negro-owned. Bitter street-corner orators harangue them; they agree among themselves that New York is not a Summer Festival, that something has to give. Yet through July, while riots swept many major cities, black Harlem was quiet. Why?

The explanation involves the anatomy of all the riots. And it must be prefaced by the understanding that Harlem will riot, sooner or later. It has rioted five times since 1935. Each time, an incident with police lit the fuse, the police representing the face of the enemy, of economic and social repression. For example, the 1964 riots which set the pattern of our long, hot summers began after a police lieutenant shot to death a Negro teenager. But this summer, New York City policemen have been a vanishing species in Harlem. Foot patrols—a historic abrasive—have virtually disappeared from the the streets. Police cruisers exhibit a tact verging on fecklessness. A few nights ago on Lenox Avenue near 135th Street, a street fight quickly attracted 500 people. A cruiser rolled up, the men inside evaluated the situation, and rolled on. The fight ended in minutes. An attempt to make arrests could have begun the Harlem riot of 1967.

Obviously, this is a helluva way to run a police operation in a normal city. Neither New York nor any American city is normal so long as thousands of black people are penned in, developing the prisoner's mentality of hate for his keepers. Mayor Lindsay is pragmatist enough to know that feeble federal, state and city programs are not enough to keep the peace. They are a bribe to the cynical, a disillusion to the hopeful. So he and his Police Commissioner Howard R. Leary have tried keeping it by looking the other way.

Attorney Conrad Lynn, long a militant and currently defending seven alleged Revolutionary Action Movement members charged with conspiracy to kill Whitney Young and others, suggested an additional reason.

"Many young men who are potential activist leaders," he says, "have been absorbed temporarily into the system with anti-poverty jobs. They've simply been bought up."

A New York Times story gives substance to this, quoting an unnamed youth who was chucking bricks in the 1964 riot but now is an anti-poverty worker giving jivey little pep talks about cooling it. Why the change?

"A piece of the action," he says. "I had nothing then; I've got something now. I don't want to see it torn up."

CORE official and former Harlemite Vincent Young buys none of this.

"It doesn't mean a thing," he says. "When the shit pops, they better not try to cool it. Or they'll be washed away."

As July ended, men on Harlem streets, the Lumpenproletariat, were analyzing what had happened in Newark, Detroit and everywhere, and they were coming to certain conclusions. That riot was inevitable, even desirable, was foregone. But many insisted, for example, that buildings must not be burned in Harlem since it had been demonstrated that the quotient of Negro suffering during indiscriminate burning was too great.

"Harlem will be very much different from anything else," said Bill Epton, head of the Progressive Labor Party there. "Where 1964 was formless to a large degree, this will not be. The people in Harlem are politically sophisticated and they are going to seek political goals and concessions, not just emotional burnings. Those guys on the corners will provide the nucleus of leadership and they include former civil rights people who became disillusioned and kids who never had any illusions. I think it will occur spontaneously. All the conditions are there, things are strung tight, and only the timing of the incident is unpredictable. If Mayor Wagner and Police Commissioner Murphy were still on the job, it would have happened last year. Lindsay saved it by bending over backwards. But when it comes, it will be the granddaddy of them all."

Epton has a persuasive albeit Mao-Marxian view of rioting to date and of that to come (he himself is appealing conviction on anarchy charges growing out of the '64 riots). He contends that "race riots" is a misnomer, that "these rebellions unconsciously reflect a class position—people going after the system and uniformed symbols of the apparatus that is robbing them." Epton believes in the classic black-laboring white revolutionary coalition. He argues that for all the publicized snipers' nests in Detroit, a comparatively few whites—even police—died. White shops were burned but not a single white shop owner has been killed to date. If the black target is the white man's body, he's a poor shot.

From 1964 until this summer, there was no political consciousness directing rioters and no cohesive ghetto organization emerging from them. Riots, with their own internal lifetime of three days, burned themselves out with nothing to sustain them. But a new element was discernible in Newark and apparent in Detroit where, on the third day, National Guardsmen moving into the ghetto were chased out. Some organization seemingly existed to begin with, and more developed. This incipient radical leadership has been learning revolution the hard and only way it can be learned—through rebellion. At this stage, no unified core of leadership exists to direct a long-range struggle whose ultimate aim would be to alter American government and society beyond recognition. Or bring it down, as Stokely Carmichael vowed in the heady air of Havana.

But Harlem could be a unique ground for swift maturation of revolutionary men and their machinery. Symbolically, it is the urban black heartland. Geographically, its position on Manhattan Island could enable it to plunge the city into chaos should a prolonged outbreak—reinforced by black riot veterans from other cities—occur. Commuter trains would be simple targets for snipers in the clusters of housing projects along the tracks; already some night trains have run through Harlem without lights. Bridge and road arteries would be vulnerable. Containment of violence inside ghetto confines would be extremely difficult, short of cordoning off the entire top of Manhattan and barring passage to anyone black. The implications for New York and for America, even if revolt were inevitably crushed by troops in a block-by-block little Vietnam, would be melancholy.

This is a drastic image but it is not phantasy. Phantasy-prone are legislators who kill a rat-control bill, pass anti-riot legislation, and disdain to discuss a massive and immediate public works type of program that might avert calamity. Phantasy-prone is a President decrying street violence while sanctioning a federal mania for violence in Vietnam, and at the same time calling for a national prayer day of racial reconciliation at home. Threatened New York is not singular but merely the most gross example of all the incompatibles in American society today, and Harlem is the physical reality of all the Harlems of our minds where fears of black-white Armageddon dwell. There is no national effort being made to seek true social and economic compatibility, and the best New York's Mayor can do to avert Armageddon in Harlem is to have police patrol with their eyes closed. No wonder that a cool-eyed 16 year old on a Harlem street corner said to an older black man seeking his views: "There's nothing in this country worth saving."

That is a terrible kind of sophistication for a boy, the words a pledge that he will seek his manhood rending his house asunder.

DETROIT

Motown Blues

B. J. WIDICK

Mr. Widick, a resident of Detroit, was a shop worker in an auto plant for fifteen years, and a member of the Trade Union Leadership Council. He has written two books and many articles on labor.

Detroit, the symbol of hope in race relations in America, turned into a nightmare of shattered illusions on Sunday, July 23. Seven days later its people were still dazed from the shock of its conflicts and devastation, like a city recovering from its first bombing in war.

The shock was greater because it wasn't supposed to happen here, at least not the way it did. Detroit had more going for it than any city, so everyone knew. It had a dynamic and talented liberal mayor who had more federal funds and programs going than any other urban area. Its police commissioner had the respect of most of the Negro and white liberal community. Detroit was the social base of Walter Reuther and the UAW—a union with a civil rights record far superior to most unions. The Governor's record had gained him over 35 per cent of the Negro vote—a remarkable achievement in a heavily Democratic area.

Yet in three days its edifice of progress was crumpled into ashes. The day before all hell broke loose, Negro City Councilman Rev. Nicholas Hood had decried "the long hot summer riot mongers" and added, "I haven't heard any Negroes talk about possible violence this summer—only the white people are talking about it." Mayor Jerome P. Cavanagh had irritated some Negro leaders with his warning to Detroiters that the potential for trouble had not yet been eliminated.

The Mayor's network of "citizen sentries," including spies planted among groups of hostile Negroes, produced only optimistic reports. Until the early morning raid on a "blind pig" saloon in the cesspool of the ghetto, the informers gave no indication of alarm (and this was after Newark). Conrad Mallet, the talented city staff man whose function was to keep feeling the pulse of the "inner city," admitted the system broke down and failed. "Why? I don't know."

Detroit's Negro spokesmen worked hard to calm things down. Young John Conyers, Jr., went into his Congressional District, focal point of the gathering storm. He was booed and stoned when he tried to talk. "You try to talk to these people and they'll knock you into the middle of next year," he reported later. This was the reception to a Negro leader whom many fellow Democrats often viewed as "too chauvinistic."

Robert "Buddy" Battles III, the burly UAW shop leader, who is president of the Trade Union Leadership Council—often criticized by some UAW leaders as being "too aggressive"—was on the streets for a while, as were others. He reported, "You couldn't use dialect speech, Swahili or anything else. You couldn't speak to those kids. This was not hate the man, just looting."

The large and seemingly imposing Negro leadership structure of the NAACP (with 30,000 Detroit members), the Urban League, TULC, UAW activists, and many ministers, lost touch with and lacked influence on the growing numbers gathering on the streets, and they were the first to call for National Guard and federal troops. Negro Congressman Charles Diggs threatened to buy nation-wide TV time to denounce President Johnson if he didn't bring in federal troops fast.

Dismay over the wild fury sweeping the streets was expressed by Nelson Jack Edwards, UAW international executive board member, Horace Sheffield, TULC leader and Battles in a statement. "One day of violence threatens to destroy years of effort to build a community Negroes and whites can be proud of. We have been far from satisfied with the conditions which have confronted Negroes generally in the community but none can deny substantial progress was made." They denounced the mobs as "hoodlums and hatemongers," but the surging people on the streets weren't listening, while thousands of whites and Negroes in integrated neighborhoods kept to their homes, and the all-white suburban areas feared the worst.

Meanwhile, the Detroiters watching their TV screens saw a city blazing at night with more than 1,400 fires counted, and with the impact on Twelfth Street of tons of napalm bombs. Fire Chief Charles Quinlan has estimated more than $250 million in property damage. A former air force captain in Strategic Services told us it did remind him of Europe in World War II. "Like Berlin," said Mayor Cavanagh.

The unreality of life came in the eyewitness accounts of integrated looting, and even sniping. Negroes and whites joined, in many instances, in helping themselves.

By Friday, the agony was largely over and law and order were restored. The lessons were staggering, and the human suffering enormous, but perhaps the greatest blow of all was the death of a dream that Detroit was different and its "shared power" concept an accepted and effective reality.

For July, 1967, was not a repeat of the race riots of 1943. Then it was mainly racist white mobs seeking to exterminate the residents of the black ghetto, who fought back in desperation and with high casualties (thirty-four killed and more than 700 injured—mainly Negro) until federal troops took over. Detroit had assumed that it had come a long way from that ghastly event, and by the generally accepted standards of measuring social progress, this view was confirmed. The labor-liberal-Negro coalition had effected many changes. Long before the 1964 Civil Rights Act, downtown stores had hired hundreds of Negroes. About a third of the city employment was Negro. Restaurants and bars were open to all. Almost 200,000 Negroes and about 30,000 whites had marched behind Rev. Martin Luther King downtown in Detroit, in a massive display that outnumbered the "March on Washington."

But the progress hadn't trickled down to the dispossessed in sufficient quantity and quality to prevent the social explosion of 1967. What kind was it?

Tony Ripley, confidant, handy man and speech writer for Mayor Cavanagh, analyzed it this way: "It was mostly a rebellion of people who have no stake in society, people of both races. You put up with the status quo as long as it works for you. If you are going nowhere and there is no end in sight, then the hostility grows."

Twelfth Street is destroyed. On it, as described succinctly by Barbara Stanton, a Detroit reporter, there were white building owners from the suburbs who called their second-floor apartments vacant, then took a cut from the earnings of the prostitutes who worked there.

"There were those who despised their Negro customers, and showed it by the filth that lay in their grocery aisles, the sour smells of clotted milk and rotting meat that rose from their counters.

"There were others who greeted the Negroes as friends, hired them, befriended them, and were warned by them when the looting began—although it did them little good.

"On Twelfth Street, holdups were so common, they went unreported daily, numbers slips passed hands, small children stole, pawn shops did a thriving business, the streets were clogged with cars and scattered with litter."

The aftermath? Who knows so soon, even with all the brave talk of rebuilding Detroit? What replaces Twelfth, and where do the dispossessed go next? How deep are the scars of the wounded and the imprisoned (many of whom are totally innocent, if the stories they told reporters are true)? What is the reaction of the white suburbs like Dearborn and Warren and Birmingham and Grosse Pointe—the places called a white noose around the neck of Detroit by Mayor Cavanagh?

A heavy rainstorm brings a suburb the designation of a disaster area by the federal government, but neither Mayor Cavanagh nor Governor Romney can get that designation for the devastated city so that huge funds could flow easily into the community. Federal aid is coming, but at what pace?

The new sound from Motown is no longer just the Supremes, a living example of what a break in life can do for the poor in Detroit; it is the cry of dismay and despair. Already price gougers charged $1 for a quart of milk or a loaf of bread until the city council passed an anti-price-gouge ordinance. The real estate blockbusters are already at work. How big will the outmigration be again? Over 500,000 Detroiters moved to the suburbs from 1950-60.

It may not be too late—this depends on national reaction to the events, and the attitude of Congress, which Mayor Cavanagh pointed out was "reactionary" and cutting down on the needs of the city. At the moment, the issue is held in abeyance, with Detroit a city of mixed and mixed-up people during the day, and a de facto apartheid society at night.

One clue to the immediate future: Just before the July tragedy, City Councilwoman Beck had begun a recall campaign against Mayor Cavanagh for being soft on crime, because Detroit's streets were no longer safe at night. The outcome of this, now that Detroit has had it, may tell a lot about the future of the motor city.

After a week of violence, a three- or four-week strike in the auto plants may look like "nice, clean fun" by contrast.

LOS ANGELES

Western Justice

PHIL KERBY

One hundred and thirteen years ago, a Los Angeles mob broke into the town jail, removed a convicted murderer who had been granted a stay of execution and hanged him from the crossbeam of a corral gateway across the street. This informal execution, one of many in the lynch-happy Los Angeles of that era, represented a commitment of Mayor Stephen C. Foster, who before the trial had promised to resign his office and lead the lynch party himself if the accused man was not convicted and promptly hanged.

The hanging seemed likely to take place in the afternoon, and the schedule posed a deadline problem for an enterprising newspaper editor who wanted to print an account in time to get a bundle of papers off that morning to San Francisco. He wrote a lengthy description of the event. A contemporary historian commented: "A few surplus copies (of the newspaper) gave the lynchers a unique opportunity, while watching the stringing up, of comparing the written story with the affair as it actually occurred."

Nearly eighty years later, a mob lynched two kidnapers at San Jose. Gov. James ("Sunny Jim") Rolph, Jr., of California, speaking in the finest tradition of frontier justice, said: "It is the best lesson that California has ever given the country."

Violence often has been officially incited and condoned in California—from the days of the old West to the present. In the 1930s, labor disputes swept California's great agricultural valleys, and law-enforcement agencies incited, supported and took part in vigilante action in behalf of the growers. A. L. Wirin, counsel for the American Civil Liberties Union, was having dinner with friends on January 23, 1934, in a hotel in Brawley, Calif. Later that evening, he was to have presided at a public discussion of a lettuce workers' strike in the Imperial Valley. Brawley police had forbidden all strike meetings, but a federal court, in turn, had enjoined the police not to interfere. When a waiter told Wirin he was wanted on the telephone, he went to the hotel lobby, where a dozen American Legionnaires seized him, yanked him outside and shoved him on the floor of a car. A state highway motorcycle officer obligingly cleared the way. They drove Wirin out of town, stopped on the desert, beat him and threatened him with death, then took him to the American Legion hall in nearby El Centro. He was then tied, blindfolded, driven 10 miles from town, and turned loose barefoot on the desert.

In the war year 1943, friction broke out in Los Angeles between young servicemen and the "zoot suiters" of the period. After a zoot-suit gang beat two servicemen, soldiers and sailors on leave decided to retaliate. As one observer said: "The honor of one uniform against the other was held to be at stake." On June 7, several thousand servicemen and sympathetic civilians invaded downtown Los Angeles. The mob crashed into theatres and dragged zoot suiters into the aisles to beat them. Mobs halted streetcars and pulled Mexicans, Filipinos and Negroes into the street. Those wearing zoot suits were stripped and left naked or half-naked, bleeding and bruised, surrounded by jeering civilians. That night the mob swept into the Mexican community in east Los Angeles, spreading terror and violence. Boys as young as 12 were stripped and beaten. A gang grabbed a Negro defense worker from a streetcar and gouged out one of his eyes with a knife. At midnight, military authorities declared the downtown area out of bounds for uniformed personnel and sent in MPs and Shore Patrol.

A Los Angeles county supervisor afterward said: "All that is needed to end lawlessness is more of the same action as is being exercised by the servicemen." A suburban newspaper regretted the end of the riots and commented: "Most of the citizens of the city have been delighted with what has been going on." A district attorney of an adjacent county, fishing outside his area for headlines, said "zoot suits are an open indication of subversive character."

Hostility between the police and the minority groups is persistent and increasingly dangerous in every large American city. In Los Angeles, the police are well trained, efficient—and aggressive. This was a pattern established by the late Chief W. H. Parker, who had little understanding of minority group problems. Referring once to the difficulties of law enforcement in the Mexican community of Los Angeles, he said that some Mexicans "were not too far removed from the wild tribes of the inner mountains of Mexico."

Minorities, especially the Negroes of the Watts ghetto in south central Los Angeles, feared and hated Parker's police. Policemen often treat minority communities like colonial territories, and citizens feel they have little or no protection from police brutality. Last spring, a Mexican youth died after his arrest in Los Angeles, and the police reported the death was caused by a heart attack. An autopsy disclosed the victim died of a ruptured spleen, but the coroner's jury routinely returned a verdict of accidental homicide.

Public officials almost automatically side with the police in behalf of "law and order," even when the lawless happen to be the police. After the Los Angeles peace march broke up in a wild melee during President Johnson's visit to the city on June 23, a Los Angeles City Council member urged his colleagues to support the police—"right or wrong." A divided council did vote to support the police—and hold an investigation later.

The June 23 peace march was a classic of officially incited and condoned violence. Weeks earlier, Mayor Sam Yorty inflamed the community by denouncing the coming demonstration as Communist inspired. Directors of the California Democratic Council accused him of "making repeated public reference to impending violence in order to create justification for police repression." The 10.000 to 15.000 paraders had committed no overt act of hostility or violence up to the time the police made their club-swinging assault to disperse the crowd. Mayor Yorty commended the police for making the President's visit "safe and enjoyable," and Gov. Ronald Reagan thought "the police did not use excessive brutality." Chief Tom Reddin complimented himself on the dispersal tactics: "It was a beautiful plan and well executed."

The news media, with some exceptions, went along with the official line. The Los Angeles Herald-Examiner reported the police acted "to break up the milling, screaming throng," although the crowd did not become a "milling, screaming throng" until after the police charged into its ranks. As one foreign journal observed, the police, not the marchers, rioted. The next day, the Los Angeles Times concluded one of its reports with the words of a photographer: "These people were like animals. All I can say is that the Los Angeles Police Department did one hell of a job." That was not the way a dozen Times reporters saw the event. They quietly rioted themselves against their editors, asserting their reports were changed to distort the facts and to favor the police. A week later, the Times reversed itself and published an even-handed review of the demonstration. Its revised coverage quoted a demonstrator: "All the violence was initiated by the police."

Many newspapers, especially the hyperthyroid press of Southern California, react automatically to any disturbance with the charge that it is caused by Communist conspirators. During the insurrection in Detroit, the Los Angeles Herald-Examiner predictably published a cartoon showing the shadowy, scowling figure of a white man, one arm bearing a hammer and sickle insignia, leaning over a black sniper shooting through a window. An advertisement carried by the Herald-Examiner the previous day was far more interesting than the cartoon. Appearing opposite a half page of pictures showing the havoc in Detroit, the ad featured, at a bargain $25.95, "SNIPER RIFLES. Rugged, accurate, precision made."

NEWARK

Lethal Indifference

LEWIS M. MOROZE

Mr. Moroze, a white resident in the ghetto of Newark, is a schoolteacher who has been involved for more than twenty years in civil rights movements of New Jersey. He is the representative of the New Jersey Political Alliance for Peace and Human Rights on the Newark Committee of Concern.

The Statue of Liberty stands majestically in New York harbor; at her back stands the city of Newark, to which came masses of black Southerners, yearning to be free. Now a majority of the population, they are determined to make their dreams a reality.

In this setting Mayor Addonizio's administration made all major decisions without regard to the desires of the black people. Their demands were totally ignored, their leaders held in contempt. Knowledgeable black and white leaders sounded a warning, which was sharpened by the selection of Newark as the site for the national conference on Black Power.

Sensing the indifference of the city administration, the Birchites, too, focused on Newark, planning to welcome the arch-symbol of racism in our land, ex-Governor

Wallace. Black insistance forced cancellation of the affair.

The white community, uninformed by either their schooling or the mass media about the history and life of the black people, little understand ghetto realities.

Hugh Addonizio, a politician refusing to share power with the majority of the population, ill informed about the needs of the people in the ghetto, was apparently unaware of the coming fury. Most recently he refused to guarantee homes for the tens of thousands to be made homeless by the erection of a medical school on 150 acres in the ghetto. Addonizio returned to Washington $1.9 million allotted for education at a time when the Newark schools, whose student body is 76 per cent non-white, need massive assistance. He rejected a highly qualified black accountant for the post of secretary to the Board of Education, and failed to respond to pleas for a Civilian Review Board to deal with complaints against the police.

Today the world knows of the July rebellion in Newark. White people talk about violence, about the violence of the black ghetto. At the height of the crisis, concerned white and black leaders dealt directly with the Governor and started to prepare a program to deal with basic solutions. At the same time a group of peace and human rights advocates, under the leadership of David Frost, paid for a half-page appeal in the July 18 issue of the Newark Evening News, urging the entire white community to focus on the roots of the crisis. But the majority of white people still focused on the need for "law and order." Did not the black community perpetrate violence against "law and order" and the Newark police?

The U.S. Civil Rights Commission reported in 1961:

> In 1931 President Hoover's Wickersham Committee found extensive evidence of police lawlessness including unjustified violence. Sixteen years later another Presidential Committee, this one appointed by President Truman, concluded that police brutality, especially against the unpopular, the weak and the defenseless was a distressing problem. And now in 1961 this Commission must report that police brutality is still a serious problem throughout the United States.

Inaction typified Newark on this "distressing problem." In 1952 a petition was presented to Governor Driscoll listing acts of brutality and murder by the police in Newark and elsewhere. The Governor ignored the request for study and action. Driscoll was the governor who rejected pleas from around the world to free the Trenton Six, six black men framed on a murder charge. Today, Driscoll is on Governor Hughes's Blue Ribbon Panel to investigate the riots.

During the July rebellion sixty prominent black and white businessmen, educators, lawyers, ministers and priests, social workers, civic and ghetto leaders came together to deal with the unfolding crisis. Their representatives prevailed upon the Governor to withdraw the state police and the National Guard. This "Committee of Concern" estimated that:

> . . . The crisis could not be solved unless military and excessive police forces were withdrawn. Most persons in intimate contact with the riot-torn area today have been persuaded that it was the very presence of the show of armed strength which was causing much of the remaining violence. . . . Indeed, the armed forces and the military have themselves been guilty of wholesale and needless destruction of property and have in fact threatened the lives of responsible members of the community.

It took great persuasion by the committee to get the Governor, at his command post at the Roseville Armory, to comment on the wanton acts of the forces of "law and order" and about white vigilantes roaming armed through the ghetto, while black residents were harassed at check points.

At this writing, with the rebellion past, Newark's forces of "law and order" ride through the ghetto with rifles protruding from their cars. For "fun" some place pistols to the temples of black youth, forcing them to mouth foul epithets about themselves, their parents and their people. For even greater "fun" some police pull the trigger, knowing the barrel is empty.

Black people know that violence of the forces of "law and order" is the reality of life. When it was proposed that it might be wise for the Committee of Concern to handle the matter of police practices (the euphemism for police brutality) delicately in order to guarantee the support of the business community in the campaign for jobs, housing and schools, the thinking of the black spokesmen forced a change in position. For them all talk of progress was meaningless without sharp action on police brutality.

The Mayor, who viewed the beginning of the rebellion as an "isolated incident," still views it as a "criminal insurrection." He insists that his conduct was exemplary and would repeat everything he did during his term of office over again if necessary. In one instance, when a report indicated restlessness, he no longer listened to its source, but to his chief adviser, Malafronte, who is held in disrepute by the people of the ghetto. To the new and rising leaders of the black people Addonizio made no concessions, evidently considering them as noisy and irritating but politically impotent.

The people in the streets drank in the significance of Addonizio's refusal to heed the leaders of CORE, The Organization of Negro Educators, the Newark Committee for Better Public Schools and others.

Police brutality, combined with official indifference and contempt for the leaders of the ghetto, were the combustibles which ignited. The first attack was leveled at the immediate center of oppression—the 4th Police Precinct. Black leaders rushed to the area to ask the people to cool it. It seemed that they might succeed until it was learned that these leaders, including Oliver Lofton, head of legal services for the anti-poverty program, and Robert Curvin, leader of CORE, were not permitted to assist the people under arrest, on whom beatings and indignities were being inflicted. Frustration now spilled over to the next most visible symbol of oppression in the ghetto—white businesses.

During the riots snipers appeared, shooting more to harass than to kill; they shot at the hated policemen, but firemen were also targets, guaranteeing the burning of the two symbols of their degradation—white businesses and rat-infested tenements. The police failed in all their attempts to have these snipers betrayed. Governor Hughes, National Chairman of the Democratic Party's Committee on Equal Rights, still views the rebellion narrowly as a police question. The Blue Ribbon Panel that he has appointed to study the situation includes members who came under fierce attack as biased by the New Jersey branches of the NAACP.

Addonizio invited the House Labor and Education Committee to Newark to investigate the Newark antipoverty program since it is alleged that remarks made by some of its personnel "triggered the riots."

As it stands today, except for use of state police and National Guardsmen during the rebellion, no arm of government has taken even one step to deal with the real causes. The actions of Congress, the Governor, the Mayor and the police serve as continuing irritants.

Responsible black leaders are attempting to raise $260,000 for the "slain twenty-six black warriors" for freedom. They are mapping political campaigns for change, including a petition to recall Mayor Addonizio, calling on white community leaders for support.

The Committee of Concern is developing a program on police practices, jobs, housing and schools. It still does not appreciate with sufficient depth the need to bring clarity to Newark's white people, many of whom are now living in fear. Their failure to comprehend reality now means racism will take deeper root.

If the government agencies persist in their present course, if the black and white constructive forces fail to win meaningful gains, the fires next time will be of more massive proportions.

EAST HARLEM

'Do Not Cross, Flatfoot!'

BENNETT KREMEN

Mr. Kremen, a free-lance writer, has been a teacher and social worker in East Harlem.

Helmeted policemen battling mobs in a din of exploding Molotov cocktails and sniper fire on a Manhattan thoroughfare was not what was extraordinary about the riots in El Barrio, New York City's Spanish-speaking East Harlem: what seemed surprising, after studying the lines of grim, pale-faced policemen guarding Third Avenue like foreign troops, was that similar melees haven't shattered this neighborhood many times in past years and that now, with the rebellion over, only three are dead and thirty injured. As I stood on piles of broken glass in front of vandalized store fronts, this feeling of surprise was reinforced by an incident I remembered.

A few years ago I joined a friend who was moving his furniture; aiding us were three Puerto Rican men from East Harlem we'd hired. After they loaded our truck, we paid the men and, as an afterthought, gave them an old television set that needed repairs. Smiling at this windfall, the men headed home, lugging the heavy television set with them. But before ten minutes had passed, a patrol car pulled up with the television set and the three men in the back seat. We assured the policemen that the three Puerto Ricans were not thieves, and again the men headed home. This time fifteen minutes passed before another squad car brought the men back. We wrote a note now indicating that the television set was not stolen but the property of the possessors. Nonetheless, only a few minutes went by before a third police car brought them back. My friend got angry, as I did; and if we didn't curse the policemen outright, we came close to it. Only later did we realize that it should have been the three Puerto Rican men who challenged the cops, not us. But, of course, lacking our white faces, middle-class property and college-educated speech to aid them in confronting this abuse of the law, the three men simply sat in the back of the police car—angry, suspicious, silent and ashamed. It was no shock then to find out that on the third, final and fiercest night of the East Harlem riots, the word went out: "Get a cop!"

El Barrio's anti-police convulsion began typically with an officer shooting a knife-wielding suspect to death, an angry crowd gathering in protest, and then the inevitable barrage of flying soda bottles and rocks directed at police reinforcements. That Saturday night, July 22, was humid and hot; people escaped their stifling tenement apartments by milling about outdoors or sitting on stoops drinking beer. And when the rumor raged through the crowded streets that a cop had killed a Puerto Rican por nada—for nothing—the recent example of Newark, studied in detail by the television-addicted inhabitants of El Barrio, added boldness to the neighborhood's fury and presented a challenge to the corazon—the manly heart and combative spirit—of the Puerto Rican youth, a challenge they embraced with determination.

As youthful mobs formed early Sunday morning on the corner of 111th Street and Third Avenue, the site of the fatal shooting, a comment frequently heard in the crowd was: "Those colored cats ain't got more heart than we got!" When the riot finally broke loose that first night, it was no sympathetic demonstration for the nation's embattled Negroes—a group with whom the Puerto Ricans are often in conflict—but a long-awaited moment for settling scores that the parents of El Barrio's youth had always been willing to forget or bear with humiliation. Thus, despite the fact that a sizable percentage of East Harlem is Negro, almost no Negroes participated in the violence, a situation that had been duplicated in reverse in 1964 when Central Harlem battled the police and East Harlem stayed calm.

Unlike riots in other cities, little looting or burning took place in El Barrio. The fact that mostly teen-agers and only a few adults participated in the more ferocious encounters can be explained by a theory that civil rights confrontations have given violence-prone youth in the ghettos a sense of solidarity with those in their neighborhoods they might have attacked, by setting up the concept of the white power structure, a new target at which to aim hostility. On Sunday, when the second night of battling was boldly launched by teen-agers and

SACCO-VANZETTI: A MEMOIR

ALDINO FELICANI

Aldino Felicani was born in 1891 in a country town near Florence, and trained at the Modern School print shop in Bologna. There, collaborating on the radical newspapers that were printed in the shop, he absorbed those libertarian ideas that shaped and guided his entire life.

In 1941, he faced jail on political charges and fled Italy for America, settling first in Cleveland, where he founded two papers, then moving to New York and in 1918 accepting employment at La Notizia, a new Italian language daily in Boston. From that time on, Boston was his home.

In 1919, Felicani was making plans for a paper with some of his Massachusetts friends. One of them was an itinerant laborer and fish peddler from Plymouth—Bartolomeo Vanzetti. When in April of that year two New York anarchists, Salsedo and Elia, were arrested by the Justice Department (this was the era of the Palmer Raids), Vanzetti was sent to that city to investigate. On May 2, he called a meeting in Boston to discuss what little he had learned. The next day Salsedo's body was found on the street below the Justice Department offices, where it had fallen from the fourteenth floor, and in Massachusetts the anarchists decided to take precautions. On May 5, Sacco and Vanzetti, while spreading the alarm, were arrested on a murder charge in Brockton.

Well prepared both by experience and by temperament, Felicani leaped to the task of founding the Sacco-Vanzetti Defense Committee on the 6th of May. He was given whatever space he needed in the columns of La Notizia to publicize the arrests and to make appeals for a defense fund. The paper also allowed Felicani to use its address, and for six to eight months No. 32 Battery Street in the North End became the defense headquarters.

Before the close of 1920, Feliciani was publishing a small newspaper in Italian, The Agitation, which for five years was the Defense Committee's official organ. It was devoted entirely to Sacco-Vanzetti news and for a period appeared every two weeks.

But in addition to founding the defense and acting as its chief publicist and treasurer, Felicani made another unique contribution to the Sacco-Vanzetti cause. It was he who was called upon constantly to put himself in the middle between his own element, a group of intransigent Italian anarchists and revolutionists, and a battery of increasingly conservative lawyers. Making adjustments, seeking delicate balances, he was yet watchful always to remain true to his own and Sacco and Vanzetti's anarchist idealism. Seeking a way between those militant labor groups who were convinced, often to the point of bombast, that only the proletariat could save Sacco and Vanzetti, and the liberal intellectuals who believed in the judicial process and such well-placed men as the Governor of Massachusetts and the president of Harvard, was no easy course.

Felicani was young and by nature headstrong, fiery sure. But he had his own good sense to guide him, and he also had good sense about the people around him. More, he never lost the faith and trust of Sacco and Vanzetti themselves. And so in the hardest of times, when legal proceedings were at a standstill, when funds were practically nonexistent, when pressures from the variety of bitterly conflicting elements threatened to undo all the good work of many years, there Felicani stood—often by sheer will alone—holding together the defense. And by so doing, he held together for all time the integrity of the two anarchists who were executed.

NORMAN THOMAS DI GIOVANNI

Sacco and Vanzetti were to die on August 10, 1927. As spokesman for their families and for the defense committee, and as their closest friend, I was to break the news to them in the Charlestown death house, my visit for the purpose to be on August 4. Thirteen days previously Gov. Alvan T. Fuller, before giving his decision, went to see the men in Cherry Hill, the death house antechamber.

From Vanzetti and Sacco I learned what had taken place when the Governor visited them. Sacco refused to shake Fuller's hand. To Sacco it was the war of classes: Fuller the ruling class and he the ruled. Sacco was a man who acknowledged cold fact, who faced inescapable realities. He had nothing to ask of Fuller—he wanted no favor—and refused to talk.

But Vanzetti, the more sociable of the two, sat down with the Governor. He went over the whole case from the moment of the arrest to the discussion of the last motion. Vanzetti related the story of his life of work and suffering. He pointed out the false testimony of Carlos Goodridge, who had taken the stand while under indictment for larceny, and of Lola Andrews, a prostitute—both of whom later recanted. The Governor chatted sympathetically with Vanzetti for more than an hour. The press treated the meeting as an extraordinary event.

On the morning after Fuller's visit, when I went to see Vanzetti he told me excitedly: "Fuller came to see us yesterday. We had a long conversation. He was very cordial and friendly. He sat down and talked to me like a brother, smiling and joking. That man will never send us to the chair." Vanzetti was cheerful, overjoyed.

"I don't know," was my reply. I tried to warn Vanzetti, to destroy his optimism, for everything indicated that the worst was coming. I did not want him to think he was in paradise when actually he was in hell.

You may imagine how I felt, as August 4 approached. I had to inform my closest friends that they were to die in a few days. One cannot find words, sentences, to convey a message of that kind. Emotion suffocated me, perhaps more than it did them. From time to time during the seven years, we had to face situations which enraged the two men even more than usual. They would then call for action, more action, and the more violent the better. I had tried to hold them down. Remembering those moments, I felt a sense of guilt. Here we were near the end. Only a few days separated us from the greatest miscarriage of justice of the century. Two innocent men were going to die in the electric chair because of their open profession of anarchism. My heart was in turmoil, my brain feverish. I finally related to them that they were going to die.

Vanzetti took it very hard. He looked at me for some minutes with his eyes growing larger and larger, as if losing his mind. He would not believe it. The illusory effect of the Governor's visit kept him from realizing that this was the end.

Sacco was not surprised at all. He accepted the outcome as part of the revolutionist's struggle against the ruling class. He had only one regret—not being on the outside to express his feelings with action. Sacco accepted the closing of the fight, and of his life, as a logical conclusion of his activity in serving the struggle against capitalist oppression. Nevertheless they were both stunned and speechless. I conveyed then the idea that this was the time to send out a strong message to our friends in every corner of the earth. My frame of mind in that moment was for vengeance. I felt that no action was too violent to protest this crime. And I actually suggested the statements which each of them drafted. Vanzetti, in a large, faltering hand, wrote:

> August 4, 1927
> From the death house
>
> Governor Alvan T. Fuller is a murderer as Thayer, Katzmann, the State perjurors and all the other(s). He s(h)ake hand(s) with me like a brother, make me believe he was honestly interested and that he had not seen the three carbarn-boy(s) to have no escuse to save us.
>
> Now, ignoring and denia all the proofs of our innocence and insult us and murder us. We are innocent.
>
> This is the war of plutocracy against liberty, against the people. Avenge our blood. We die for anarc(h)y. Long life anarc(h)y.
> Bartolomeo Vanzetti

Mr. William G. Thompson, chief counsel for the defense, had accompanied me to the death house. He remained talking with Mr. Hogsett, the assistant warden, in the room that housed the electric chair. I had gone inside to the narrow room with the three cells. As Nick and Barto were writing, I spoke to Madeiros who was in the third cell. I had never seen him before but felt the urge to say something to him. He also was going to die in the chair. Madeiros said to me: "Too bad for them. Me, I'm a criminal anyhow; I have a long record. But them—it's a shame for them." Even he, a habitual killer, could not conceal concern and sympathy for the two men he knew were innocent and had to face death.

Finally I had the two messages. Mr. Hogsett was still talking to Mr. Thompson and saw me with the papers in my hand. I gave them to him to read.

Mr. Hogsett blue-penciled three words in the statement by Vanzetti: "Avenge our blood." The assistant warden asked me, "What do you intend to do with these?" "Nothing much," I assured him. But I knew what I was going to do with them. I was just waiting to get outside to give the two statements to the press. Mr. Hogsett may have suspected my intention, for he made me promise, in the presence of Mr. Thompson, not to publish the messages. I did not hesitate to promise. Immediately back at committee headquarters I showed the statements to waiting newspaper men. They were hungry to publish those last words, the intimate feelings of the two men who were going to die. The next day the papers were filled with facsimiles and editorial comment.

All during the previous month, whenever I saw Nick and Barto, I had been admitted without counsel. Guards would open the door and lead me to the prisoners. After publication of those messages, however, I found them very angry with me at the jail. So angry that they actually locked me in a room.

"What's this?" I asked.

"You broke your word," was the answer. "You promised not to publish those statements and you did. This is breaking the rules. You will not be permitted to see the prisoners any more."

I called Mr. Thompson. He too was furious with me for breaking my promise. I could not help it. I had meant to publish those last words all the time. It was I who suggested them. It was my hope that those messages would prompt people to action—any action. But from that moment on I was barred from the death house and never again saw my friends alive.

All legal assistance by this time had been narrowed down to technicalities. On August 6 a motion was filed for revocation of sentence. Also that day a petition was filed for a writ of error. August 8 both the motion and the petition were denied. On the 10th a petition for writ of habeas corpus was denied by Justice Oliver Holmes of the United States Supreme Court and Justice George W. Anderson of the United States District Court. There was no other door for Mr. Thompson to try. In desperation he resigned, leaving Arthur D. Hill in charge of defense. Assisting Mr. Hill were Herbert Ehrmann and a young Italian lawyer from Pittsburgh, Michael Angelo Musmanno. The Governor, in order to create an impression of fairness, accorded the lawyers additional time for making further appeals to high courts. Then at 11:15 P.M. on August 10 he granted a twelve-day reprieve.

Vanzetti had talked to me about having his sister Luigia visit him before he died. Now the time of Miss Vanzetti's arrival was near. It was up to me to make preparations for her first visit to her brother in jail. I went to see William A. Hendry, who was chief warden at the Charlestown prison and who had always been cordial and sympathetic.

"It's unfortunate that I broke the rules," I said to Mr. Hendry, "but you understand these things. We are all human. We all have emotions. I am very sorry I can't see them again. Now, I have one favor to ask you."

"What is it?"

"When Miss Vanzetti comes—Vanzetti's sister—please open the door of the cell. Let them embrace as human beings. Don't allow any barrier between them."

"That is against the rule," he said. "I can't do anything about it. It is simply against the rule."

"Now put yourself in their position," I said. "Vanzetti hasn't seen his sister for twenty or twenty-five years. She has come 4,000 miles to see him die. Please allow them to meet as human beings."

"It is against the law. I can't do anything about it."

But he did. He made no promise, but when Miss Vanzetti reached the death cell on her first visit, he opened the door and let them be together without bars between.

Preparations for Luigia Vanzetti's visit had begun months before. Vanzetti wanted to see his sister and he wanted me to arrange her trip. She lived in Italy with her father and sister in the town of Villafalletto, near Cuneo.

It was difficult to refuse Vanzetti anything. This time, however, I was against the idea and tried to dissuade him. I said, "You have no right to ask another human being to come and see you die in the electric chair." But Vanzetti was of a different opinion. Finally, through some other member of the committee, he arranged for his sister to come. Fortunately for me, I had nothing to do with it. I did not want that visit on my conscience.

A few days later, he said: "You were right about my sister. The more I think about it, the more I realize how wrong I was. I do not want her to come. Cancel the trip."

But Miss Vanzetti had already left Italy. The newspapers were full of the details of her journey. She was already in Paris, where tens of thousands of workers received her, demonstrating in the streets with banners. Photographs were already published in the American press. It was too late to stop the trip.

Vanzetti had told me that his sister was very religious, a Roman Catholic. Of course, I had to promise him that I would go to New York to meet her at the boat. Together with Rosa Sacco, Jessica Henderson, who took us in her car, and Mrs. Henderson's young daughter, we went to meet Luigia Vanzetti.

The dock was crowded; people were everywhere. Several hundred New Yorkers were waiting anxiously to greet Vanzetti's sister. A whole army of newspaper men was also on hand, looking for interviews, hoping for a statement. Luigia Vanzetti finally appeared—a pathetic person, tired, discouraged, bewildered and lost. She was a true expression of grief. The first impression she made on us was that of an intelligent, reserved person, predominated by fear. The flash guns of the photographers were going full speed. Rosa Sacco and Luigia Vanzetti were surrounded. Common people, women—old and young—brought flowers and presents and kisses and warmth to the young wife and sister who would soon be cut off from members of their family by the cruelty of the law and the insanity of men.

When we reached the streets the newspaper headlines read: SACCO-VANZETTI TO DIE MONDAY NIGHT. Luigia Vanzetti did not understand a word of English. The gigantic headlines of the New York papers, however, did not require interpretation. Most of them had pictures covering the front pages. A sense of tragedy was everywhere. It was possible to see it, not only on those headline pages but on the faces of simple working people.

That was Friday. Only three days left. A situation of this type does not help one's ability to concentrate and to think straight. Nor is there need to say that we, and the people who followed our group, were full of emotions. I was anxious to rush back to Boston for last-minute contact. It was necessary to keep posted our closest friends in this country and throughout the world. We did not know what else to do. The only hope left was to arouse people to acts of desperation and protest.

After a brief rest in a New York hotel, we rushed Luigia Vanzetti to the radio station dedicated to Debs, where she delivered a few words to the people of America. It was a message of salutation and of appeal. Ironically we were accompanied about the city, as is customary on the occasions of the visits of important people, by what was then known as the bomb squad—part of the police force.

Luigia Vanzetti was lost in the tragedy. As one could expect, she understood very little of what had happened to her brother. Her mind was predominated by religious beliefs. To her the whole affair was a nightmare. In her statement to the press she said she hoped that her brother would return to the faith of his childhood—before he left home and became an atheist and a radical.

So it was up to me to prepare her for the end. On the way from New York to Boston I did my best to make her understand. It was not an easy job, as one can judge. I mentioned what had happened immediately after World War I. To simplify the picture, I told her how Sacco and Vanzetti had escaped to Mexico in order not to participate in the war. In chronological sequence I related how nationalistic elements had resorted to violent outbursts against the more active labor organizations which opposed the war. I told her how union headquarters were destroyed, how labor organizers were killed by mobs. I told her of the mass arrests of people everywhere in the United States during the so-called Palmer hysteria. Because it was something similar to what happened in Italy during the first years of Fascist terror, she began to see light.

But Luigia Vanzetti was naive, ingenuous. She thought that by coming to this country and pleading with certain pillars of the Church she could disarm the law. She was not alone in this way of thinking. Other people thought that the intervention of the Vatican would stop the hangman. Few of them realized that the authority of the state would not kneel to any other power.

When we got back to Boston it was Saturday morning. After a few hours' rest we went to the jail. We had to think what to do now that Luigia was here. I thought the proper and logical thing was to take her to see William Cardinal O'Connell, who was then a powerful man in the Church in Boston.

On Sunday afternoon Mrs. Henderson, Mrs. Sacco, Miss Vanzetti and I went to Cardinal O'Connell's home. We had not made an appointment. I stayed in the car because I had nothing to say. Rosa Sacco stayed with me. Miss Vanzetti and Mrs. Henderson went in. The Cardinal was able to speak Italian and Miss Vanzetti expressed herself in Italian very well. The visit lasted for some time. As can be imagined, Luigia used all the fervor and intelligence she could command to reach the heart of the prelate. The press considered this visit not only a nice gesture but an important one. I knew that it would not amount to anything. But it made Miss Vanzetti happy because she felt is was part of her mission and a contribution in the effort to save her brother. The papers said later Luigia's meeting with the Cardinal was very moving.

At defense committee headquarters Mary Donovan, Gardner Jackson, Joe Moro and others did not have a free moment. Writers, speakers, students, friends, arrived every minute from far and near. They all wanted to be of some help. Protest meetings were organized all over the city. Where it was not possible to secure public halls, private halls were used, such as churches and union headquarters.

I really can't describe the commotion during those few days before the execution. We had messengers from Western Union and Postal Telegraph all the time. We had calls from South Africa, Russia, South America, England, Germany, France, Spain. Labor organizations, liberal groups, political parties, religious associations, sent wires. Also the most prominent people in public life in every country of the world sent messages, asking for words of reassurance and hope. We heard from Maurice Thorez, who was one of the biggest lawyers in France, a radical and later leader of the French Communist Party: "If I can be of any help, I'll come." Anatole France, Madame Severine, Romain Rolland, Bertrand Russell, Harold Laski, H. G. Wells, Arnold Bennett, Fritz Kreisler, Maximilian Harden, Albert Einstein, Madame Curie, Marquis Guy de Lasteye (grandson of Lafayette), all sent words of sympathy and protest. We even had a message from Albert Dreyfus. He had been through hell himself, knew what it was like, and asked if he could help. They were all messages written with the burning feelings which consumed everyone—"If we can help, let us know."

The remembrance of that tremendous wave of human passion will live forever. For those involved in the fight to prevent this tragedy, it made life significant indeed. We were really caught in a trap and there was nothing we could do about it. But people were wonderful.

Now the death house was the only reality. On Monday night, the 22nd of August, Sacco and Vanzetti would die in the electric chair. There were few things left for us to do. The committee offices at 256 Hanover Street were a madhouse. It was a gathering of men and women with deep emotional feelings—resentment, sadness, despair. People coming and going continuously. Telegrams were piling up. The world was waiting with anxiety for news. The telephone constantly rang. There were calls from all over America—from Pittsburgh and San Francisco, from New York and Chicago, from Detroit and Washington. In one day alone we spent $860 for telegrams in order to keep people posted. We desperately urged our friends to do whatever they could. We asked for action. Action was our only hope for snatching our friends from the hands of the hangman. All legal hope was exhausted. In the large industrial centers of America workers laid down their tools, proclaiming a general strike. Individuals resorted to acts of desperation and terror.

In the turmoil of the closing tragedy we also had to fulfill certain legal obligations. The bodies of persons who die in the electric chair must be claimed in advance by representatives of their family. This was my responsibility.

At about six o'clock on that last evening, the 22nd of August, Gardner Jackson and his sister, Dr. Edith Jackson, accompanied me to the jail. The whole city was an armed camp. Citizens going about their affairs were stopped and questioned. Those who protested were arrested all over the city. No one was permitted within sight of the prison walls. As the news of world protest increased, fear increased in the men who pretended to administer the law. Machine guns were placed along the prison walls. Later powerful lights were to search over roofs and in the dark corners of yards and streets. It seemed the whole city was in the grip of death. Armed horsemen were stationed along the streets to the prison. Outside the jail's main gate was a cordon of mounted troopers. They appeared calm and erect and perfect on their beautiful animals. They were armed, ready for any emergency. Along the streets were other horses and riders. Those were probably the same horses that had been used on previous Sundays to break up the meetings we called on Boston Common to voice our protests.

My heart was beating fast. The trip from committee headquarters to the jail was made in silence. One of those times when there is no need for words. Our emotions dominated everything. The silence was broken by the echoing hoofbeats of the horses on the wooden bridge facing the jail. In the long silence of the journey one saw the tremendous contrast: in every city of the world the multitudes clamored and thundered, "Save Sacco and Vanzetti!" while in Charlestown the only preoccupation was the preparation for the killing of the two dreamers of the brotherhood of man.

We reached the jail. The atmosphere that prevailed was suspense and fear. The large windows around the prison walls were lighted. Inmates appeared to be watching in the shadows. There was a depressing silence all around. The restlessness of the prisoners was evident. Everyone, at the entrance, in the lobby, in the office, was busy with the details of the execution.

I entered the office. The warden, Mr. Hendry, was there. He was drunk. I asked him what the procedure was and he gave me the papers to sign.

It was in such a manner that I claimed the bodies of my friends, who were then still alive.

BEGINNINGS OF WISDOM

WOODY KLEIN

Mr. Klein is Assistant Administrator of New York City's new Housing and Development Administration. A former award-winning newspaper man who specialized in housing and urban affairs, he served as Mayor Lindsay's press secretary in 1966. He wrote a book on slums, Let In the Sun (Macmillan).

"We are reaping a whirlwind of violence throughout the nation, indicating that our programs have not gone to the heart of the basic problem." —Sen. Abraham Ribicoff

It is apparent from the blowups in the ghettos this summer—in Detroit, Newark, Boston, Cincinnati, Hartford, Atlanta, New York and many other cities—that the United States still does not have a firm grip on the urban crisis. A recent Lou Harris poll disclosed that one out of every two metropolitan area residents feels a sense of "uneasiness" about his personal safety and the prospect of racial violence. What's worse, the impatience of Negroes and the resistance of whites are forming a tinderbox for more racial flare-ups.

The racial issue is only one of many involved in the complicated crisis of America's cities, but most observers agree it is at the root of the generations-old social problems. It is certainly on the minds of officials this summer in all levels of government, and has been the catalyst for all of the significant social legislation since 1961.

"We very often get the impression that what is wrong with the American city is the Negro, when the reverse is true. What is wrong with the Negro is what we Americans have done to the American city." Ralph Ellison, author of The Invisible Man, made this remark recently in his testimony before the Subcommittee on Executive Reorganization of the Senate Committee on Government Operations, better known as the Ribicoff Committee, and chaired by the knowledgeable Democratic Senator from Connecticut. The subcommittee has been holding hearings on the problems of American cities since last August 9; the Senator says they could last for two years.

Some Washington newsmen who have sat through much of the 4,000 pages of testimony from more than 100 witnesses report that, although some new ideas have come out of the inquiry, the overwhelming impression thus far is one of pessimism and despair. Ribicoff, a serious, probing man, has made the purpose of his hearings clear. He eventually wants legislation which will improve markedly the structure and operation of the federal government so it can do more—a lot more—to save the nation's cities. At the outset, he said flatly: "We don't know enough about the problems and we know even less about the solutions." This kind of frankness has been typical of the comments of both the subcommittee members and the witnesses.

Many of the subcommittee members showed astonishment, for example, at the cynicism of most ghetto residents. The distrust and anger that seems to have permeated the minds of even the most innocent of ghetto victims is summarized best, perhaps, by a true story which Bayard Rustin told the panel of Senators last December. Rustin was describing how he and Martin Luther King had gone to Watts after the riots to offer help:

> A young man stood up and told about his group's manifesto, and, quite unsuspectingly, I asked him if I might see a copy of this manifesto, whereupon he took out of his pocket a box of matches, lit one, held it up and said:
> That is our manifesto, burn, baby, burn.
> When we said to him, "But young man, what have you gained by this?" he said:

We asked the mayor to come and talk with us, and he would not come. We asked the governor to come, and he would not come. We asked the chief of police to come, and he would not come. But after we issued our manifesto, they all came.

Then he whispered and said, sotto voce, but loud enough for all of the young teen-agers to hear:

And when you and Dr. King go out in the street, you better be careful, because they sent us so many damn sociologists, baby, so many economists, so many social workers, if you and King aren't careful, you will trip over them on the street.

This is only a tiny segment of the vital drama which is unfolding in hearings which some observers think could be as significant as the Wagner labor relations hearings some thirty years ago. Senators Ribicoff, Robert F. Kennedy and Jacob K. Javits, the principals in the inquiry, are articulate salesmen for the American city. They have brought before the public, perhaps more than any series of television documentaries ever could, the incredibly frightening conditions which exist in most American cities—the violence and race hatred, crime, slums, poor education, unemployment, narcotics, all of the ugliness and decay. The result thus far: a vivid picture of our urban afflictions.

An impressive parade of witnesses have poured out their minds and hearts to the nine-man subcommittee. Big-city mayors such as John Lindsay of New York, Richard Lee of New Haven, Jerome Cavanagh of Detroit and Samuel Yorty of Los Angeles; Cabinet Secretaries such as Robert C. Weaver of the Housing and Urban Development Department (HUD), Willard Wirtz of Labor and Sargent Shriver of the Office of Economic Opportunity; bankers such as David Rockefeller; civil rights leaders Dr. Kenneth B. Clark, Bayard Rustin, Martin Luther King, Floyd McKissick; authors Budd Schulberg, Ralph Ellison, Claude Brown, Harry Golden; educator Dr. James M. Hester of New York University —and many others, including slum residents and slum landlords. The Ribicoff hearings have dealt with everything from economics to philosophy in an attempt to pinpoint the problems and assess the blame. No one is being spared, even the Congress itself. "If there is blame to be placed on any branch of government," Ribicoff stated firmly, "it is going to be placed there."

What has the subcommittee learned so far?

First, it has discovered that much lip service has been paid to the concept of joint government-private enterprise projects, but little in this field has been accomplished. Dr. Weaver said bluntly that this much-desired partnership "has only begun to be put to the test." Harry Golden told the subcommittee that what this country needed was a $100-million domestic Marshall Plan for the ghettos with support from business and industry. Fine, replied Senator Kennedy, but "unless you make it attractive to the private enterprise system," he warned, "it seems to me that the program is not going to appropriate the kinds of sums that we are talking about. . . ." A vague COMSAT-type plan for renewal of cities was mentioned and the Percy Plan (Sen. Charles H. Percy, R., Ill.) for a nation-wide, nonprofit corporation was also entered into the record. Still the subcommittee continues to grasp for workable solutions in the private sector.

New York banker David Rockefeller pointed to some scattered urban rehabilitation projects in New York which he called a "task for private enterprise" but conceded it was only a drop in the bucket. Rockefeller's suggestion is a solid one, Joseph Lyford, an urban expert, testified, but unfortunately it was followed in the business community by what Lyford described as a "crashing silence. Private business," he said, "has been essentially reactive. Business complains about rising taxes and the flight of the middle class. Businessmen themselves threaten to move out every time a sales tax is increased. . . . There are no constructive suggestions . . . private interest has not only abdicated, it has actively promoted the decline of the city."

Dr. Hester confirmed this viewpoint in his testimony. "We have a very serious problem," he said, "with which we in education are concerned: I refer to the alienation of many people who should be most deeply involved in the solution of these problems. We have the businessman who makes his money in the city . . . but then returns to the suburbs in the evening and does not include the city in his civic concern."

Second, testimony from a number of expert witnesses led the panel to conclude, at least temporarily, that the welfare system in urban centers is doing more harm than good. "I think that our philosophy in the past has been mistaken," Kennedy said one day last December in the committee hearing. "What we have done really is lived according to the idea that if we keep people alive, and pay them money, then that is going to solve the problem, while in fact it has really made the individual sicker and it has made the city sicker."

Third, there is no national plan today to solve the many crises of the cities, nor is there the money or political commitment to develop such a plan. Roy Wilkins, long-time head of the NAACP, told the subcommittee that "anything less than a national plan to eliminate the glaring inequities suffered by the Negro solely because of skin color will fall short of meeting the needs of our cities." Wilkins said he supported the creation of HUD, rent subsidies, the Demonstration Cities bill (192 cities are now awaiting word from Washington on applications for planning money) and other forward legislation, but he called these programs "the merest beginnings."

A. Philip Randolph expressed it this way to the Senators: "Unless a forthright master plan is executed, one that sees the problem of housing, schools, jobs and the psychology of the ghetto, as a single problem, then this society will have to acknowledge that it is indirectly saying to the young dispossessed in this nation that if they want something, the only way they can get it is not to depend on leaders who are temperate, leaders who advocate nonviolence, but that they must take the law into their own hands. This is a tragedy."

Walter Reuther asked the subcommittee: "Why is it . . . that when the Defense Department officials plan long-range programs . . . Congress is always willing to give them appropriations over a long enough period and with adequate resources? We did the same thing for the space program. But, unfortunately, when you get to housing and urban affairs, Congress to date has been unwilling to provide the long-range financial commitments which are so essential."

Senator Ribicoff agreed: "One of the problems that worries this subcommittee is that we vote billions of dollars and the President sends up to Congress year after year great programs. Call it the New Deal, Fair Deal, New Frontier or Great Society or what-have-you, they are high-minded and great. We are all for them because we are on the side of the angels, but basically we don't produce the angels."

Fourth, despite the drive to retain the middle class in the heart of our cities, whites continue to move out and Negroes continue to move in. Between 1960 and 1965, Senator Kennedy noted, there was a net decline of 270,000 in the total white population while the Negro population in cities grew by 2 million. The suburbs have gained 9.3 million whites and only 400,000 Negroes in the past five years and the invisible color barrier of the suburbs is as strong as ever.

Fifth, there is a serious communications and understanding gap between the government and the poor. One of the most lively and articulate witnesses, Father Henry J. Browne, president of the Stryckers Bay Neighborhood Council in New York, and a man with a peppery reputation for prodding government officials into action, told the subcommittee last summer: "To my mind the federals avoid the scene in urban renewal like poison. As a matter of fact, we were in this business for three years before we found out where they were. It was always things were being reviewed by the federal people, and this is where the great delay was. We finally found their building and have been descending upon them with regularity ever since." The priest also charged, "I find the social outlook of the bureaucrat, the technocrat, the functionaire is also an obstacle."

Sixth, the widespread belief among whites that the solution to ghetto living is to tear down the ghetto is not at all acceptable to most ghetto residents. Ellison, for example, told the subcommittee: "People want Harlem improved, not torn down. They want Harlem to remain as a base, just as people in their sections want their old blocks to remain as a home base. I think it is just that simple. It is a human reaction, and the only thing that is different is that people in Harlem are usually told that they cannot get out, or if they do get out there is the threat of rioting or threats that their new neighbors will move away from them. That is the difference." Adam Clayton Powell, Harlem's Congressman, said the same thing: "The people of Harlem want a chance to stay in Harlem. It is sort of a mecca, a symbol to black people all over."

Seventh, despite all of the major civil rights legislation which has passed the Congress, the incidence of riots is increasing every year because the Negro's rising expectations are not being met fast enough. In a dialogue with Senator Kennedy, Claude Brown, author of Manchild in the Promised Land, declared: "The older [Negro] generation subscribed to the myth that they were inferior and they weren't supposed to get any more than the white society was giving them. This generation doesn't believe it any more. . . . It demands its share, and you know something, Senator, perhaps no one has taken the time to notice it, but the only thing that has brought any meaningful concessions from the white society into Negro communities has been the riots. Nobody knew that Watts existed prior to the Watts riot." Sen. Joseph M. Montoya of New Mexico, a subcommittee member, summarized the dilemma this way: "The crash programs have generated a feeling that we want all this progress tomorrow or tonight. We don't want to wait, and sociologically that is not possible, because we need time, and in order to educate an individual, it takes years. You cannot do it overnight."

Eighth, neither the nation's housing and construction industry nor the government yet have adequate technology to construct the vast amount of housing needed to rebuild the nation's cities, according to Senator Ribicoff. After listening to several witnesses, he termed the industry "the most outmoded we have today, the industry that has kept up less with technological advances."

The Senator outlined the problem this way: between now and the year 2000, the United States must build as many housing units as it built during the first 200 years of its history. It could be a "good business venture for large industry," but most businesses view the job of rebuilding slum sections of a city as one for government. The Senator then stated: "I am convinced that the job can never be done by government alone. We don't have the money, we don't have the knowledge." In this connection, several witnesses urged more practical research in the mass production of economical housing.

Ninth, Congress itself has not yet fully recognized the importance of the cities even though two-thirds of the people now live in urban areas. Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr., of New Jersey, said the hearings themselves proved the need for the creation of a permanent Senate Committee on Urban Affairs. "Before the turn of the century," he told the hearing, "200 million Americans will be living in cities and suburbs. These people have finally achieved a voice in the Executive Branch (HUD). They need a voice in Congress. HUD is the only department of government which does not have a corresponding Congressional committee."

Tenth, although there is a difference of opinion on which should get top priority—jobs, education or housing—the majority of Negro spokesmen feel the Congress should stress employment above all other needs. A. Philip Randolph, for example, testified: "The teen-agers who throw the Molotov cocktails, who set stores and houses afire, who turn over automobiles, who create disorder in the streets, and so forth, are unemployed. Teen-agers with jobs don't go around throwing Molotov cocktails in store windows. They don't go around creating disorder, because they don't have the time and they don't have the will, if they have jobs. The primary problem of the teen-ager is employment. When he receives employment, his whole reaction to the American community will change."

How do the Senators feel about the hearings so far? Several have publicly offered their opinions during the proceedings. Said Senator Javits: "We have a big responsibility. It is just as much the duty of this subcommittee to take us [Congress] to task as it is to take the Administration to task." And Senator Kennedy added: "This is not just a question of putting a lot more funds in and making all this money available. It is also a question of developing programs that have some meaning."

Senator Ribicoff believes the problem goes to the root of American society. He said, "When we ask the question, how is the federal government organized to handle the crisis of our cities, what we are asking is: can Americans live together, constructively in the midst of a revolution in technology and a revolution in human aspirations? This is the most awesome challenge . . . . It forces us to question all our assumptions and all our policies."

CRIME AND POLITICS

GILBERT GEIS

Mr. Geis, professor of sociology at California State College, Los Angeles, is co-author of Man, Crime and Society (Random House) and editor of White-Collar Criminal (Atherton Press).

There is political capital to be made these days from the subject of crime. President Johnson's Commission on Law Enforcement and the Administration of Justice has just turned in the last of its nine volumes of sophisticated review of the problem, and on the basis of that report the President is lobbying assiduously for passage of his cleverly named Safe Streets and Crime Control legislation. In Detroit, Mayor Jerome P. Cavanagh, faced with a recall vote, has been forced to defend himself against accusations that he has been lax in waging war against crime. Ronald Reagan, with an eye cocked to the national mood, is proclaiming perfervidly that he has made life safer for Californians by severely increasing penalties for armed robbery and rape.

There are subtle matters behind the surging national crusade. For one thing, a campaign against murder and robbery represents in many respects a euphemistic camouflage for attacks on Negroes, who commit strikingly more crimes of violence (though almost always against other Negroes) than members of other groups. For another, self-righteous outbursts against criminal violence, if the psychiatrists are correct, provide a release for pent-up feelings of anger and frustration, themselves teetering on the verge of assaultive eruption. The summoning up of the specter of violent crime plays upon fear.

The President's commission, reasonably enough, deplored the presence of criminal violence in our midst. At the same time it took pains to point out that four times as many persons are killed in highway accidents as are murdered, and it suggested with some vehemence that white-collar crimes—such things as tax fraud, price fixing, embezzlement and advertising violations—may cause more serious damage than the total of crimes of violence. White-collar crime, it was noted, not only costs billions of dollars but threatens the integrity of the society, destroying citizens' faith in their institutions.

The commission then moved gingerly into the main battle arena, first pointing out that "the risk of serious attack from spouses, family members, friends, or acquaintances is almost twice as great as it is from strangers on the street." It came thus to the core matter, suggesting that statistics regarding crimes of violence in the United States are highly suspect, even when viewed on a short-run basis, and notoriously so when surveyed over a period of decades or through generations.

A review of robberies reported from New York and from Chicago provides telling data for the theme that crime statistics, like the drunk's lamppost, are often used more for support than for light. Though Chicago had less than half the population of New York, in 1935 it was reporting eight times as many robberies. It continued to report a higher rate until 1949 when the Federal Bureau of Investigation, which collects national crime statistics, discontinued publication of New York figures because it had lost faith in them. In 1950, when New York installed a central reporting system, robberies rose 400 per cent and burglaries 1,300 per cent, passing Chicago in both categories. In 1959, Chicago installed its central reporting system, and again passed New York. By 1966, with new practices in both jurisdictions, New York was 25 per cent ahead of Chicago in robberies.

With some exasperation, the commission noted that "it seems unlikely that the level of robbery in New York today is thirteen times what it was in 1940 or triple what it was in 1960, but how does one decide for the purpose of long-term comparisons?" "The real question," it observed, "is not the method of estimation, but whether the yardstick at the present time is too changeable to allow significant trend comparisons to be made at the national level."

The Crime Commission is not the first thoughtful group to question the reliability of belligerent cries and loud laments about the alleged upsurge in criminal violence. Nor is it the first to suspect that the publicized national patterns of violence which, at best, can be described as erratic, are functions of matters considerably more fundamental than the evil nature of man, lack of respect for authority or parental malfeasance.

The feeling of menace obviously stems from a good deal more than the realities of the situation. Women may be much safer from criminal assault on dark streets than in their own bedrooms, and kitchen knives may pose a more serious threat than the armamentorium so vigorously glorified by the National Rifle Association, but such data provide small comfort to the alarmed city dweller. Besides, there is little hope of avoiding one's own bedroom, while lonely walks on moonless nights are undertaken at the stroller's option and risk.

The spurious relationship between real danger and people's ideas about it was nicely demonstrated by a research inquiry in Roxbury, Mass., undertaken a few years ago by Walter Miller. Working with 250 gang boys in the area. Miller and his associates attempted a wide range of tactics, most of them "executed with care, diligence and energy by competent and professionally trained workers."

Assessing the results of his project, Miller concluded that it has "negligible impact" in inhibiting law-violating or morally disapproved behavior. But he discovered that it did bring about a number of notable side effects. For one thing, the social workers felt encouraged by their ability to make contact and establish rapport with the gang boys. At some future time they could perhaps turn their new-found confidence to therapeutic ends. More important, Miller discovered that the three-year program had produced a significant feeling of ease and relaxation in Roxbury. Residents reported that they were certain that gang behavior and violence were on the decline, despite the patent contradiction of the statistics. Persons living in the neighborhood derived comfort from the presence of the gang workers, and began to feel something was being done to protect them.

If official statistics regarding crimes of violence are written in sand, and violence itself is often a perceived rather than a real problem, why then is the belief so prevalent in the United States that self-control is out of control and aggression rampant?

Partly, the skyrocketing figures in the FBI's Uniform Crime Reports, neatly packaged for the mass media each quarter, account for public concern. The Reports give numbers and percentages, and it is difficult to modify them with incessant critical and explanatory comment. A few years ago The New York Times undertook a front-page critique of the accuracy of the Reports, and followed it up with supporting testimony from police officials throughout the country. Since then, the Times has relegated stories based on FBI statistics to terse presentations on an inner page. Nevertheless, a Times headline such as that which appeared on June 15, "Major Crimes Up By 20% in Nation," cannot but have an impact, whatever its challenge to credulity.

Other things make criminal violence seem more ominous than it may actually be. For one thing, sensation is communicated more vividly today than it was in the past. Violence in minority group ghettos, once an intramural matter, is now carefully attended to by all of us. As communications have improved, much of the isolation imposed by transportation barriers has lessened. In earlier days, respectable community members moved between their houses and their work on well-trod, clean-cut paths. Today, they are apt to find themselves cutting across sections of the city perhaps never seen by their forebears. We come to view more and more of what is alien to us, which is often disturbing.

This point has been made well by the sociologist Daniel Bell, who observed that "the 'nostalgic' memories of oldsters for quiet, tree-shaded sections of the city are not so much distorted in time as in space. Because the city was marked off by neighborhoods, crime and quiet could coexist, without each section, or class, being immediately aware of the other." But "if violence, once bounded, has flowed over the walls," Bell notes, "it is not true that the amount of violence has increased."

The same note of skepticism regarding the alleged increases in criminal violence pervades a recent issue of the Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science. Various authors looked closely at violence on the American labor scene, in politics, among city gangs, in prisons, in organized crime and in literature. Their views, summarized by Marvin E. Wolfgang, graduate chairman of the sociology department at the University of Pennsylvania, were strikingly similar: "Contrary to the rise in public fear," Professor Wolfgang noted, "crimes of violence are not significantly increasing." Juvenile gangs were found to engage more in verbal violence than in violent behavior, and the amount of the latter was found to be "surprisingly low." Organized crime was said to have shifted from blatant assault to financial fighting, with only an occasional subterranean resort to physical force. It was reported that no one had been slain in a labor dispute in the United States since the 1950s. A review of crime and arrest data, "while far from being statistically conclusive," indicated no substantial increase in aggressive crimes during recent years. Murder rates had remained fairly constant. Robbery and forcible rape rates showed moderate increases. Aggravated assault rates had risen the most but were far below the increases for property or nonviolent crime. And again the persuasive observation that fails to persuade the public: "The development and extension of better reporting standards by law enforcement agencies probably has contributed substantially to the increase found in published statistics."

There is irony, finally, in the fact that our concern with criminal violence is becoming particularly acute at a moment when young persons, the most violence-prone members of the society, are defecting in large numbers to the hippy ranks, coming together for love-ins, beflowered and carrying tambourines and flutes. Hippies disproportionately are protesters against force, particularly international force, and it is their boys who, with their long hair and often delicate ways, blend masculine roles—traditionally tied to toughness, aggressiveness and violence—with more passive and peaceful female ones.

The splintering of adolescent ranks draws attention to contradictions in the United States regarding violence. It has been noted, for example, that middle-class parents, who generally deplore the use of force, are most apt to use it when their children hit other children. On the other hand, if women of the working class may to some extent still regard beatings by their husbands as signs of certain affection, middle-class women usually will no longer tolerate physical aggression from their mates. In this matter, as in many others, the final verdict is still not in, but the trend seems inexorably in the direction of a downgrading of violence, not only in the middle class but ultimately throughout American society.

It is not unlikely that crimes of violence, despite public fear and political concern, are decreasing in American society, particularly when account is taken of such factors as urbanization, which are invariably correlated with violence. When the conditioning factors are stabilized, the nature of our crime problem may become clearer.

RIVERS OF BLOOD, YEARS OF DARKNESS. By Robert Conot. Bantam Books. 497 pp. 95c paper.

LOUIS KAMPF

Mr. Kampf is an associate professor at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. His book, On Modernism: The Prospects for Literature and Freedom (MIT Press) has just been published. It should be noted that Mr. Kampf's review was written before the recent events in Newark and Detroit.

We Americans are notorious for lacking a sense of history. Therefore reading these two books together—one on the French revolution of 1848, the other on the racial violence of August, 1965, which turned a substantial part of Los Angeles into an ash heap—helps to put the difficulties of the moment in their proper perspective. Both the French and the current Negro revolutions began as attempts, by a broadly based coalition of moderates, liberals and radicals, to legally rectify institutionalized injustices; both developed into violent popular uprisings.

One of the virtues of Conot's highly detailed account is its unhesitating definition of events in Los Angeles as an insurrection. Obvious? Not to most. For in spite of the scope of recent ghetto disturbances (in Los Angeles over 4,000 people were arrested and 13,000 of the available 18,000 National Guardsmen were pressed into service), we refuse to recognize what is happening in our (their?) streets as anything more than riots randomly incited by hoodlums. This may lend comfort to our more simple-minded municipal officials; it will not lead to a proper understanding of events.

Official incomprehension derives from a perversion of historical analysis. For we are all victims—government officals as well as intellectuals—of an academic historiography which beclouds our perception of the obvious. The possibility of seeing American events as expressions of class interest or incipient revolutionary sentiment has become, like so much else, a victim of the cold war. To this, the eclipse of Charles Beard bears eloquent enough witness. The desire to justify America's world position has led a generation of historians to elevate a few ill-founded assertions to the level of unassailable dogmas: America is singular and not to be talked of in terms of Europe; because of our innate pragmatism and the marvelously pliable nature of our institutions, all change has been evolutionary and nonviolent; ours is a wondrously classless society; and finally, America, owing to the expansion of its economy and the enlightened nature of its business establishment, has been able to satisfy and reconcile all group interests. These imperatives have made poverty, racism, violence and an imperialistic foreign policy subjects to be ignored. But America's ghettos have refused to accommodate our historians and social scientists. We might yet have to look at the Negro revolution in terms of the history of European proletarian insurrections.

For this the late Georges Duveau's book should prove highly useful. It provides no substitute for Marx's (in Class Struggles in France) or Arthur Rosenberg's (in Democracy and Socialism) more formal analyses of 1848, but it turns the limitations of its impressionism to great advantage. For Duveau's seemingly haphazard dependence on the revolution's innumerable memoirs allows him to compose a finely balanced picture which affords the reader a participant's perception of events on the streets, of those popular insurrectionary ideas which, giving form to class hatreds, generate revolutionary fervor. And it is to the streets, to the sources of popular action, we must look if we are to understand 1848's progress from bourgeois reform—from Guizot's resignation, the proclamation of the republic, and the call for universal suffrage—to the Paris workers' demands for social equality and economic justice. Their attempt to make themselves heard by the use of mass demonstrations led, at first, to the workers' isolation from their former allies; eventually, to the brutal imposition of "order" by the military strongman, Cavaignac.

To those having the least acquaintance with the progress of the Civil Rights movement and its relevance to the life of the ghetto, all this should have the monotonous ring of familiarity. The shift from demonstrating for desegregation and the vote, to rioting for economic equality and black power, has given most whites an excuse for washing their hands of the whole problem, for having the police impose "order" on the ghetto, while yet insisting that Negroes are equal. Most whites are conveniently ignorant—at so late a date—of the wretched lives led in the ghetto. For them, Conot's account—in spite of its journalistic clichés, its mass of irrelevant detail, and its gratingly inept metaphors—should be required reading. The book is a catalogue of injustices, of those petty indignities which relentlessly gnaw at the humanity of any ghetto dweller. There is no end to them; and no end to the necessity for swallowing one's pride and submitting. The harassment, after all, is institutionalized; its administration officially sanctioned by the state. Thus any symbol of white authority becomes the mortal enemy of the black man's dignity. The Los Angeles insurrection, Conot makes clear, was an assertion of freedom, an anarchist outburst by those at the bottom of the industrial system against any sign of white authority. Thus it directed itself to the destruction of property—public or private.

Then why did this development—even the simple matter of the Negro's hatred for his white oppressor—shock with surprise? Events, after all, did follow an unusually clear historical logic: class interests (or just human feelings) were bound to assert themselves, and to generate the inevitable social divisions. Even that now distant symbol of unity, the March on Washington, with all its talk of love and its invocation of the American Dream, showed most of the symptoms of the coming split. Or it did so for those whose senses were not benumbed by the repetitive drone of We Shall Overcome, who were not blinded by the dogma of America's social system allowing for the peaceful resolution of all interests and struggle.

The success of the March on Washington was measured by the federal guarantee of voting rights. Yet 1848 might have taught us that electoral reform rarely implies social equality or the elimination of poverty. For the Paris proletariat the attainment of universal suffrage could lead only to disappointment feeding anger and, eventually, to the desperate violence of the June uprising. After that declaration of class warfare, all future revolutions, Marx remarked, would mean the overthrow of society, not of the state.

The illusions engendered by the illogically broad coalition which proclaimed the republic in 1848—it included the army, the church, some monarchists and representatives of the middle and working classes—blinded most revolutionaries to the incipient class struggle. They too had their slogans, repeated from an earlier revolution, about brotherhood and unity—what Marx called the poetry of Lamartine. Yet for years, a popular Jacobinism had been developing in the radical clubs. Has this been happening in Los Angeles? Was the uprising of 1965 spontaneous? Or had people, in fact, been organizing and educating themselves for revolution?

Conot gives us no convincing answers to these questions. For unlike Duveau, whose fine chapter on the popular lore of the barricades he might have studied profitably, he does not take naive insurrectionary ideas seriously; therefore, he does not really listen for their effects on the streets. The ghetto dweller's memories of past disorders, of slogans shouted and discussed, build their own traditions, their own bonds, their methods of organization: they create, in short, revolutionary possibilities. Conot loses few opportunities to ridicule the (occasionally odd) ideas of black nationalists: this may be his privilege; to ignore their relevance to the uprising is not. For the fate of these ideas will determine whether the ghetto can develop the sophistication of the Paris proletariat in 1848; whether the black poor can move beyond the limited objective of getting Whitey.

There is little evidence that Conot takes political ideas seriously. This does not keep him from being an honest and thorough reporter, but it does lead him to look at violence as a psychological perversion rather than a political weapon. Conot has the liberal's faith that enlightened self-interest, common sense, and a better program of community relations can lead to racial reconciliation and the betterment of the ghetto resident's lot. Once more, there is a lesson to be learned from 1848. The first task of the new government was "to provide food, peace, and freedom for all"; the next, to call for an assembly elected by universal suffrage. But can these two objectives be combined without a clash of interests? Can any assembly which will oppose those who hold economic power be elected? Or if elected, exercise power? The government established the National Workshops (to implement the right to work) and the Luxembourg Commission (for labor), but left both without the power to implement their policies. Acting as if they intended to take their radical ideas seriously only led to their summary dissolution. No resolution of interests was possible, and the failure of the Luxembourg turned the workers to insurrection and the barricades. Appropriately, it was the petty bourgeois legions (mostly shopkeepers) of the National Guard who, having played a vital part in the establishment of the republic, now destroyed the workers (naturally unarmed) in the name of "order."

The parallels to developments in the Negro revolution should be obvious. Nothing, any ghetto dweller knows, is gotten without power. Yet here is a part of Conot's solution for the difficulties he describes so vividly:

> Only if honesty replaces hypocrisy; only if expediency gives way to enlightenment; only if policy is made paramount to politics, may a genuine beginning be made to solving the interwoven racial and economic problems of America. And the problems must be solved, for they present a threat to the very survival of this nation on the concepts upon which it was founded.

The spirit of these sentences derives from Conot's failure to place his report in the context of the history of social struggles or within a general analysis of American society. His book is a catalogue of injustices, yet he makes little attempt to get at their source. The "survival of this nation on the concepts upon which it was founded"? But is it not these concepts which enable those with political and economic power to keep the Negro peacefully shuffling in his place? Isn't Conot really telling us that the nature of the American system makes struggle and violence inevitable? That the destruction of "the concepts upon which (this nation) was founded" might, in fact, be necessary for the Negro to attain social and economic equality? Racism and capitalism are not historical accidents whose effects are to be exhorted or psychologized away. The Bill of Rights does not exist in an economic vacuum. If the people of Watts are to break out of their perpetual misery, they will not get very far by appealing to their legal rights or to the noble words of the Constitution; these last years have taught them that they have little choice but to consider the white bourgeoisie as their class enemy—for it will give away nothing: neither out of moral feelings, nor even self-interest.

What is to be the fate of the current wave of uprisings? The June days of 1848 led to the inevitable reaction: 3,000 workers were executed, more than 11,000 arrested and deported. Had the insurrectionists of Los Angeles known of the ammunition depot and the magnesium and napalm plants in their midst, they could have destroyed the city. The revenge visited upon them might have dwarfed the June massacre into insignificance. The question is not whether there will be violence but what ends it will be made to serve. Will the ghettos use it to build stronger organizational and fraternal ties? to attain at least some of its objectives? Or will there be a succession of momentary outbursts, of emotional releases, which will lead only to the further isolation and the ultimate destruction of the Negro in America? Of the Los Angeles uprising's long-range effect on the black community, Conot, not surprisingly, has preciously little to tell us.

As General Duvivier lay dying during the June days, felled by an insurrectionist's bullet, he was heard to say: "These poor workers should be given employment: the nation's hand should be opened for them." The Negroes of our country are still shown little more than a closed fist.

John Coltrane: 1926-1967

A. B. SPELLMAN

Mr. Spellman is a poet and jazz critic. He is the author of Four Lives in the Bebop Business (Pantheon).

My first reaction to John Coltrane's death was more selfish than I'd like to believe: I thought, but there's so much he hasn't played yet!, as if I was being capriciously deprived of a source I had every right to expect to flow freely forever.

At his funeral, though, and in conversation with people committed like myself to the music of John Coltrane and of those who may be said to be his followers, I encountered similar sentiments. In the last ten years, I have spent more time with this man on records and at in-person appearances than with any single person I know, excepting my wife, and there are many others who can say the same thing.

The musicians at the funeral felt such a loss. 'Trane had been their spiritual leader, perhaps the one man most responsible for the breakthrough into the New Music of the sixties. That explains the moving tributes played there by the Albert Ayler and Ornette Coleman groups. Certainly, his is the voice one hears most often from the horns of today's reedmen. A-melodic, screeching and blasting, interminably free, he blew a music of ultimate emotional statement. He was a paramount soloist, and for ten years we watched his solos grow in weight, length and complexity, until it required such listener commitment that his critics thought he would frighten audiences away from jazz. When sitting in front of Coltrane, one had to be prepared to have one's nervous system cathartically disassembled to the point that it was painful to think that he would go further. And he would, always.

That, too, was heard at the funeral. Did John's music kill him? Could a man give up all that feeling night after night and walk in sanity and good health? I have thought that many times. Two sets of his wailing always left me feeling that the man was about to blow his tubes, and the rumor that I heard at the funeral, that 'Trane had been complaining that it hurt him to play in weeks before he died, was said so as to imply that he had blown his life out of his horn.

That he should die of an inflamed liver was surprising to all of us who knew him. True, we had heard him complain about his health periodically, but he seemed such a strong man, and he had become a nondrinking vegetarian in his last years; and whenever he was not on the road, he stayed quietly in Dix Hills, Long Island, studying new instruments: sitar, lukembi, koto and bass clarinet (this horn belonged to Eric Dolphy, and was given to John by Dolphy's mother after that young genius fell dead two years ago on a German concert stage of an undiscovered case of diabetes).

I came to realize that John Coltrane was a prime musical innovator in the summer of 1957, when he was working with Thelonius Monk at the Five Spot. He had previously been heard with Miles Davis, and before that he had made the kind of rounds that most young jazz musicians make while working their way up: section work with Dizzy Gillespie, sideman work with Johnny Hodges, Earl Bostic, Eddie "Cleanhead" Vinson and rhythm and blues singers too numerous to name.

At the Five Spot, assisting in Monk's long-overdue repatriation into the jazz club, John found himself in one of those rare historic groupings wherein innovators of two generations came together to forge new means of expression. Monk, of course, was one of the key gurus of the bebop revolution. Shadow Wilson, the drummer in that group, had participated in that revolution; and Wilbur Ware, the bassist, was of Coltrane's generation, and his work in the Monk group was the beginning of the liberation of the jazz bassist from the role of metronomic accompanist.

John found his chordal explorations broadened by a pianist and composer whose comping was dissonant and placed in odd sections of the beat. To quote myself, "we hear(d) Coltrane's relatively abstract explorations of chordal progressions, with violent scales and rapid clusters of notes that uncoil into long, twisted lines. There (was) also Coltrane's sound, shrill and uncomfortable, directed at the nerve ends." Unfortunately, this band was never adequately recorded, for we have only three bands of one LP, Thelonius Monk with Coltrane (Riverside 490) to remind us of their work.

But serious musicians and students of jazz attended that band very carefully, and it was immediately apparent that East Coast hard bop tenor saxophone transcriptions of Bird licks would do no longer. Sonny Rollins was the dominant tenor saxophone voice of the fifties, but from this point on, the young tenor saxophonists would infuse more and more of the Coltrane sound into

BLACK POWER, WHITE RESISTANCE:
Notes On The New Civil War.
by Fred Powledge

This comprehensive analysis, by an extremely well informed observer, deals with a simple but explosive question: Can Negroes and whites get along together in this country? This is not a collection of generalities, but rather a thorough assessment that goes to the root of existent problems in the North as well as South. He describes what has been done and what must be done to cope with one of the most ominous problems facing this country. It is clearly one of the best books available on this subject today.

the Rollins method, until the password came to be "Freedom!!"

After Monk, John Coltrane went back to Miles for two years, during which time he extended his modal investigations, to the horror of his critics. This has been called his "architectonic" period, when his longest solos would consist of two or three brilliantly constructed lines. Blue Trane (Blue Note 577) with Coltrane as leader, and Milestones (Columbia CL1193) are good examples of his work in this period.

With the advent of Ornette Coleman and Cecil Taylor in the sixties, John, no longer isolated in exploration, found new freedom. His solos eschewed logical, thematic development and went for direct, powerful emotional communication through intense vertical chordal note clusters. This confounded the critics—there simply was no point in dissecting these solos; one judged them in terms of the sweat one expended digging them, and the limpness one felt when they were over. To quote myself again, these solos "had to be measured in quarter hours rather than in choruses, solos like soul rinsings which left his audiences dripping from exhaustion."

In his last few years, John developed a deep theosophic kind of spirituality. This, combined with a desire to make definite statements about the culture and condition of his people, gave his music a programmatic quality and led him to develop new musical techniques such as the use of voice, as in A Love Supreme (Impulse A77) and in Kulu Se Mama (Impulse A9106).

Since 1960 the New Music, which is decidedly long form, has outgrown its scene, and in the last year 'Trane became more and more concerned with this predicament. He said to me, "the way things are going now, everybody in the band can solo for a half hour or even longer. But in the clubs, they want us to play forty-five-minute sets, and that's just time for one solo. So where are we going to play?" He thought he might open up his own club, nonalcoholic if necessary, so that all musicians could present their music in whatever format they wanted.

Throughout his career as a leader, John Coltrane used his night club appearances and record dates to sponsor new talent; not only the necessary sidemen like drummers Elvin Jones and Rashied Ali and bassist Jimmy Garrison but also the best of the reedmen, like Pharaoh Saunders, Archie Shepp, Albert Ayler and Eric Dolphy, all of whom were, in the marketing sense, his competitors. Such was the unselfishness of this artist, whose art was by nature selfless. And that's why I felt so selfishly last week that death had stolen something from me.

Pornography and Violence

IRVING YOUNGER

Mr. Younger is professor of law at New York University School of Law. He was formerly Assistant United States Attorney for the Southern District of New York.

Ian Brady and Myra Hindley were tried, convicted and sentenced last year in the Assize Court at Chester, England, for the murder of Edward Evans (17 years old) and Lesley Ann Downey (10 years old). Brady alone was convicted of murdering John Kilbride 12 years old). The killings were particularly atrocious. It appears that Brady and Hindley tortured and sexually abused the two children, as an extra fillip tape-recording the agonies of the girl. They buried the bodies on the moors outside Chester.

Of normal intelligence and without clinical symptoms of madness, the murderers were students of sado-masochism, sexual perversion and fascism, on which subjects they had accumulated a small library (e.g., The Pleasures of the Torture Chamber, Sexual Anomalies and Perversions, Mein Kampf). Their especial hero was the Marquis de Sade.

Pamela Hansford Johnson has made rather a good thing out of these infamous murders. Assigned by the London Sunday Telegraph to cover the trial, she wrote it up for Life,* and then published a book that, although silent on its genesis, is in fact an expansion of the Life article.

Miss Hansford Johnson speculates whether society should not limit the freedom of the writer to write obscenity in order to lessen the risk that at other times and places other demons like Brady and Hindley may be driven by books to commit dreadful crimes. She gives no answers, resting on the hope that her book will set others thinking.

Let us try.

The issue is one of law, since the limitation of freedom is an end to which law is the means.

In Britain, by the Obscene Publications Act of 1959, a person may be imprisoned for publishing obscenity, which the act defines as any article whose effect is "such as to tend to deprave and corrupt persons" who are likely to be exposed to it.

In the United States, a federal statute makes it a felony to mail anything which is "obscene, lewd, lascivious, indecent, filthy or vile." Piling up words is no way to convey meaning. What exactly the American statute forbids is as difficult to say as what exactly the British statute forbids. So we pass directly to the initial query:

What are we talking about? The plain answer is that we are talking about pornography. The trouble with this plain answer is that it is impossible once and for all to define pornography. In a recent case, the Supreme Court announced that seven Justices have four different ideas of pornography. Justices Black and Douglas believe that government is utterly without power to suppress or control pornography, whatever it is. Justice Stewart would limit government's power to the suppression of "hard-core" pornography, which he cannot define. Chief Justice Warren, Justice Brennan and Justice Fortas think that obscenity is material that taken as a whole appeals to a prurient interest in sex, is patently offensive when measured by contemporary community standards, and is utterly without redeeming social value. Justice Harlan is of the opinion that redeeming social value has nothing to do with it.

If we do not concern ourselves unduly with the Supreme Court's verbalizations, we can read its many decisions on obscenity as follows: (1) there is something called pornography which, by the gambit of labeling it not-speech, the Court casts beyond the protection of the First Amendment to the Constitution; (2) because it is beyond the protection of the First Amendment, pornography may be forbidden, controlled or regulated; (3) it is bootless to try to define pornography in the abstract, for whatever the Court thinks should be forbidden, controlled or regulated is pornography; (4) the Court does not yet understand fully the considerations that determine whether material should be forbidden, controlled or regulated. Perhaps something of this was in Justice Stewart's mind when, in a case several years ago, he said that he couldn't define pornography, "but I know it when I see it."

In order to discourse rationally, we need to be somewhat less pithy than Justice Stewart, and so we shall posit a definition: pornography is material that deals with sexual life.

The considerations that determine whether pornography should be forbidden, regulated or controlled are not, after all, so very obscure. One way to illuminate them is to examine the value of pornography from the viewpoint of the pornographer, the pervert and the ordinary person.

---

*"Who's to Blame When a Murderer Strikes?" August 12, 1966.

 On Iniquity. Charles Scribner's Sons.

An obvious value of pornography to the pornographer is its profitability. We can readily imagine a pornographer for whom pornography has no other value—the peddler of filthy post cards, of lubricious comic strips, of priapic motion pictures. We can just as easily imagine a pornographer for whom pornography has some other value. Pornography may be the substance of comedy (Gargantua and Pantagruel, Book 2, chapters 21-22) or of tragedy (Les Liaisons Dangereuses). Pornography may supply the rhetoric to vivify an otherwise dull text (Ezekiel). Pornography may symbolize something not pornographic (The Song of Songs). Pornography may create a special aesthetic effect when couched in a style commonly put to the service of quite other matters (Catullus LVI).

> O rem ridiculam, Cato, et iocosam > dignamque auribus et tuo cachinno.
> Ride, quicquid amas, Cato, Catullum:
> res est ridicula et nimis iocosa.
> Deprendi modo pupulum puellae
> crustantem: hunc ego, si placet Dionae, > pro telo rigida mea cecidi.
> An absurd and laughable thing, Mr. President, > well suited to your ears and famous smile.
> Lord love you, Mr. President, listen
> To this absurd and laughable thing.
> I stumbled on a youth trying to bugger a girl,
> And, Lord love me, I, with my much bigger thing,
> While he was so busy, neatly buggered him.

In short, pornography is important to art. None would object to curtailing the freedom of the pornographer whose sole motive is profit, if one could be sure that the artist's freedom to use pornography would not also be circumscribed. The problem seems to be that the law does not know how to tell the artist from the entrepreneur. The Supreme Court says that a redeeming social value is what divides art from commerce. How then tell whether a work has redeeming social value? Chief Justice Warren and Justices Brennan, Fortas and Stewart think Fanny Hill has it. Justices Clark, Harlan and White think not. When reasonable men cannot agree on the result, it may be that the formula is wrong.

To find out whether a certain pornographer is an artist, why not ask other artists? Their opinion will conclude the matter. Such a test would have two of the greatest virtues a law can have—simplicity and certainty. At a pornography trial, the defendant would call artists to the witness stand. If they testify that the defendant is an artist, the judge dismisses the case, for the artist should be exempt from punishment as a pornographer. If no artists believe that the defendant is one, the jury convicts him and the judge sentences him, for punishment should be the lot of the pecuniary pornographer.

What marriage manuals are to the innocent, pornography is to the pervert. Where else, if not in pornography, can he find out how to vent his passions. Not every deviate is as fecund of satisfactions as the copious de Sade. Burning with a fire that he cannot name, let alone learn how to quench, his libido may boil over into brutish violence (one Jack the Ripper is enough), whereas, could he only read somewhere what men similarly situated have done in the past, he might well find some relatively harmless means of release. Most of us have at one time or another asked, "What exactly is it that pederasts (for example), do?" The nascent pederast is no different. What exactly is he to do? He finds the answer, as the rest of us have found it, in pornography.

The social utility of pornography to perverts has been insufficiently appreciated.

To ordinary persons, pornography is a pleasant diversion. It is absurd that the heavy weaponry of the law should be brought to bear on such a trifle. The lawyers themselves know that quixotry never justifies resort to the majesty of the law. De minimis non curat lex, they say. The law does not concern itself with small things.

Ordinary persons do, however, concern themselves with their small children. If parents think it desirable, they may elect to supply their small children with pornography, but most, for self-evident reasons, will not. The latter object to the activities of any pornographer who caters to their children, for the very good reason that nobody relishes interference with his right to raise his children as he sees fit. So any law that forbids strangers to feed pornography to children will receive general approbation.

Ordinary persons believe that they can take pornography or leave it alone. Their picture of their sexual selves is one of sophisticated self-control. Accordingly, the pornographer who thrusts his merchandise on a disinterested or reluctant customer makes himself a stench in the nostrils of the community. Should the law interdict him, all would applaud.

This is not to say that pornography as an element of salesmanship must be forbidden. Without pornography, advertising would make dull reading indeed. The leer of the sensualist has long been recognized as a way to get people to buy. In On Iniquity, for example, Miss Hansford Johnson leers like a sensualist every 15 pages or so:

> There is not much doubt that the child was submitted to gross sexual indignities after the photographs were taken and, presumably, between the two periods when she seems to have been gagged. The transcript may be read in more than one way, but only one of them really makes some dreadful sense.

A PROPOSITION

A wild new thing is about to happen: the mad, mod scene is about to witness the birth of a fantastic new magazine destined for greatness. Its name is Avant-Garde.

As its name implies, Avant-Garde will be a forward-directed, daring, and wildly hedonistic magazine. It will report on every aspect of the ebullient new life-style now emerging in America, and it will do so with no put-ons and no inhibitions.

The pages of Avant-Garde will explode with biting satire, incisive profiles, audacious reportage, lush graphic art, consciousness-expanding fiction, and poetry that speaks. Avant-Garde will cover Art, Politics, Science, and every other subject of interest to readers of superior intelligence and cultivated taste. It will be a bimonthly of:

—beauty, bringing to graphic art a transcendental new kind of high;

—truth, eschewing platitudes and really telling it like it is; and —love, unabashedly reveling in the One Universal Ultimate Good.

In short, Avant-Garde will be a hip, joyous, beautiful new magazine. It will be the voice of the Turned-On Generation.

Perhaps the best way to describe Avant-Garde for you is to list the kinds of articles it will print:

In sum, Avant-Garde will be a feast of gourmet food-for-thought prepared by the avant-garde for the avant-garde. It will be the quintessence of intellectual sophistication.

The creative director of Avant-Garde is one of the most fertile minds in American publishing today: Herb Lubalin, the country's foremost art director (it was he who designed the elegant—and cruelly suppressed—quarterly Eros). In addition, the staff of Avant-Garde includes several of the most gifted artists, writers, and photographers of our time.

In format, Avant-Garde will more closely resemble an expensive art folio than a magazine. It will be printed by costly offset lithography on the finest antique and coated papers. It will be bound in 12-point Frankote boards. It will carry no advertising whatsoever.

Avant-Garde will be available by subscription only. It will cost $10 per year. This is not inexpensive, but we have a proposition:

People who talk about the trial, who have followed, even closely, the press reports, have small idea what it actually meant: what actually happened. What did happen to Lesley Ann Downey, as is generally agreed by those close to the case, I cannot put on paper.

Pornography is so deeply rooted in the tradition of literary salesmanship that it cannot be excised. Who would ever approve a law that might punish Pamela Hansford Johnson as a pornographer?

A failure to perceive the connection between advertising and pornography may explain the Supreme Court's decision in the Ralph Ginzburg case, surely one of the silliest opinions ever written. Recently the Court held publications such as Lust Pool, Shame Agent and High Heels to be not obscene. Yet Ginzburg was convicted (and sentenced to five years' imprisonment) for publishing Eros, a magazine devoted to charmingly romantic celebrations of sex, The Housewife's Handbook on Selective Promiscuity, a bland, clumsy and moralizing account of a lady's sexual experiences, and Liaison, a pamphlet containing articles on sex reprinted from professional journals. Recognizing that such material by its own tests is not obscene, the Supreme Court looked to Ginzburg's supposedly pornographic advertising to support the conviction. If it were not for Ginzburg's punishment, the opinion would be little more than cause for fun with the Court. Remembering his punishment, the angel of reason and justice must weep.

Granted! Miss Hansford Johnson might cry, but you have not faced up to the basic question, which is "whether, by making all books available to all men, we do not pay too high a price, if that price should be the death of one small child by torture."

When she suggests that literature drives men to torture and murder, Miss Hansford Johnson indulges in the pathetic fallacy of investing one's self and one's works with the power of miracles. Who has not walked in the street and seen a child suffering at nature's not always perfect hand—a little girl with palsy, perhaps, or a mongoloid boy? Who has not then said to himself, "If I could buy normalcy for that child at the price of my sight (or my right arm, or both my legs, or my life, I would pay it." So with artists. How pleasurable to imagine that, if only they gave up their art, the children would be healed, would live.

Unfortunately for the poetry of things, there is no shred of evidence to think so. As Miss Hansford Johnson puts the question, it is too easy. Of course the death of one small child, by torture or otherwise, is too high a price to pay for "making all books available to all men." The problem, really, is whether, if we paid the price, one small child might live who otherwise would die. That answer nobody knows. Without proof, the sane legislator will not restrict the artist's freedom to create or the audience's freedom to consume.

Certain limitations on pornography, we see, would be wise and feasible. They can be expressed in a simple code. (1) "Pornography" means material that deals with sexual life. (2) It is forbidden to sell or give pornography to any person under the age of 18 who is not the child of the seller or giver. (3) It is forbidden to attempt to sell or give pornography to anyone who is unwilling to buy or receive it.

Here we have an answer to Miss Hansford Johnson's question. And once more Iago proves himself the most percipient of psychologists: "If the balance of our lives had not one scale of reason to poise another of sensuality, the blood and baseness of our nature would conduct us to most preposterous conclusions."

Sholom Aleichem in the Park

SIDNEY BERNARD

Mr. Bernard is the New York editor of Literary Times.

The real long-hot-summer's insurrection is taking place in Central Park on almost any night and Sunday afternoons—starting north from Harlem Meer (Negro and Spanish dance evenings) to the middle reaches at Delacorte Theater (Joseph Papp's free Shakespeare evenings and Jewish, Negro and Puerto Rican poetry-folk song programs on open-date Mondays) to the southerly open reaches of Sheep Meadow (for those massive and high-quality Philharmonic music-ins, and the Sunday be-ins, smoke-ins and what's-next-ins) to the still further south Wollman Skating Rink (where jazz and folk of the pantheon are heard at Rheingold beer prices) and doubling back over the whole park, athlete-wise (for week-end bike-ins with no vehicular presence more threatening than a baby pram or horse-drawn hansom). A marathon of alfresco pleasure, most all of it free.

On a recent Monday at the Delacorte the program was "An Evening of Yiddish Poetry and Folk Music" and one's feeling was: You don't have to be Jewish to enjoy—or, conversely, the whole world's Jewish in this area of the arts. The foibles and folk wisdom of a Sholom Aleichem, to cite one part of the program, translate with ease to all conditions and climes. The material partakes of an irreducible human capacity for self-jesting, basic pride and rapport among one's fellows that goes beyond national or ethnic barriers.

This mood of universality was put across trimly and professionally. And the setting—the magic backdrop of Belvedere pond, the high stony crag upon which the castle sits, the hazy orange three-quarter moon above, and the nestling intimacy of an S.R.O. crowd of 2,300 in the oatmeal bowl theatre—was a par excellence treat. The evening opened with readings from several Yiddish poets—Yuri Suhl, Itzik Manger, Martin Birnbaum, Moishe Nadir and Itzik Feffer among them—read from sitting position on high stools by Suhl, Birnbaum, Michael Gorrin and Zelda Lerner—and translated by James Ray, in what turned out to be the only strictly Anglo-Saxon accent of the evening—albeit an accent that swayed like the bulrushes with a dip here for humor, a firming there for pride of being and a tensing in a third place for loss or suffering.

Covered were such topics as sweatshops, the futility of war (specifically, the Czar's war), labor in its best and worst guises, the ghetto, and Jews as a timeless and wandering people. Most moving of the dozen or so poems, judging from the rapt involvement of the audience, was a traditional epic by Feffer called Ich Bin a Yid, which recounted in stately cadence Jewish woe through the ages—from Torquemada on through Hitler. The title line motif ("From under swords my sigh was heard,/ I am a Jew. . . . ") became a capsule of triumph over adversity, as if no loss or calumny would ever erase inner identity. Moishe Nadir's Mein Leben or My Life was on the other hand a quizzical and humorous other side of the coin: "Give me your life," says the Czar. "It's not mine to give," comes the answer. "It is God's. War or no war, it depends on direct orders from Herr Jehovah."

The verse was followed by folk songs, performed by Martha Schlamme, and in Yiddish song, Miss Schlamme is baleboste (or "boss"). She was blonde-topped, and dressed in a near-mini fishnet orange gown, all of which made a blend with that misty orange moon, the moon peeking on intimately from a nine o'clock position to the stage. Assisted by Mordechai Sheinkman on piano, Miss Schlamme offered comic songs from the East European shtetl, songs of adolescent love and family set pieces that are steeped in tradition. Although hers is not a big voice, she nevertheless had a rousing effect on the audience, an effect not unlike a Melina Mercouri of Yiddish folk. Miss Schlamme was followed by a reading in English of Sholom Aleichem's "The Clock That Struck Thirteen," brought to life by Miss Lerner with clarity and high humor.

Last on the bill was a concert reading of "A Tale of Chelm," from The World of Sholom Aleichem by Arnold Perl. And here the evening was in full orbit—out in that serene and heady and improbable high ozone of the Yiddish author's comic-serious genius. "Why is the ocean salty?" asks Mendele the book peddler of Rabbi David. "You don't know?" the Rabbi responds, in a tone of chagrin. "No." "Because of the thousands of herring that swim there." And this joke from The Melamed, or village teacher: "If I were the czar I'd be richer than the czar. Why? I'd do a little teaching on the side."

The meaty part of "A Tale of Chelm" had to do with The Melamed going to town to buy a goat—"Not just any goat, but a female goat," his wife Rifkele warns—so that the couple could enjoy a gourmet treat of cheese blintzes. What happened on the way and back was a tour of folk humor ("Canterbury Tales East"?) that brought waves of laughter every step. Will Lee in the teacher role and Zelda Lerner as the wife were particularly good. James Ray as Mendele, Michael Gorrin as Rabbi David and Martha Schlamme as The Goatseller completed the cast.

The full program was directed by Bernard Gersten — who everywhere coaxed rather than pushed his material and principals. Itche Goldberg was literary adviser and the lighting—always a strong plus in Delacorte productions—was by Martin Aronstein. Two programs of poetry and folk music remain—Monday, August 14 (Negro) and Monday, August 21 (Puerto Rican). As we say—get over to Central Park.

THEATRE/ Julius Novick

In its little eyrie theatre atop a green hill overlooking downtown Cincinnati, the Playhouse in the Park serves up, for the most part, the conventional regional-theatre repertory: this year's schedule includes The Fantasticks, The Birthday Party and Uncle Vanya. Unlike most such theatres, however, the Playhouse manages to include a surprise or two every season. Last year it presented the American premiere of Eh? by Henry Livings; this June it offered the American premiere of The Cavern, by that consummate professional among playwrights, Jean Anouilh.

Since he began work in 1929, Anouilh has written at least thirty-three plays, of which The Cavern is not one of the best: it displays the defects of his qualities as well as the qualities themselves. He has always been a facile writer, superbly conversant with the stage and what can be done on it. But there is something somehow insolent, overconfident, about the open manipulation of theatrical devices in The Cavern. The play begins with a character called the Author, who explains that this is a play he never succeeded in writing, and who keeps coming back after nearly every scene to complain that this won't do at all. After a while, the joke wears thin. The Author-character himself invokes the name of Pirandello in discussing what he is doing, but I do not see why this should disarm the criticism that Anouilh is borrowing a Pirandellian convention and playing around with it to no very significant purpose.

Still, I doubt if we in America are so rich in good theatre that we can afford to look down even on second-rate Anouilh. In an old-fashioned way, The Cavern is a viable piece of theatre—old-fashioned because Anouilh has always been an extravagantly romantic writer. That is the secret of his success: the most extravagant romanticism tempered by the most skillful workmanship. He delights in writing exquisite sugarplum idylls (which play much better than they summarize) about poor, beautiful, virginal girls who win the love of rich and handsome young men. But there is another side to Anouilh's romanticism: The Cavern is an expression of his taste for lush and violent melodrama, featuring as it does murder, rape, bastardy, abortion and white slavery. It seems, in this play the Author has never quite written, that the cook in a great house has had, years ago, a child by the duke, her master. She has raised the child to be a priest, and is furious when he falls in love with a kitchenmaid who is already pregnant. The whole situation culminates in homicidal fury and a fatal stabbing.

This may sound in summary like impossible nonsense (and some of it is a bit overripe) but Anouilh has cleverly employed his Pirandellian scaffolding to prevent us from feeling that we are meant to take the play more seriously than we are willing to take it, without preventing us from being moved by it now and then. The plotting is lively, and so, in spite of much hackneyed gush and tosh about the gulf between upstairs and below stairs, is a good deal of the dialogue. The Cavern has an old-fashioned charm, yet it also has moments of revelation about the hardness of life, and the cruel, cynical strength that suffering can breed (which in turn breeds more suffering). For all his romanticism, Anouilh has by no means closed his eyes to the real world.

Though the Cincinnati production, directed by Michael Kahn, was uneven—as work in the resident theatres tends to be, there were sound performances by Emery Battis as the Author, Charle Cioffi as a police detective, and Donald Ewer as a greasy valet. Irene Dailey, imported as a guest artist to play the cook, stomped about in an over-obvious attempt to be peasanty, but her performance had a certain rawboned strength all the same. Most of the others ranged from adequate through mediocre to poor.

And as so often happens in the American theatre, somebody in charge seems to have had a tin ear. The upper-class characters spoke in upper-class English accents, the valet and the coachman spoke cockney. So far so good. But the detective employed what sounded like a neo-Peter Sellers French accent, and most of the rest stuck to standard American, except for Miss Dailey, who played the cook in Irish-American. Whatever happened to the ideal of a homogeneous ensemble? (The translation, liberally sprinkled with British idioms, only emphasized the inconsistencies. Couldn't someone at least have Americanized the dialogue here and there?)

A flawed play, then, sometimes bordering on the trivial, and inconsistently performed. But the whole occasion was redeemed by a young actress named Lynn Milgrim, who played the pregnant kitchenmaid. Miss Milgrim has spent several seasons at the Charles Playhouse in Boston; she is unknown in New York, but that is New York's loss. Her part in The Cavern was not an easy one: nothing but barefoot meekness until about 10:30, and then an explosion. For most of the evening Miss Milgrim was a touchingly abject and miserable slavey; but when the explosion came, it was stunning. The girl had swallowed insults and injuries for a lifetime; now her hatreds burst out of her, vomited up with hysterical force, a tremendous indictment that accused us all of complicity in her suffering.

The scene is capably written, in a melodramatic way; but it was Miss Milgrim who made it eloquent. I left the Playhouse with a sense that something had really happened to me—a feeling rare enough in our theatre, where even "serious" plays are more likely to tickle than penetrate. And perhaps it was not only my connection-seeking turn of mind that made the kitchenmaid's outcry seem to say something about the riots that had, coincidentally, shaken Cincinnati during the run of the play.

young adults, the scene seemed a striking confirmation of the theory.

With roughly 2,000 people engaged on the streets and a hard core of nearly 200 causing the night's violence to mount, the Tactical Patrol Force, an elite riot-containment unit, was called in to control the neighborhood. But this same unit on the first night of the riot had arrived on Third Avenue with such force that representatives from El Barrio, who earlier that day had met with Mayor Lindsay, had demanded that the TPF be kept out of East Harlem for good. On Sunday night, the TPF battled along Third Avenue until early morning when calm was restored, but they left behind them a bit of venom that helped spawn the sniping and fire bombing of the riot's third and last night.

Unique to East Harlem's rebellion was the absence of violence during daylight hours. Thus, on Monday afternoon, while the Mayor shook hands during long walks through the neighborhood, a comment made by a TPF trooper the night before spread through El Barrio like wind-swept fire: "Go home," he allegedly had said to the crowd. "You didn't lose anything, you just lost another spic!" Mayor Lindsay's frantic efforts that day to use his personality to cool the resentments exploding now after decades of encrustation seemed to many in El Barrio, in the light of that policeman's statement, a bit more like a song and dance for the benefit of TV cameras. And two days after the riots had ended, the Mayor, despite all his good intentions, was burned in effigy on 109th Street: after all, the reasoning went, wasn't the TPF and the trooper with the loose tongue under his command?

When the crowds came together once more at 111th Street on Monday evening, a chalk line had been drawn across Third Avenue; words written there read, "Puerto Rican border. Do not cross, flatfoot." Using garbage cans for platforms, speakers addressed the crowd, some of them expressing ideas not common to El Barrio. Earlier that day, a small group had passed out pro-Maoist pamphlets; now a man was standing on a garbage can condemning American democracy, not from a Marxist point of view but from a nationalistic one. His language was not the patois of East Harlem but a purer Spanish understood with difficulty by El Barrio's apple-pie-eating and Marine Corps-joining American youth, who now listened carefully. In evidence also was the Puerto Rican flag, a banner young East Harlemites seldom take seriously. Nonetheless, the paraphernalia of nationalism now accentuated the void separating the crowd from the men in blue uniforms who represented the government of the city. When the violence came this time, the youths were firing pistols, and gasoline bombs were seen blazing in the streets. But the cops were swift and tough, the firing heavy, and two deaths occurred. The next night, Tuesday, a rainfall cooled the city, driving those congregated on the stoops into their homes. And when the rain ended, a church-arranged procession with flowers, candles and song passed through the streets of El Barrio as if they were lanes in some troubled village deep in Puerto Rico. Many of the youths sneered, and a few threw bottles that night; but everyone knew now that the riots were over.

THE BOMBS IN VIETNAM EXPLODE AT HOME...

> "The security we profess to seek in foreign adventures we will lose in our decaying cities. The bombs in Vietnam explode at home: they destroy the hopes and possibilities for a decent America."
> Sponsor, VIETNAM SUMMER

VIETNAM SUMMER believes there will be no peace at home until there is peace in Vietnam . . . until this immoral squandering of the nation's resources is brought to an end. To spend $322,000 for every enemy we kill, while spending $53. on every American classified as "poor", is more than a disproportion; it is an obscenity.

When Dr. King and others called on April 23 for a national VIETNAM SUMMER combining the "fervor of the civil rights movement with the peace movement," they asked for 10,000 volunteers to work in 500 communities. VIETNAM SUMMER now has 26,000 volunteers working in over 700 communities — students, clergymen, businessmen, professionals — engaged in a neighbor-to-neighbor, door-to-door national teach-out program against the war. Here is what is unique about that program:

NEW AREAS: VIETNAM SUMMER is a truly national movement. We are working in places where there has never before been any peace activity . . . in Utah, Tennessee, Iowa, Alabama, Wyoming, Nebraska, Arizona, Oklahoma, Texas, and dozens of other states.

NEW PEOPLE: VIETNAM SUMMER is working with the people in the black ghettos of Cleveland, Chicago, East St. Louis, Richmond, Watts, New Haven, Milwaukee, Philadelphia and twenty other major cities . . . We sponsor model programs of anti-war work among Mexican-Americans in Denver, Albuquerque, Los Angeles and throughout the Southwest . . . We have 3,000 volunteers in the South alone . . . We have community action programs going in poor white areas in Pittsburgh, Gary, Ind., Buffalo, Rochester, Kansas City and Minneapolis.

NEW APPROACHES: VIETNAM SUMMER volunteers are working in your communities — canvassing neighborhoods, holding living-room meetings — identifying people who are uneasy about the war and have until now felt alone . . . We have developed a "Vietnam in the Schools" program for introducing anti-war materials into colleges and high schools in the coming school year . . . We are co-ordinating anti-war referenda campaigns in 15 cities . . . We support draft counseling centers in 12 cities . . . Each community determines its own course of action.

NATIONAL ACTIVITIES: VIETNAM SUMMER headquarters in Cambridge functions as a national communications network for the anti-war movement, a clearing-house for educatonal materials, and a center for program development . . . Our projects have received network television coverage and publicity in over 250 newspapers . . . Our own newspaper, VIETNAM SUMMER NEWS, reaches 80,000 people every other week.

VIETNAM SUMMER's work must continue, and expand. We are building a new moral and political base, committed to ending the war so that we may redirect our resources towards establishing a truly great society.

Dr. King's call for VIETNAM SUMMER is supported by Dr. Benjamin Spock, Robert Scheer, Dr. John C. Bennett, Dr. Albert Szent-Gyorgi, Rabbi Abraham Heschel, Carl Oglesby, William Pepper, Carey McWilliams, and many others.

VIETNAM SUMMER needs $200,000 to fulfill its program.

civil war costs

Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIRS: The race riots in more than a dozen cities and the deployment of federal troops in Detroit over the hot weekend document the fact that . . . these riots are civil wars and therefore the complete responsibility of our federal government both as to causes, prevention and remedies. The function of the police is local law enforcement which is already woefully inadequate in most of our large cities. . . . The national root causes of the alarming increase in almost all forms of crime in the country are clear. They are now a present danger to surrounding "better neighborhoods" if not to a breakdown of "law and order" in larger areas. Let the top businessmen and politicians in our country . . . consider the tens of billions of dollars extracted annually from them for police, welfare, courts, jails and mental institutions—traceable in the main to our substandard population. Galbraith, Myrdal and most economists and sociologists agree that not only would America save the major costs of crime but that the living standards of the lowest brackets will be raised without cost by the mere and sheer acts of manipulating and gearing our fabulous economy for adequate employment at the lowest skill levels, which will in turn produce adequate living space, educational and recreational facilities . . . which in turn will radically reduce the incidence and intensity of crimes. . . . Poor lands and large populations in other nations must perhaps continue to breed despair or revolutions. In America the ratios of population, productive areas and natural wealth are still so fabulous that almost all specialists stand perplexed if not horrified by the indifference of the powers in Washington who cannot see the simple and ready solution.

Otherwise, as in Detroit, Washington will be increasingly compelled to provide "National Guards" to inform Americans and the world that business prefers to fight a civil war at home, too. Sidney Blackstone war hearings

Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIRS: I was interested to read the editorial "Advice to Congressmen" in the July 3 issue of The Nation. I thought it would be useful to call to your attention two days of hearings which I held in New York City entitled "Unofficial Congressional Hearings on Vietnam," on August 12 and 13, 1965.

We were fortunate in gathering a top-flight panel of expert witnesses—both in support of, and critical of, the Administration's policy—who were able . . . to engage in a dialogue with one another. We included a separate, extra evening hearing on the second day in order to permit local residents to be heard. Interestingly enough, local expression was uniformly critical of the government's policies in contrast to the balanced presentation during the two all-day sessions.

A Senator Speaks His Mind

Sen. Thruston Morton, Republican of Kentucky, could be said to come as close to deserving the title of "Mr. Republican" as anyone since the late Sen. Robert A. Taft, who inspired it. It is not only that he occupies, politically, a position close to the center of the party's "mainstream" but also that over the years he has served his party skillfully and well. Republicans, from all sections and of all persuasions, have a high respect for Mr. Morton, and with reason.

It is highly significant when a man of the Senator's stature and influence publicly announces that he has changed his position on a crucial issue. He did so, not by inches but by a mile—or perhaps the measure should be in light years. It occurred, not in a private interview or at a press conference but on television's Opinion: Washington (WTTG), and just to show that there could be no mistake about it, he repeated his statements the next evening to Martin Agronsky on C.B.S. national TV.

Senator Morton, who until now has been an outspoken supporter of the bombing of North Vietnam, said that he "thought they'd be brought to the table in a few months if we did that, but I was wrong and I'll admit it . . . . " This he followed up by declaring: "I think the tools we're working with and the tactics we're using today are outworn and are not working," and continued that we were "painting ourselves into a corner" by following a policy of escalation.

It is a rare and refreshing experience to hear a national political figure stand up and admit that he has been wrong. It has happened very seldom within our experience. The last memorable example was provided by President Kennedy, following the Bay of Pigs fiasco which he handled with characteristic frankness and aplomb, but under the circumstances he had no choice; the facts were there for all to see and to bemoan. Mr. Morton had a choice, and with rare courage and honesty made the right one by obeying his conscience. One might hope that his example would be followed by those currently in power. If they need an excuse for turning away from their disastrous course in Vietnam, the forthcoming election on September 3, which promises to be a farce, could provide one. But Johnson and Rusk, judged by past performances, lack Senator Morton's integrity.

The Senator eloquently and forcefully espoused an "honorable disengagement." We agree with him, and would go further and say that immediate disengagement is the only honorable course now left to us. The Senator is convinced that Vietnam will be "a burning, compelling issue, the big issue in the 1968 election." Asked if the Republican candidate in 1968 should be a peace candidate, he replied: "Well, to paraphrase '64, let's give a choice, not an echo, and we've got a war candidate in the White House today, so I'd say the Republican candidate should be a peace candidate. . . . " In his view, the political leader who presents a program of honorable disengagement "is going to get elected President of the U.S." It would be exciting to see the Senator give it a try.

The Zinn Position

Our editorial of July 31 called attention to a poll on Vietnamese policy which the Cleveland Plain Dealer conducted on May 28. Three points of view were presented: one by Rep. Mendel Rivers, a noisy hawk, another by Senator Fulbright, the third by Howard Zinn, a frequent contributor to these pages. Their statements were entitled, respectively, "Escalate and Win," "De-Escalate" and "Withdraw." The results were: Zinn 5,798, Rivers 1,716, and Fulbright 1,648.

On August 6, the always lively and pertinent Sunday Gazette-Mail of Charleston, W. Va., conducted a similar poll, using the identical statements. The results: Zinn 888, Fulbright 109, Rivers 97. The poll was publicized for two days in advance of the deadline; employees of the paper did not vote; and no evidence of organized drives by partisan groups could be detected by those who conducted the poll and tabulated the results.

The importance of these polls should not be exaggerated; in each instance only a small percentage of the readership participated—slightly more in Cleveland than in Charleston. On the other hand, the polls cannot be dismissed as being of no importance. The fact that the poll material appeared in the "Current Affairs" section of the Gazette-Mail, which it may be assumed is read by a selective portion of the readership less numerous than that devoted to the sports page, may qualify but it does not impugn the significance of the results.

The Nation has insisted that general polls on Vietnam have been somewhat misleading, not because of defects in the sampling or even in the formulation of questions but because the alternative of "withdrawal" has not been treated as a live option. A community poll in which the alternative of withdrawal has never been publicly debated is not likely to reflect the real sentiments of those polled. Most of the doves, in and out of Congress, have stopped short of suggesting withdrawal so it has not figured in the discussion as a real alternative. Individuals may privately agree with a position that has not been publicly debated, but unless the position has been made "audible" in the community, it will not show up well in the polls.

What sentiment testing in Cleveland and Charleston demonstrates is that once it has been aired as a real possibility, there is more support for the Zinn position than is indicated by the polls which President Johnson carries about with him for personal reassurance and ready reference. Other papers would be performing a genuine public service if they were to follow the lead of the Plain Dealer and the Sunday Gazette-Mail and conduct a similar poll.

York lightly, has taken on a man-killing work load. He attends the Washington meetings but flies back to New York before sundown, just in case Harlem or the south Bronx or Bedford Stuyvesant should burst into flame as Newark, and so many other tinderboxes, did.

That New York has escaped so far is largely Lindsay's doing. What the mayor of New York can do in quieting racial and class tensions is precious little—how little no one knows better than Lindsay. If it devolved on him, he would be spending $10 billion a year clearing New York's slums, but it is our national shame, rather than merely that of the cities, that sums of that magnitude are appropriated not for domestic welfare but for senseless carnage abroad. Thus hamstrung, Lindsay has tackled the problem with a therapy of his own applied to the masses of the poor who, elsewhere, are treated as if they weren't there—until they explode.

That crowning injury Lindsay has never inflicted on the almost forgotten men, women and children of the slums. At least he goes among them and tries to give as many as possible a little relief from their drab and boring lives. Things like jazz concerts, open-air movie shows, rides over the metropolitan area in airliners will not cure the evils of the slums but, in a marginal situation, they may afford a breathing space to determine whether the causes of disorder are to be seriously attacked. Or must black people continue to be killed in street fighting and eventually be herded into concentration camps?

Even the New York Daily News, which is not noted for indulgence toward do-gooders, has paid tribute to Lindsay's efforts. Referring to "the Mayor's cocktail hour," the News observes that at 6:45 in the evening all good Yale men are supposed to be partaking of the cup that cheers, but one alumnus, class of '44, can be seen pounding the hot pavements, shaking hands, listening to grievances, looking for what is wrong and what he can do to correct it. If New York stays cool, the News suggests, the credit must be given to Mayor Lindsay.

Lindsay is equally dedicated in the Washington phase of his work. If President Johnson's primary purpose was to get the heat off himself, he chose the wrong man when he appointed Lindsay. On July 31, the U.S. Conference of Mayors formed an "Urban Coalition," with the aim of bringing about "a sense of immediate urgency about the need for positive and progressive action for our cities." The White House felt that this body would compete with the Presidential commission. Efforts were made to get Mayor Joseph M. Barr of Pittsburgh, the president of the Conference of Mayors, to call off the Urban Coalition, or at least to persuade Lindsay to withdraw from it. The pressure failed to work; Barr and Lindsay refused to change their plans. Lindsay informed Mr. Johnson that he saw no conflict between the two groups: the Presidential commission was looking into underlying causes, the mayors' coalition was trying to avert a recurrence of disorders during the present crisis. If Mr. Johnson still descried a conflict, Lindsay was prepared to resign from the commission. This, of course, was the last thing Johnson wanted, so Lindsay and Barr are continuing witth their plan for a thousand-member convocation late in August to seek "a reordering of the nation's priorities and action by Congress to relieve the cities' plight."

Thus Lindsay is combining personal suasion in the New York slums with national action on two fronts: in his capacity as vice chairman of the Presidential commission and as a leader in the Urban Coalition. What with all these activities, which require not only immense energy but personal courage, Mr. Lindsay may find himself rising to the national prominence he deserves. It is an axiom in U.S. politics that the mayoralty of even the largest city is a dead end. Still, the times are unusual, and the unusual might happen.

The Right To Want

Denver

States that have outlawed the union shop are falling behind in the economic race. They condemn all their people to lower incomes, not merely those against whom "right to work" laws are directed. The Oil, Chemical and Atomic Workers (OCAW) research department finds that nineteen of the twenty "right to work" states have personal incomes lower than the national average. The one exception is Nevada, which relies largely on gambling for its income, and since it adopted a "right to work" law its average has dropped in relation to the national average.

The study finds such states falling further behind yearly. OCAW says Indiana has already repealed its "right to work" law as a losing proposition, and thinks others may follow as the blighting economic effects become better known.

Of the other eighteen states involved, each one has lost ground; the average annual income for all of them has dropped, in comparison with the national average, by over $230. In two states this relative decline has exceeded $500 per year.

Wyoming is analyzed by OCAW as a good case study. It adopted a "right to work" law in 1963, when its personal income was $18 above the national average. By 1965, this had dropped to $188 below. Meanwhile personal bankruptcies increased 30 per cent, private employment dropped 2.9 per cent against an increase of 6.7 per cent nationally, home foreclosures quadrupled to twice the national rate, new construction dropped 17 per cent, against a national gain of 8 per cent.

The OCAW also quotes a Phoenix baseball man as saying that the city may not make the big leagues because in "right to work" states the public "doesn't have as much money to spend on entertainment as in states where labor is strong." Or on anything else?

Waves from Cuba

Predictably, the first meeting of the Organization for Latin American Solidarity (OLAS), recently concluded in Havana, was very largely an exercise in anti-U.S. propaganda. Olas is Spanish for "waves," and the entire community, for the duration of the conference, was awash with waves of hatred and promises of violence and destruction for the norteamericanos. But amid all the fury there was a lesson for those of us who care to heed it.

Inherent in the relationship between the United States and Latin America is, of course, the envy and resentment of the very poor against the very rich. Nothing is likely to alter these feelings until the great day comes when the poor are poor no longer. Of course we hate being hated, and ever since Roosevelt's "Good Neighbor Policy" have tried energetically to earn, or buy, Latin understanding and friendship. During World War II, Nelson Rockefeller as Coordinator for Inter-American Affairs was successful in preventing Latin America from siding with the Nazis, principally by virtue of convincing them that they would be backing the losing side. Efforts since the war—the Organization of American States, the Alliance for Progress—have had little success in wooing Latins to our side.

Perhaps, the Biblical injunction to the contrary, it will require more than the "mammon of iniquity" from us to make friends. Certainly the Cuban message is clear: there the Alliance and the OAS were both roundly denounced as U.S. deceitfulness. Clearly, also, our policy of isolating Cuba, if its intention is or was to topple Fidel Castro, is not working either. Castro has overwhelming popular support, and in addition Cuba, under his leadership, has made startling economic and social progress in spite of our quarantine. And of course the obsolete Guantanamo naval base is a continuing affront to Cuban pride.

Cuba is a Communist state, without a doubt. And in terms of individual liberty, it is considerably more repressive than any in Eastern Europe. But at heart it seems more Cubanist than Communist. At the OLAS conference, "Soviet imperialism" received its full share of odium, along with the Yankee variety. And yet a further distinction exists in the rapidly growing trade with Spain. General Franco could give lessons in anti-communism to anyone anywhere. But he is still, apparently, acceptable as a business partner in Fidel's eyes, when the chips are down. And surely, if Franco can happily inhabit the same world with Castro, the United States would be well advised to re-examine the premises of its policy toward Cuba. Cutting off noses to spite faces is bad for images anywhere.

Bigot, Spare That Tree

Raleigh

Searching anxiously for a new way to express old racial attitudes, the school board of Wake County, N.C., early in July raised the specter of fifth and sixth graders reveling in midnight, interracial orgies in a state park. Thereby it killed a federally financed summer program for 500 white and Negro underprivileged children.

Under provisions of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, the federal government offered Wake County, which includes Raleigh, the state capital, $24,000 to provide four one-week sessions of study and camping for 11 and 12 year olds at beautiful Umstead Park, a few miles outside Raleigh. An ESEA director said the program was a modest attempt to compensate for "the vacations never known, the trips never taken, the nature never seen." For it, ESEA reserved a spacious area in the park and hired a camp director, ten teachers, ten counselors, a nurse and five cooks.

At its first hearing, the ESEA proposal drew opposition only from the chairman of the school board who, avoiding the word "integration," said he objected to federally sponsored "social reform never intended by our founding fathers." Perhaps feeling such an appeal too blatant, the other members of the board remained silent until the next meeting, when one of their number, a housewife, provided a more plausible rallying point. She argued that "above the age of 9" boys and girls should not be allowed to stay overnight in the same park, because this was a dangerous "exploratory age." The combination of unhealthy sexual fascination and idyllic surroundings might prove too much for fifth and sixth graders. "We're not looking for any trouble," she said. Following this new tack, the chairman agreed that serious "biological" problems could arise to damage the board's good reputation.

In amazement, one of the ESEA camp coordinators pointed out to the board that the boys and girls would meet only in the dining area. "They both approach the central dining area from different directions and they go in different directions when they return to their own camp sites. There's a chaperone for every seven people."

The board, which has publicly voiced hostility to North Carolinian Harold Howe and "his" desegregation guidelines, was unmoved. It voted unanimously to reject the proposal. With new spirit, it then went on to reject also the possibility of day camps at the park.

Don't Sell It; Throw It Away

Munich

Recent noises from the German grand coalition government have caused vast echoes inside many an American breast. It looks as if the West Germans, who could never get enough assurances that the United States would stick to its European commitments (I remember Bavaria's Prime Minister, Herr Goppel, asking this assurance from Sen. Eugene McCarthy in the surprising context of a weekend in the Catholic Academy of Munich), are going to scuttle part of their own defense forces with a light heart. Despite some arithmetic by F. J. Strauss, it looks as if manpower would have to be cut by more than 10 per cent, and that this reduced force will not suffice for existing defense concepts. Quite rightly, the tiny Free Democratic opposition has asked for a parliamentary airing of the whole issue and demands the development of a concept adapted to the new situation.

COMING: SPECIAL FEATURE

The Nation of September 11 will be devoted to Christopher Lasch's "The Cultural Cold War." In this remarkable essay, Mr. Lasch examines the sensitive and significant issues raised by disclosures of Central Intelligence Agency subventions to the Congress for Cultural Freedom. The editors are confident that this brilliant piece of social criticism will challenge American intellectuals to a re-examination of the role they have played in the cold war.

Readers of this journal probably remember all the outbreaks of West German ire whenever some such thing as the Rapacki plan was on the agenda. While almost every statesman did consider a thinning out of forces in Central Europe as something which, if not desirable, was at least worth discussion, such plans were being denounced throughout the Adenauer era (and later) as a Communist trap or shortsighted collusion with the enemy.

In all such plans, we also remember, mutual thinning out and mutual inspection were envisioned. It would have been tit for tat: any West German soldier demobilized under those conditions would have been matched by a GDR, Czech or Polish soldier; any U.S. division withdrawn from the Federal Republic would have been matched by a Russian division withdrawn from Eastern Europe. Nevertheless, the almost unanimous government reaction from Bonn sabotaged all those plans, whether they were named after Rapacki or after Eden.

Now they have become unnecessary. America is busy thinning out its divisions in USAREUR, and Bonn starts dismantling also. It is done in the name of Vietnam (as far as the United States is concerned), and in the name of economy (as Bonn sees it). Not a single GDR soldier will lose his job, not a single Russian tank will roll eastward, not a single move at inspection or reciprocity is made: unilateralism, once the dirty word of military policy, has become the panacea of the day.

All these events could be registered by friends of peace as a sweet revenge on the old opposition—if they did not testify to a general trend in German postwar policy. In the past, all possible avenues of a friendlier approach to our Eastern problems—the existence of the German Democratic Republic, the drastic boundary revisions of Poland, the commitments of our Eastern neighbors to support Ulbricht—have been constantly blocked, though such an approach would have visibly improved our political standing in the world. Implementation of a Rapacki or Eden plan was by-passed. Negotiations at government level in—let us say—1958 or 1960 would have altered the character of the Ulbricht regime substantially; now they will come soon, and will hardly cause a ripple in East Berlin. Legally binding guarantees from Bonn for the Oder-Neisse Line could have strengthened Poland's hand in 1956 and given much more elbow room to Gomulka; at present they might prove almost embarrassing for Warsaw, as they would feed the distrust of Russia's Western neighbors (particularly the GDR) of a possible West German "divide and rule" scheme. Nevertheless, the issue has to be faced by Bonn, as the issue of negotiations with East Berlin has to be faced, and as the exaggerated West German defense posture had to be revised. For Bonn has to adapt to the reality, however painfully. For the German nation as a whole, it would have been much better to have done it sooner, but then such action would have violated the basic principle of our postwar policy: Don't Sell It; Throw It Away.

CARL AMERY

AUNT EFFIE AND THE BRASS

WILLIAM FOOTE WHYTE

Mr. Whyte, author of Street Corner Society (University of Chicago Press), Money and Motivation (Harper & Row) and Men at Work (Richard D. Irwin), is professor of industrial and labor relations and of sociology at Cornell University.

The Congressional hearing on the use of air power in the Vietnamese War reminds me of the investigatory method of my late aunt. Whenever Aunt Effie found herself in a strange town, without culinary information, she would pick a likely looking restaurant, seek out the proprietor, and ask him point-blank: "Do you serve good food?" Invariably she found his answer reassuring.

Looking back, I can see that this approach had some things to commend it. No waste motion, no delays in decision making. Once in the restaurant and past the proprietor, we sat down and ordered and did not leave until our hunger was sated—or until we had eaten all we could.

While I look back upon Aunt Effie's straightforward approach to life somewhat nostalgically, it had not occurred to me that it could be applied to national problems. But that seems to be what is going on in Congress now. The pattern is something like this.

The distinguished Air Force general is called before the committee to give his expert judgment. It is not the first time; some months ago he promised the committee that bombing of North Vietnam would drastically reduce infiltration to the south and shortly bring the North Vietnamese to their knees. Now it has become apparent that the rate of infiltration has increased, and even the general can detect no weakening in the enemy's will or ability to fight.

The general now has two options:

(1) He can admit that the bombing has not been nearly as effective as he expected it to be.

(2) He can say that the situation would be even worse without this much bombing and can still get better with more extensive bombing.

The committee asks him if he would like to have more targets to bomb. What do we expect the general to say?

The outcome of this little drama is so highly predictable that we must assume either (a) that the Congressmen are so naive as to expect that they are going to find out something through this approach, or (b) that the Congressmen are not naive at all but think that the rest of us are. In the latter case, the purpose is simply to give a carefully selected expert a sounding board for opinions that the Congressmen want to popularize.

Why is this approach bound to produce more propaganda than enlightenment?

In the first place, there is a confounding of organizational commitment with expertise. The general may be an expert on some aspects of military operations. He is also a man who has devoted his career to the Air Force. He identifies his success with the success of Air Force missions. He develops organizational loyalties and an organizational point of view. That point of view naturally tends to exaggerate the importance and effectiveness of one of the organization's primary missions (bombing) and to underestimate the limitations and adverse effects of this activity.

There is nothing peculiar about this organizational coloring of human judgment. It is a universal phenomenon. In industry the production manager who has spent his career in production naturally sees his company's problems and their solutions primarily in production terms. The sales manager who has had his career in sales naturally tends to see the company's problems and prospects in terms of selling.

There is a failure to ask the question: what is the expert really expert at? An Air Force general can be expected to have some expertise on problems of Air Force administration, on getting planes into the air, and on getting them over the target area. He should be able to tell us how big a bang the bomb will make when it hits. Can he tell us how much physical damage has been achieved in a given bombing mission? While the record shows a tendency to exaggerate on this point, at least the general can speak from such concrete evidence as air reconnaissance photographs. Can he tell us what the enemy will be willing and able to do to repair the damage or otherwise compensate for its effects? On this question, his training and experience have given him no expertise at all. Can he tell us what the effects will be upon the morale of the North Vietnamese and their leaders? Not only does he have no expertise for this question but the record shows that he is far more likely to be wrong than right.

There is also the failure to learn from past experience —even from a well-documented past experience. For example, the strategic bombing survey of Germany after World War II clearly showed that the advocates of bombing had been completely unrealistic in expectations and promises. Great physical damage was done, but until very near the end of the war the Germans were able to maintain and even increase their war production. Effects on morale? The Germans were depressed, all right, at losing their homes and relatives, but this did not affect their determination to fight on. It is one of the curiosities of that war that so many British experts expected bombing to break the German will to resist, whereas the heavy bombing of Britain had had no such effects on the British.

There is also a failure to evaluate the past performance of experts. If following the advice of a broker leads us to lose a lot of money, the chances are we will look for another broker. When the Edsel did not sell, the Ford Motor Company did not continue to build the car. Somehow military and diplomatic advisers seem to enjoy immunity against the test of experience. In those fields, nothing succeeds like failure. Each new failure seems to provide arguments for a more massive application of the policy that failed.

Critics of our Vietnamese policy are often asked to offer something constructive. Let me seek to comply by offering suggestions for the streamlining of future Congressional hearings on military and diplomatic policies.

We know enough about the types of expert testimony that emerge in such meetings to be able to simplify greatly the hearing process. Much time of all concerned could be saved if the committee did not physically meet, but just issued press releases on what would have been said if the committee had met. Standard stories could go out regularly, with appropriate headlines like "Air Force General Supports Bombing." Furthermore, the same story could be used again and again for years, simply with minor changes in detail, for the record indicates that the advocates of air power have been making the same argument for twenty-five years, no matter what the situation.

If my advice were followed, at least we could introduce some modern refinements into the simple, primitive approach of Aunt Effie.

VOICE OF AMERICA

MEMORANDUM TO JOHN DALY

RICHARD J. WALTON

Mr. Walton, a former newspaper man, worked for VOA for eight years, the last five as principal correspondent at the United Nations. He resigned in May and now is working on a book on Adlai Stevenson at the UN, to be published next year by Coward-McCann.

In your early days on the job as director of the Voice of America you'll be getting plenty of briefings but perhaps you won't hear some of the things I am about to say, although you will certainly learn them sooner or later. No matter how much authority President Johnson or USIA Director Leonard Marks said you will have, you will find it is precious little. In the first place, VOA is not nearly so self-contained as it seems. Dozens of your subordinates are in frequent touch with their counterparts in the parent USIA, and many important decisions will be made without your even knowing there was a decision to make.

This is particularly true in the most important area of all. As you know, USIA has an apparatus to insure that the agency's work conforms to national policy. This, on the face of it, seems unexceptionable, but you will soon find out that the policy officers are the nay-sayers. They are the ones who will do all they can to obstruct what you said on your appointment VOA should do: "fully and fairly" report American and international dissent to the Administration's policy in Vietnam. For they know the periodic statements that the Voice of America broadcasts the truth are empty but expected rituals. Certainly VOA broadcasts the truth, but it is Madison Avenue's selective truth, not "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth."

The USIA policy office has a branch within VOA and whenever a VOA program person has a policy question—and with Vietnam and the racial disturbances you can be sure there will be plenty—he goes to the policy office which nominally is under you. Or the policy office—which routinely gets copies of all newscasts and commentaries before they go on the air—can take the initiative to kill or modify something they think would be too embarrassing to the Administration—say, a commentary that frankly discusses the depth and significance of the anti-Vietnamese dissent within the intellectual community. However, if the program officer persists—and only a few, the best, are likely to—the VOA policy office can take the matter to the USIA policy office. But if USIA policy turns down the item, and such is the usual course, an unusually persistent program man can go to your assistant director for programs. He may counsel that the fight be dropped or, if he is exceptionally bold, he might tell the program man to go ahead despite policy's recommendation, but this is a rare and perilous course.

All this—and important questions are often involved—takes place without your knowledge. Only if the program man insists or succeeds in enlisting your assistant's support will the issue come to your desk. Then you must decide whether to take up the fight with the knowledge that the agency's assistant director for policy is your equal in rank, is acting with the full support if not at the insistence of the State Department, and is in frequent touch with Director Marks whom you see only when you go crosstown from the VOA office to USIA headquarters up the street from the White House. You would also realize that you would be asking Mr. Marks, a personal friend of the President, to approve for broadcast something embarrassing to the Johnson Administration. Mr. Johnson does not encourage his subordinates to embarrass him.

The practice has been, even for courageous VOA officers, to drop the fight after it has gone up a couple of levels. This is not timidity but the practical realization that if they fight every issue to the top, their appeal to higher authority will soon lose its effectiveness. So only the very big ones are fought to the top; many lesser, but still important, issues go by default. Of course, most policy decisions—even obviously bad ones—are not appealed at all, for most people at VOA, like those elsewhere, do what they are told. Thus, the policy appeals that reach your desk are only the very tip of the iceberg. And, as you will come to know, policy influences many more programs than ever come before it for review. Many program officers rather than get involved with policy simply leave out things they know should be in, particularly on so touchy an issue as Vietnam. Ironically, this can mean the omission of something that policy would have passed. But it is human for people to avoid getting involved, and since policy's policy is clearly "don't" rather than "do," that is the tone you will find dominant at VOA, challenged only by the best.

All during this appeal process—and the in-fighting can get very bitter when your best program men see the guts ripped out of their stuff by overcautious policy officers—the term "credibility" is invoked. Many program people are of the conviction that only the truth should be the criterion for VOA broadcasts. But they know that such an argument would get short shrift from USIA, the Administration and Congress, all of whom believe that VOA's job is solely to make America look good. So they have fallen back on "credibility," which means that if you don't tell the truth or at least a good part of it, nobody will listen to or believe VOA. Since this argument is irrefutable it has served to keep the hourly news bulletins largely, but not entirely, free of propaganda. But credibility is essentially a negative argument and has much less influence on programs, other than newscasts, that constitute the bulk of VOA's air time and are designed to show the U.S. in a favorable light. "Look," a policy officer might say, "we've got to put this anti-Vietnam march in the news because everyone else is carrying it, but let's give it the minimum coverage consistent with credibility. Then let's do a news analysis to put it in perspective." Putting things in perspective, as you will learn, Mr. Daly, means justifying or explaining away something unfavorable to the Administration. You no doubt admire the skilled ingenuity of language and logic needed to explain, say, how the South Vietnamese are helped by moving them en masse out of entire districts and resettling them in squalid refugee camps.

Intimately related to this is the question of foreign service officers. You will have discovered by now that many of the top jobs at VOA are held not by career VOA men who are professional broadcasters but by foreign service officers who are serving only temporarily at the "Voice." Not only are they usually without substantial experience in broadcasting but their friends and their futures are with the foreign service of USIA and the State Department. They are, in a sense, a sort of fifth column to keep VOA in line, for USIA and State have a wholly exaggerated view of the career VOA people as "tigers" who don't give a damn about policy.

These foreign service officers weaken the esprit de corps of VOA in several ways. They work for VOA, yet their attitudes are the public relations attitudes of USIA; VOA, although a propaganda arm of the government, is also a huge news broadcasting organization with the more objective standards implicit therein. Why should foreign service officers appeal policy decisions with which they generally agree? This policy-foreign service attitude, Mr. Daly, might be defined like this: Never report anything unfavorable unless there is absolutely no choice. If such a report cannot be avoided, make it as short and as inconspicuous as possible and couch it in the best possible terms.

Further, these foreign service officers are professional bureaucrats, and bureaucrats seldom leap gleefully into battle with higher authority, particularly when that authority will determine whether the officer gets promoted and whether he and his family go to Rome next year or to Ougadougou. Thus, Mr. Daly, you cannot expect these foreign service officers—although there are notable and splendid exceptions—to share your dedication to full and fair coverage of the troubled American scene. Not only are they public relations men, not newsmen, but such dedication would mean almost constant controversy and, if there is anything the bureaucrat has learned, it is that controversy and advancement seldom go hand in hand.

Further, however much they think of you personally, the foreign service officers, both within USIA proper and VOA, almost certainly regard you as an outsider who will be gone in a year or two. They naturally assume that an outsider, however intelligent, doesn't really get the picture. They will not fight you; they will just pleasantly, smilingly, affably hem you in and among themselves, the club members, make many of the decisions that should be yours. So the organization you nominally head often will have, in ways that will seem mysterious to you, a momentum almost totally unresponsive to your direction.

One final word about these foreign service officers. The career VOA people see them come and go, filling the high posts to which they aspire. It's bad enough for them to see their legitimate ambitions blocked by birds of passage, but much worse for morale when they know that these temporary occupants are not only less well qualified than they but put other interests first. Thus, when a foreign service officer makes a particularly timid decision about something controversial in the news, it is considered sufficient explanation simply that he is a foreign service officer. "He's foreign service. What did you expect?"

There is no need to say too much about Congress, Mr. Daly. You have already begun to learn about that. No sooner did you advocate full and fair coverage of the Vietnamese situation at home and abroad than you were landed on with both feet by Congressman John J. Rooney, the budget-cutting terror of successive administrations. The Brooklyn Democrat promptly defined your job perhaps a bit differently than you envisioned it: "His job is purely administrative. It has to do with contracts and the purchase of equipment. And where he does get into programing he should realize his job is to promote our way of thinking." Mr. Rooney is not entirely wrong. You will find so much of your time taken up with administration and budget preparation (particularly how to outmaneuver that same Mr. Rooney) that you will have little left for programing. But you will find plenty of people willing to take most of that work off your hands.

Nor is Mr. Rooney alone in his concept of your role in programing. Congress has always been generous with VOA—to the envy of your colleagues in the rest of USIA—because it can "penetrate the iron and bamboo curtains" and thus clobber the Commies. No doubt Rep. Charles S. Joelson (D., N.J.) was speaking for many, probably most, of his colleagues when he told the House that you had a mistaken idea of your new job if you thought it was to broadcast all points of view to the world. And in every administration, the White House, the State Department and USIA have shared this view that VOA is a salesman demonstrating the ideal, not the real, America.

The above would be sufficient to frustrate your fine goal of objective news coverage, for even in quiet times you would have found that you had taken on a job with incompatible goals. As I learned well, no one can be at one and the same time newsman and propagandist. But in these far from quiet times, if there is one thing certain about the Johnson Administration it is that it does not welcome criticism and dissent. One can be regretfully sure that no matter how deep your conviction—and I do not for a moment question it—you, like your predecessors, will find it impossible to give full and fair coverage to the troubled American scene. You will find that you must do things LBJ's way or not at all. Sadly, you may discover that you were hired not for your considerable professional skills but to help brighten the image of the Johnson Administration. And you will be expected in your broadcasts to brighten that image abroad just as your famous presence has brightened it at home. For you direct not the Voice of America but the Voice of Lyndon Baines Johnson. Good luck.

GERMANY AND THE EAST

THE OUTMODED WALL

CAREY McWILLIAMS

Most of the East European intellectuals with whom I spoke on a recent visit to Czechoslovakia, Hungary and Rumania were impatient for change. The prevailing mood was not one of dissatisfaction but rather an eagerness for liberalization and reform along lines that seemed to have been already indicated. The easing of controls that came after 1956 and again in 1962 aroused intense hopes, not merely that there would be further relaxation but that freer discussion would encourage rapid economic improvement. But the wider scope for comment, which is real enough, has thus far failed to produce the miracles that were at first anticipated and, to a degree, the earlier optimism has begun to wane.

Sensing this change of mood, the regime in Czechoslovakia has attempted to tighten controls but, from what I could learn, without much success. At the writers congress in Prague, June 27-29, sterile pronouncements by party spokesmen evoked few cheers; in fact the rejoinders were sharp and uninhibited. The party leadership, which seems to be somewhat out of touch, has been disturbed by the "way out" character of recent Czech movies. Quite recently, official spokesmen deplored two favorable film reviews that had appeared in Literarni Noviny, but the editors replied that films would not be reviewed at all if the magazine could not feel free to distribute praise as it saw fit.

That dispute is perhaps not yet settled, but it was my impression that East European intellectuals are capable of defending their interests; they certainly do not hesitate to say what they think about a wide range of issues. While they are impatient and critical, most of them feel that the new economic measures which go into effect next year will bring about significant improvement. Market forces are to be allowed freer play in an effort to unfetter the economy from centralization and red tape; the goal is a kind of "market socialism," notably in the area of consumer goods.

I could sympathize with the mood of impatience but I also felt some sympathy for the planners and bureaucrats. The weight of history, custom and tradition in these countries is enormous. Incongruous elements from the past persist alongside contemporary socialism. In Czechoslovakia I was told repeatedly that the educational system has adapted very slowly to new goals and purposes. There is surely nothing "reactionary" or "regressive" about ballroom dancing per se, but it is at least surprising that under socialism as under capitalism, many Czech parents feel that instruction in this social grace is essential to the education of their young. Similarly, the sight of a bride and groom, in full wedding regalia (old style), riding through the crowded, narrow streets of Prague in an open horse-drawn carriage, with a large wedding party following in automobiles in low gear, is charming and reassuring but not in the accepted Socialist style. By Czech standards, enormous sums are being spent on renovating—principally cleaning the façades—of Prague's handsome buildings; scaffolding hangs in almost every street.

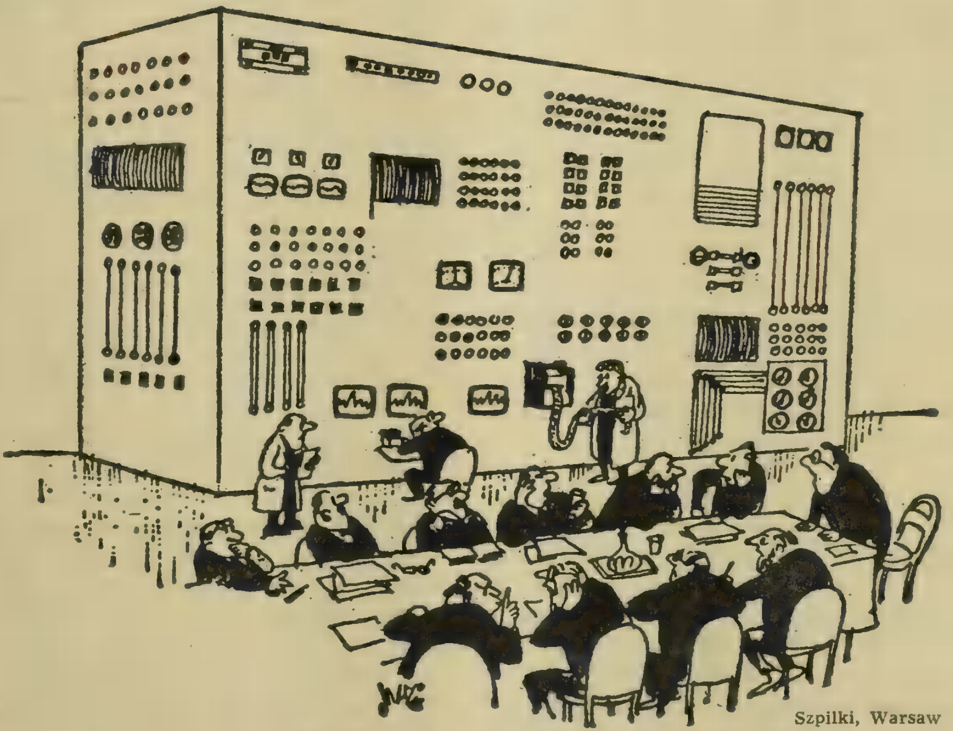
The force of custom—the pride in history—give a distinctly "national" cast to the socialism of these countries. Traditional intellectual and cultural ties with Western Europe have not been broken. Nevertheless, old habit can create problems for planners. Highly advantageous trade agreements which could nowadays be made with such cold-sea countries as Norway, Iceland and the Soviet Union would enable the Czechs to enjoy excellent sea food at very cheap prices. But the tyranny of the dumpling is a force to be reckoned with in Czechoslovakia, and it will take time, and much persuasion, to win a place for cod and haddock on the tables of Prague. The relatively low consumption of milk, the fact that vegetables and fruits are regarded as seasonal luxuries, and that more venison is consumed than mutton—these and many similar aspects of the Czech diet illustrate the drag of custom.

All the same, there is good reason to believe that the East Europeans' desire for livelier economic activity will be gratified. The proposed reforms should help, but it may be more important that the current "minislump" in West Germany—the first in the postwar period—has resulted in a significant shift of policy. The Kiesinger-Brandt regime has made sharp cutbacks in military expenditures (much to the annoyance of Washington), and is pushing an "opening to the East" policy with great vigor. Even now the German "presence" is palpable in the three countries I visited. German tourists, from the West and from the East, are everywhere. They have found that an easy way to circumvent the Berlin Wall and the division of the German nation is to rendezvous with friends and relatives in one or another of the East European countries. Roads are good, travel is cheap, restrictions are minimal, and prices are relatively low. Germans who want to indulge, as many of them do, in black-market currency operations, find a vacation in Prague very inexpensive indeed.

But tourism is merely one phase of the growing German "presence." West Germany is the leading trade partner with all the East European countries. The Soviet bloc nations have doubled their trade with the West since 1958, raising it to well above the $6 billion mark and, as Gilbert Burck observes in the July issue of Fortune, "they appear ready to do almost anything short of breaking off relations with the Soviet Union itself to increase trade with the West even more steeply." To date the bulk of this trade has gone to West Germany. The American share is not much larger than Sweden's—about $285 million in 1966 and even less than it was in 1938.

The economic reforms that will go into effect next year in Hungary and Czechoslovakia should make it easier for them to trade outside the Communist bloc. The Soviet economic model, which was rigidly adhered to at the outset, was never well adapted to conditions in these countries. The Soviet Union is largely self-sufficient in raw materials, but planning based on self-sufficient economic development was unrealistic for the East European nations. Hungary exports almost 40 per cent of what it produces, whereas in the Soviet Union the figure is a mere 2 per cent. Like all small countries, Czechoslovakia, Hungary and Rumania need trade, and the more they industrialize, the greater becomes their need. Today about two-thirds of their export business is with other Socialist states, between 30 and 40 per cent being with the Soviet Union itself. Increased trade with the West should permit the East European countries to bargain more effectively with the Soviets. It is a question of emphasis and not, of course, an either/or proposition. For example, Rumania's trade with the West has increased since 1964, and its trade with the Soviet Union has declined in the same period, but Rumania is not about to move out of the Soviet orbit, now or in the future. For trade with the West to be profitable, however, the East European countries must know what their real costs are and must be able to relate their prices to those on the world market. The new economic reforms should be helpful on this score.

As for the more immediate political and economic stimulation of the new West German policy, the first



Szpilki, Warsaw

"It Says To Set Up A Market"

tangible success came last January when the agile Rumanians decided to recognize the Bonn regime regardless of what East Germany, Poland or the Soviet Union might think about it. True, the West Germans issued an accompanying statement which, in effect, stated that recognition implied no change in the Federal Republic's position on certain long-standing issues, but recognition is recognition, with or without face-saving statements. Rumania's qualified "independence" within the Soviet bloc made it the logical member to scout the territory. But on August 3, Czechoslovakia and West Germany signed a treaty for the exchange of trade missions with limited consular functions. The missions will have diplomatic status. The agreement will regulate trade and payments and, with the help of a 1966 West German regulation enlarging the list of goods for trade with Communist countries, should make it easier for the Czechs to overcome a $2.5-million deficit in the annual $200-million exchange with West Germany. The kind of trade-mission agreement just concluded is a form of de facto recognition, and in fact only a few outstanding issues prevent formal diplomatic recognition. Hungary, Yugoslavia and Bulgaria will probably conclude similar agreements soon and one may assume that formal recognition will eventually follow.

Rumania probably stands to gain less from expanded trade with West Germany than does Hungary or Czechoslovakia. With Rumania, a compelling motive for the agreement with Bonn was to buttress its "independent" position. The speech of Nicolas Ceausescu, general secretary of the Rumanian Communist Party, at the recent National Assembly session (July 24), was in essence a tactful declaration of qualified independence within the bloc. International disputes, he said, can no longer be settled by the big powers alone; the cooperation of all states is required. "By acting with vigor and militancy in defense of their legitimate interests and rights, the middle-sized and small countries can play an outstanding part in international life, can considerably influence the course of events, contributing toward the safeguarding of world peace and security." Rumania did not attend the seven-nation conference in Budapest on the Middle East, and what Ceausescu said in his speech about the Middle East was not far removed from the Israeli position.

The Rumanians have been careful not to cross the Soviets on any issue that might invite a crackdown, but they know—indeed they have been the first to discover—that as long as the East European countries stay within certain clearly indicated limitations, Moscow can do little to prevent them from pursuing a discreet "independent" line. To date, the Russians have said nothing about the Bonn-Bucharest agreement, but the fact that on July 20 Ceausescu announced a shake-up of the Rumanian security forces and denounced as "impermissible interference" any meddling in Rumania's internal affairs suggests that some interference may have been attempted. Following up on the January agreement, West German Foreign Minister Willy Brandt has recently visited Bucharest—the first such official visit by a West German of his position to an East European capital other than Moscow since the war. Apparently the visit went well: Rumania will support West Germany's entry into the seven-nation Danube Commission as a full member and Brandt announced that West Germany would liberalize its trade policies on Rumanian imports.

It is intriguing to speculate as to what will happen to the structure of "the German problem" if this new "opening to the East" is pursued. The East Germans cannot prevent the other East European countries from trading with, and even recognizing, the Federal Republic. As West German trade with the East European countries expands—and as East Germany's trade with these same countries also grows—what will be the meaning of a continued division of Germany? Won't the East European countries become increasingly aware of a general German "presence," made evident by a steadily rising stream of German tourists, officials and salesmen from the East and from the West, as well as by steadily expanding trade with both Germanys? And if this trend should persist, why, in the fairly near future, should not West and East Germany achieve, first, some practical working agreements on a variety of issues (on August 7 it was announced that East Germany had placed orders for $25 million worth of rolling stock and electric equipment in West Germany) and, eventually, some form of mutual recognition? If all East Europe recognizes both Germanys, why should one Germany not recognize the other?

Most of the East Europeans, including officials, with whom I spoke about these matters took essentially that position. At the same time, I sensed sharply that the East Europeans have by no means made their peace with the Germans. Everywhere I heard versions—a dozen or more—of the same joke. What is the difference, the joke goes, between West Germans and East Germans? And the answer: "We have to smile at the East Germans." The Czechs note—and stress—that the Federal Republic always has a representative present at meetings of the various patriotic groups that seek a return of the "lost provinces." And every now and then a German will show up in the Sudetenland to warn the occupants of the farm he once owned that he intends to regain possession one of these days and is holding them responsible for its good care.

On the other hand, the Czechs and the Hungarians are convinced that West Germany is a good trading partner. And as long as this trade is properly balanced, it can be a factor not merely in improving the standard of living in the East European countries but in promoting a new stability and security in Middle Europe. It should be noted, however, that birth rates are quite low in Hungary and Czechoslovakia and that the preponderance of German power is already very great. In productive power, either Germany alone would be a match for these countries. But the Soviet Union, of course, provides a strong counterweight.

An American visitor to Eastern Europe today must see the extreme short-sightedness of our policy. We have a remarkable opportunity there, if only we were prepared to take advantage of it. To be sure, the war in Vietnam is a strong barrier at the moment, but I encountered no unpleasantness on this score in the three countries I visited. Those with whom I discussed Vietnam expressed their views frankly but there was no rancor in what they said. In fact I encountered nothing that could be fairly characterized as "anti-American" in any sense.

The East Europeans are eager to trade with the West and in particular with the United States. But they cannot trade with us, Vietnam or no Vietnam, as long as our trade policies discriminate against them to the extent that they now do. Yet the possibilities of trade are excellent. It is ironic that the old Yankee trading spirit should be most visibly exemplified in Rumania today by Pepsi-Cola, which is rapidly becoming the nation's most popular soft drink. If Pepsi-Cola can tap this market, why can't it be tapped by a long list of American products? There is a hunger in the East European countries for consumer goods, and it should be possible to devise means whereby they could acquire the dollars they would need if they were to become significant buyers of our products. An expanded American tourist influx would be one source; Yugoslavia garnered $18 million from American tourism last year. But there are other means. The Yugoslavs have found markets in this country for a wide range of products, from slivovitz to aluminum and copper bars. And last year Yugoslavia bought $173 million worth of U.S. goods—nearly as much as the other East European countries combined. Granted that Yugoslavia is, for the moment, a special case, still the Czechs estimate that if they were accorded most-favored-nation treatment their sales to the United States would soon exceed $100 million a year. There would surely be a market in this country for Bohemian glassware and other fine Czech products. And why not extend long-term credits? Some West European and Japanese exporters now give these countries up to ten years to pay. No East European government has ever defaulted on a trade obligation to the West, although they did, of course, repudiate the debts of their pre-revolutionary regimes.

To the extent that East European countries can increase trade with the West, their domestic reforms will have a better chance to succeed. To the extent that they can trade outside the Communist bloc, their dependence on the Soviet Union will be reduced. If we fail to seize the developing opportunity, others will take it. In any case, the "opening to the East" which the West Germans are now exploiting promises to make a shambles of the Dulles policy of freezing East-West relations in Middle Europe. As Uwe Kitzinger pointed out in a recent talk on the B.B.C.: "During the cold-war days of the Dulles-Eisenhower era West Germany in effect had no options . . . for the East had nothing to give on terms that the West Germans could accept. Bonn was a vital and some would say influential ally with a special relationship to Washington. . . . But today the Americans are preoccupied in Asia and wanting support from Europe rather than giving it . . . and options appear to be opening up through direct German deals with Eastern Europe. . . ." Today the East European countries, as Rumanian diplomacy has demonstrated, do not need to be pawns or satellites of the big powers; within limitations they can pursue independent trade policies and they should be encouraged to do so. Rumania's Premier, Ion Gheorghe Maurer, said recently that Europe would be a safe place "if NATO and the Warsaw Pact were both scrapped." Each country, he added, would then be master in its own house. NATO is in fact weakening and that implies a weakening of the Warsaw Pact; it may soon be possible to work out new security arrangements in Middle Europe. In this changing pattern of relationships there are "openings" for both the East and the West, the United States included.

YANKEE STATION

INVITING RETALIATION

THOMAS W. PEW, JR.

Mr. Pew is editor and associate publisher of the Troy Daily News, Troy, Ohio.

Yankee Station is a spot in the Gulf of Tonkin where three or four United States aircraft carriers steam in a perpetual circle launching and recovering their planes. During the first week of August its complement included the carriers Oriskany, the Constellation and the Intrepid. The Forrestal, normally one of this number, was missing.

Thus far in the war the giant floating air bases have been safely out of range of enemy attack, although they are far from safe duty posts for American sailors and airmen. (The flight-deck fire aboard the 75,900-ton Forrestal that wiped out twenty-six planes, killed some 129 crewmen, and left several "dining-room-size" holes in its deck was the third aboard an aircraft carrier off North Vietnam —earlier fires raked the Oriskany and the Franklin D. Roosevelt.) But even the devastating Forrestal disaster would be mild compared with a surprise missile or artillery attack from the coast of North Vietnam. Arching high or streaking low along the water, guided missiles and artillery shells could be ripping holes at the water lines and blasting the decks of the carriers before the vessels would be aware that they were under attack. Such an attack on the carriers—which have no significant anti-aircraft armament other than their own interceptors—could conceivably cost the United States thousands of men; and, if skillfully executed by the North Vietnamese, nearly $1 billion in ships and aircraft. Worse than this, such an attack could catapult the U.S. into a large act of escalation and Yankee Station into the role of World War III's Pearl Harbor.

That North Vietnam is working on a few complex weapon emplacements along the coast has been quietly revealed. A special report to The New York Times by William Beecher noted that "aerial reconnaissance has detected a handful of elaborate new concrete weapons installations along the North Vietnamese coast between Thanh-hoa and Donghoi." At almost the same time it was announced that U.S. naval activity off the coast was going to increase with the addition of the reactivated battleship New Jersey whose nine 16-inch guns are capable of lobbing 1,900-pound shells over ranges exceeding 20 miles.

Exhibiting typical Pentagon confidence one officer said: "We can't be sure the Soviets won't provide surface-to-surface missiles to North Vietnam, but we don't think they're eager to do so. They realize that, beyond attacking the launching sites, we might feel compelled to escalate the war still further. And we don't think the Russians want that." But, he conceded, the Times reports that "if Hanoi were able to sink a destroyer, cruiser or aircraft carrier with a missile it would gain a major propaganda coup." The New Jersey, a nostalgic symbol of American military might, would also make an excellent target.

Since the United States has failed miserably in protecting its major ground air bases in South Vietnam from short-range mortars and rockets, by what presumption do naval and Pentagon officials feel they can stop or even predict an attack from sophisticated coastal emplacements? Are we to circle and wait at Yankee Station as we sat and waited at Pearl Harbor? Or is there possibly some scheme to use a few lost American ships and a few thousand lost American men to fan the home front into supporting a drastic attack on North Vietnam? As for a choice of missiles that would do the job on the U.S. sitting ducks, the Russians have a generous arsenal to offer the North Vietnamese. Beecher lists the following:

- Kennel-8, a short-range anti-shipping missile designed initially for launching from a bomber. The 28-foot-long turbojet missile has a 16-foot wingspread and resembles a small jet fighter.
- Shaddock, a 40-foot missile with a range estimated at over 200 miles. It has been paraded through Moscow, and the Soviet press describes it as a coastal-defense missile.
- Styx, a 20-foot missile resembling the Kennel-8. One version has a 15-mile range and another is believed somewhat longer ranged. The Styx is the standard armament on small Soviet missile boats.
- Scud, a land-based 35-foot guided missile. One version is estimated to have a range of 90 miles, and a longer-range version has been developed.

That the North Vietnamese have already given considerable thought to coastal defense has been proved in several artillery hits they have scored against American ships that have operated too close to the coast from the "17th Parallel north to Thanh-hoa." In this area there are about ten destroyers and one cruiser. Defense Department officials have admitted that they "are worried about the damage that might be done if larger, longer-range weapons are installed," the Times reports, and notes that: "The principal Russian coastal artillery gun is a 130-mm weapon that fires a 70-pound projectile 17 miles or more. It is reputed to have considerable armor-piercing power." The installation of this artillery piece or any of the missiles described above would considerably hamper U.S. style on the water, if not blast our ships out of the water forthwith. As one planner told the Times: "We can't expect to place warships off the coast of North Vietnam and bombard it for a year or more and not expect weapons to be brought in that can do us some damage in return. While we certainly pray we don't lose any ships, we can't count on it indefinitely."

Meanwhile, Yankee Station continues to steam in a circle—a bull's-eye for destruction. It is not only the North Vietnamese we have to worry about, though they are going to build those missile and artillery bases on the coast and try to blow us out of the sea; it is the vacillating Pentagonites and the pride-blind naval officers who are the real danger. And there may be one higher up who is even more dangerous as he weighs the political advantages in an election year of having a consensus on the war.

90th Congress: Slapping at Symbols

ROBERT G. SHERRILL

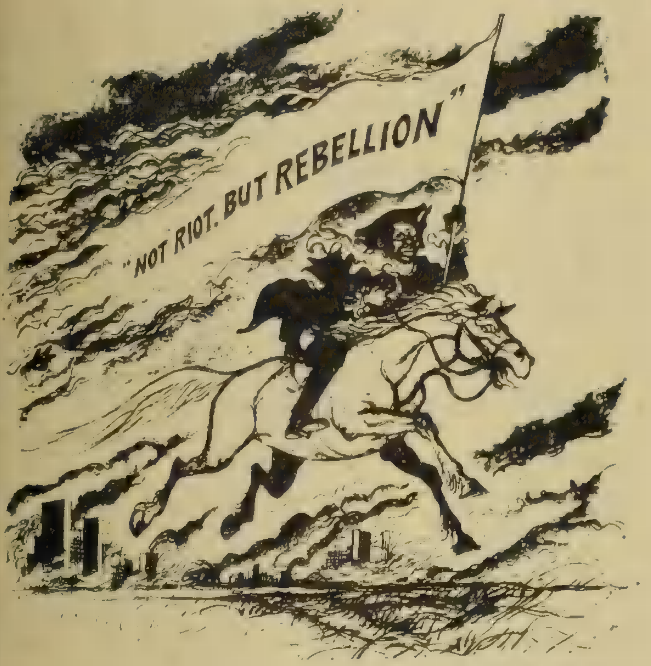
Washington

The militant Negroes will be in for just one more disappointment if they take too seriously their own talk of a "rebellion." They can destroy property with matches, but they can't destroy the power structure that way. The unromantic truth is that when the smoke has all blown away they still will have to build their future on the whims of Congress. The Congress that will sit through 1968 lacks the will power, the leadership and the inclination to carry out anything in the way of a major reform. The only cheerful footnote is that this Congress also hasn't enough energy to be effectively vengeful.

The House of Representatives is in especially bad shape. Members openly talk about Speaker McCormack's senility. Majority Leader Carl Albert is physically ill and exhausted; he has been unable to exert the slightest discipline this session. Minority Leader Gerald Ford apparently thinks he is still playing football at the University of Michigan because in response to any problem he babbles along at the level of socko (!) and pow (!). Ever since the Dixiecrats and conservative Republicans learned that they were powerful enough to block due process for Adam Clayton Powell, a mob spirit has prevailed. First the Powell kangaroo court, then the anti-flag-burning bill, and now the anti-riot bill.

The Senate is also a terminal case, but quieter. Whatever virility might have been mustered was dissipated by Democratic Whip Russell Long, first in his tedious filibuster to pass a campaign slush fund, and then in his suspiciously psychotic defense of Thomas Dodd, the censured Senator. After the Dodd fiasco, Sen. Thruston B. Morton of Kentucky appraised the situation accurately but incompletely: "I don't think there has been a time in my memory when Congress has been at such a low ebb in the judgment of the American people." He could have said low ebb of any kind.

Among unhappy progressives wandering the halls of the Capitol, the most optimistic prediction comes from Rep. Henry Reuss: "I think it would be fatuous to say Congress will do something this session when our record so far is so poor. But some of the Administration's programs are so unrelated to anything that's going on, who can say a frontal assault with some new program wouldn't have results?" Others would be more likely to agree with Rep. Henry Gonzalez:



Ben Roth Agency

> This Congress is dead. It has been from the beginning. It is a mad, confused Congress that wastes its time slashing at symbols. It's the same kind of Congress I ran into in 1963, when I came to Washington. Nothing was being done then that related to the problems out in the country. A little energy would be worked up by Wednesday, and this would carry over to Thursday, maybe, but then all life would go out of it again. Came the assassination and Congress swung into action. Now we've got another Wednesday-and-Thursday Congress, doing nothing. Does it take assassinations to get action?

Even the few efforts made in this Congress to correct the causes of violent feelings are being undercut by President Johnson. Once again—as was tragically true of his Civil Rights Act—the President is indicating that he does not want a gutsy program; he merely wants a few bill titles that he can wave in the next campaign. The New York Times recently editorialized that "the Johnson Administration is determined to fight poverty, urban decay and other root causes of civic unrest with all the slogans in its arsenal—provided it doesn't have to back them up with money." Half the arsenal is made up of empty slogans, the other half is empty bills. For instance: Potentially, the most useful bill working its way through Congress now is the House version of the proposed Consumer Credit Protection Act, better known as the truth in lending bill. As it stands now, the main provisions of the bill would require (1) that the lender or seller clearly state the annual finance charge; (2) that no interest higher than 18 per cent can be charged; and (3) that garnishment of wages will be outlawed.

It is no secret that a great many middle and low-income people are made miserable by gouging creditors. Senate hearings revealed ghetto Negroes and whites paying 290 per cent interest on auto purchases, and up to 285 per cent interest on TV sets. When the ignorant man borrows money, the interest rate is often 300 per cent or higher; if he can't pay, the creditor garnishees his wages. This angers the boss, who fires the worker. This angers the worker, who figures it is just another sign of the Establishment's meanness. And he's ready to use a brick. Some of the smashing and looting of shops was undoubtedly done by happy debtors "getting back their own."

The House Banking Committee staff estimates that $1.5 billion in debt were wiped out by personal bankruptcy actions last year, and that 80 per cent of the people who went into bankruptcy admitted doing so as the only way to escape garnishment of wages, followed by the loss of their job. The National Industrial Conference Board in 1965 found that 13 per cent of all employers will fire any worker subject to garnishment, and that 43 per cent of the companies that hire more than 5,000 employees will fire a worker for that reason. In some areas, garnishment is an industrial way of life. The Chicago plant of Inland Steel is supervising the garnishment of wages for 2,000 of its 22,000 employees.

This is the situation that the truth in lending bill is supposed to correct. Now comes the betrayal: More than a year ago national headquarters of the AFL-CIO began urging certain Congressmen to write a tough consumer credit bill. More than half the signers of the House bill put their names on it at the request of AFL-CIO lobbyists. A few weeks ago, for instance, Rep. Jonathan Bingham was asked by two labor lobbyists to put his name on the bill and give it his full support; he was assured by the lobbyists that if labor had anything against the bill, "it was too soft."

Yet on the third day of the hearings in the House Banking Committee, Andrew J. Biemiller, director of legislative affairs for the AFL-CIO, stated, straight-faced, that "no formal or specific national policy has been developed by the national AFL-CIO" on the problem of maximum interest rates, or garnishment or creditor-debtor contracts. He said he considered these premature elements in the bill, and he urged that Congress hold off any action until a full study was made, as suggested by President Johnson.

The President had put the pressure on labor to help gut the bill of its most controversial sections, just as he had sent his consumer "expert," Betty Furness, to make the same appeal to the committee the day before. Johnson isn't interested in the bill's program; he is interested only in its title.

Precisely the same philosophy brought about the death of the celebrated rat-control bill. If President Johnson really cared about killing rats, he could have quietly channeled millions of dollars through extermination programs already existing in the Department of Health, Education and Welfare. That department should supervise the program, anyway. The emphasis on rat extermination should be to improve human health—not real estate. The Department of Housing and Urban Affairs is not the proper administrator of the program, just as the Department of Agriculture is not the proper administrator of the food-stamp program, which also should be given to HEW on the same grounds: food distribution programs are to improve human health, not farm incomes.

But Johnson was set on getting a bill with that title—Rat Control Bill—into Congress, even if it meant risking the program. So he sent it to the floor, although his House advisers warned him that the head count was incomplete and, such as it was, indicated a most precarious position for the legislation.

With his interests now solely centered on next year's campaign (labor officials who experienced an hour and a half of monologue in the White House recently came away reporting that the President sounds truly panicky about 1968), no response to the slum problem, except perhaps another call to prayers, can be expected from the White House. Just to make sure his cronies in Congress understood his mood, Johnson had Treasury Secretary Henry Fowler announce that none of the money raised by the proposed 10 per cent income tax surcharge would go to anti-poverty; all would go to Vietnam.

When Johnson named Gov. Otto Kerner of Illinois—protege of Chicago's Mayor Richard Daley—to chair the eleven-man Special Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders, nobody needed a guide book to understand the purely political nature of the investigation that would result. Skepticism immediately became epidemic. "The chief purpose of the commission, one suspects," wrote Charles Bartlett, "is to buy the time necessary to give the White House a clearer view of the nation's reaction to the ghetto uprisings."

Not to be outstudied by the Executive branch, the House voted $25 million for "planning and research" into the cause and control of riots, and in the Senate, John McClellan of Arkansas tooled up his subcommittee for an investigation of the riots that promises to be about as objective as McClellan's personal attitude. When a Newark policeman appeared before the Senate Judiciary Committee, McClellan began shouting at him: "What are you afraid of? . . . Are you timid? Have the police been cowed? Why are they afraid to do their jobs?"

The riots have been useful in at least one respect. They have made Washington admit what should have been obvious long ago—the Vietnamese War is a domestic issue. The Johnson Administration used the "guns-and-butter" argument with surprising success until this summer, but that's done with now. Last year it would have been thought an impossible achievement, but the riots have actually destroyed the old cliche. What guns and what butter? The guns in Newark and the butter on Premier Ky's table? The terms have become meaningless; everything is too mixed up. Saigon (possibly because the local military operates with equal fairness in both places) seems as close as Plainfield, N. J., and Vice President Humphrey talks about a "Marshall Plan" for Detroit.

At least Martin Luther King is vindicated here in the capital. In the spring, the Congressional Record was spotted with denunciations of King for trying to merge the peace movement with the Negro freedom movement. Looking back on it now, that hardly seems like a radical position, but even old allies like the NAACP and the Urban League said he was out of line. On April 10, the NAACP passed a resolution reading: "Civil rights battles will have to be fought or won on their own merits, irrespective of the state of war or peace in the world." The Washington Post, always happy to serve as a sheath for President Johnson's daggers, reported on April 16: "Administration officials privately suggest that Dr. King leaped headlong into peace campaigns partly in search of money and headlines. . . ."

Four months later, the riots made the lumping of race and war problems a commonplace, even among such cautious moderates as Sen. Robert Kennedy. On the television program, Meet the Press, recently Douglas Kiker asked him: "Which will be the larger issue [in 1968] Vietnam or big city riots?" Kennedy answered: "I think they are going to be very closely related. . . ." In April, Dr. King was scolded for confusing issues when he said that giving top priority to military spending pointed to the nation's "approaching spiritual death." In August, Sen. William Fulbright calls the Great Society a "sick society" for the same reasons, and nobody gives it a second thought; after all, at least one-third of Congress, that least sensitive of bodies, is saying the same thing, publicly or privately.

But this Congress is saying many things, in all directions: some of them make headlines, although they reflect no substantive impulses. This Congress is without trends—it is stuck. Once in a while some member will stray into a compassionate insight. (Sen. Philip Hart: "The rioters belong to no world but their own. It is a world where the police can arrive in five minutes but it may take months to get the building code inspector in.") But the effect on the 90th Congress is, practically speaking, no better or worse than the numskulleries of Congressman John Rarick ("Senator Bilbo, Senator McCarthy, and an army of others foresaw and forewarned our people of the black-power movement controlled by the Communist Party years ago"); or the overwrought alarms of a normally balanced Senator such as Eugene McCarthy ("the statements of Stokely Carmichael in Cuba . . . run far beyond the reasonable limits of freedom of speech").

Vice President Humphrey blames Congress for the riots, and Sen. Joseph Clark says Congress shouldn't be blamed. The unretiring J. Edgar Hoover is showing new sources of usefulness, supplying quotes to both sides: some Congressmen have him saying that the slum disturbances are the work of conspiring Communists; others that there is no conspiracy. House Concurrent Resolution No. 450 is one of several efforts to make the Justice Department prosecute Stokely Carmichael for sedition. But on the other hand, ten members of the House signed a statement urging U.S. withdrawal from Vietnam (just as Carmichael is doing) so that the money can be spent for domestic reforms. If all this adds up to anything, it is a significant zero.

When King David was "old and covered with years," the Bible says, the wise men of his tribe tried to restore his circulation by putting a young virgin in bed with him, "but he got no heat." The men who run Congress, especially the leadership of the House of Representatives, are like David—old in their bones, cold in spirit, and unable to respond normally to passionate situations.

Not even the most riotous summer in the nation's history can arouse this Congress to more than a quiver of cliches and angry groans of impotence.

THE YANQUI UNIVERSITIES

SHIPS THAT PASS IN THE NIGHT

RONALD HILTON

Mr. Hilton is executive director of The California Institute of International Studies at Stanford. He returned last spring from a year in Latin America.

Where are American universities headed? They are being Latin Americanized. Where are Latin American universities headed? They are being Americanized.

After graduating from Oxford University, I undertook as a modern version of the Grand Tour a methodical plan of graduate study in each of the major countries of the Western world, spending in the course of this program two years (1934-36) in Madrid and two years (1937-39) at Berkeley as a Commonwealth Fund Fellow. In recent years I have visited practically every university in Latin America several times; their traditional structure has been modified by the influence of France, Germany and now the United States, but it is still essentially Spanish. Quite unlike that of Spain and Spanish America, the U.S. university system took on its peculiar form because unconsciously, or sometimes consciously, it imitated the structure of our business corporations. I received, therefore, a sharp impression of the dissimilarity between Spanish and U.S. universities.

One of my first experiences at the University of Madrid was the crisis (this was at the beginning of the Civil War) between the university and the government when students used the Faculty of Medicine to shoot it out with the police. A Civil Guard was killed (usually the students were the victims of these affrays), and the monarchist paper A.B.C. put the tear-jerking caption "Civil Guards also have mothers!" under photographs of the dead member of the elite police. Life at the university college known as the Residencia de Estudiantes was frustrating. The students at one faculty or another would declare a strike. We would learn of it when we went down to breakfast, and the students would stay home all day, playing tennis, talking politics, occasionally doing a little work. They knew Spanish politics inside out, and I learned then that books, journals and newspapers are inadequate for the study of politics in Spanish-speaking countries. Only long hours of conversation open the gate to this fascinating field.

A graduate student in law, a Communist who lived across from me in the Residencia, was killed in one of the battles fought in the university city. My best friend was a conservative who took refuge in the Uruguayan Embassy. When Franco entered Madrid in 1939, this man was released after three years of confinement, drafted into the Blue Legion to fight on Hitler's Eastern front, and died in the snows of Russia.

American universities provided a quite different kind of surprise. No American professor or student in the late 1930s would declare himself to be an "intellectual," a word common on the Madrid academic scene. Professors were described as "employees of the university"; I humbly find this normal now after thirty years, but then it seemed an outrageous affront to the "intellectuals." On the day I arrived in New York, a professor jumped from a skyscraper window, following a disagreement with his university administration. I can understand that too now, but at the time I wondered how universities could possibly have administrations so powerful as to drive the faculty to suicide. In fact, the expression, "university administration," meant little to me; in Europe no such thing really existed. An American businessman whom I met had been a university dean; when I asked why he had left academic life, he answered that he couldn't stand the competition. The universities I visited were efficiently run. The administration ran the corporation; the faculty was busy with research which would bring prestige, promotion and salary increases; the students had a good time and studied enough to acquire the diploma that would bring them, if not prestige, at least a job. Long, fascinating conversations about politics would have interfered with the tedious job of equipping oneself for the struggle for existence in a competitive society.

Since World War II a curious mutual shift has been taking place. Dissatisfied with the inhumanity of the American academic structure, the liberals among the faculty and students have pointed to certain distasteful features of our university system and, in trying to remedy them, have been pushing our universities toward precisely the same solution which the Spanish-American universities found under the impact of the liberalizing movement. Meanwhile, upset by the inefficiency of the liberal university system, the conservatives, the military, the Roman Catholic Church and North American business interests have been urging or even forcing Latin American universities to adopt the traditional structure of U.S. universities. To speed the process, they have established new universities which, for want of a better term, we shall call the "Americanized" universities. Latin American intellectuals are viscerally opposed to the Americanization of their universities, but the money and power behind this movement are hard to resist. Moreover, Latin Americans desperately want their countries to be successful, and since a successful country has as an integral part a successful university system, they are willing to try U.S. academic methods. Few Latin Americans, even those who dislike Americanization, stop to analyze the implications of the U.S. system of higher education. Conversely, very few Americans realize that their universities are being Latin Americanized. The two systems are, therefore, like ships passing in the night. Perhaps a little ship-to-ship conversation would be a good thing, since the seas are uncharted. What are the issues involved?

Faculty and students in the United States are no longer willing to be controlled, through the boards of trustees, by the power elite. They want a say in the conduct of the university's affairs on the highest level. Most Latin American universities have achieved this, usually with a tripartite governing body drawn from the faculty, the alumni and the students. This system is blamed, rather unfairly, for the inefficiency of Latin American university administration. The Americanized universities employ U.S.-style boards of trustees on which the faculty and students have little, if any, representation. Usually a sop is offered in the form of a committee made up of administration, faculty and students, which airs its views but has no real power. It is doubtful that this device will much longer appease the demands of the faculty and students, who want to have their hands on the legal controls of the university. There have not yet been demands for the tripartite system used in Latin America, but they may come later.

In Latin America the Córdoba university reforms of 1917 brought back the medieval democratic system by which university authorities, especially the rector (i.e., president) and the deans are elected by the faculty and students. Faculty members present themselves as candidates, make speeches expounding their programs, and the victorious candidate takes office for a stipulated term. Sometimes the elections are as colorful as a U.S. political convention. By contrast, our university presidents have traditionally been appointed for an unlimited term by the boards of trustees, which can dismiss them at will. There are now demands that the faculty be guaranteed at least some say in the selection of a president. Moreover, academic elections in the United States have been pretty much a formality. They are elections for committees, not for executive posts; candidates do not present themselves, and those elected do not have to state their program. It is now proposed that the elections acquire some reality, that there be effective candidates, and that they be required to state their platforms. Meanwhile, the Americanized universities in Latin America are moving toward the traditional U.S. system; the trustees appoint the rector, who in turn appoints the deans. The circus of elections is abolished.

American university campuses have had no special legal status. In Spanish-speaking countries, university buildings have for centuries been as sacrosanct as the churches, where anyone fleeing from the law could seek asylum. In front of some old Spanish university buildings are stone pillars connected by a chain, beyond which the police could not pass. The tradition of barring police from a university has allowed students in Latin America to barricade themselves inside university buildings and allegedly to convert them into revolutionary barracks. The Americanization of Latin American universities has been accompanied by a flouting of this tradition. When Venezuelan President Leoni recently sent troops into the Central University of Caracas, it did not occur to him that he was acting like the military governments of Argentina and Brazil, which democratic Venezuela has formally denounced. In the United States the reverse trend is perceptible. The presence of the state police on the Berkeley campus has become a major issue, and in a TV interview on February 5 former President Clark Kerr of the University of California said that the assignment of outside police to various campuses had aggravated student unrest. There are demands that university police take care of campus problems, the feeling being that once the campuses are under the thumb of the regular police, academic freedom will vanish. It was precisely this fear that made Latin American universities challenge the right of the government police to enter university buildings.

In the past, most of our great universities were supported by tuition. Since World War II there have been, even in New England and in New York State, moves to provide free higher education on a scale hitherto unknown in the world. Generous California is now wondering how it can afford to maintain its costly state university and college systems, but Governor Reagan's proposal to introduce tuition is generally regarded as a step backward. In Latin America, free university education has been the rule, but in fact the governments have usually been unable or unwilling to pay for a modern university system. Salaries have been low, and funds for libraries and equipment insufficient. The Americanized universities charge tuition and in many cases, as at the Universidad de los Andes in Bogota, offer fair salaries and provide relatively good facilities. The move to introduce tuition would undoubtedly spread were university authorities not afraid of rioting students who will seize and burn buses if fares are raised a cent. Caught in a financial vise, public Latin American universities stress "autonomy," i.e., the state should provide the funds but otherwise not intervene in the affairs of the universities. This cherished autonomy, now being eroded in Latin America, is essentially what the Berkeley liberals demand.

Until now, few Latin American professors have been engaged full time. Most were active in public affairs or supplemented their incomes with outside jobs. Such combinations of activities have been unusual in the United States, but are so no longer. In Latin America faculty absenteeism and lack of concentration on academic duties have been sharply criticized, and U.S. foundations are unwilling to support institutions which do not have a solid core of full-time teachers. Many Latin American administrators claim that their aim is to have a completely full-time faculty. The goal is remote, but it is the direction in which Latin American universities are moving.

The American universities traditionally had church affiliations. However, over the past half century universities associated with Protestant churches have been secularized, and just in the last year there has been a surprising movement to secularize Roman Catholic universities. The reason stated is that higher education is incompatible with Church control; it is also probably feared that control of higher education may embarrass the Church, as for example in the case of the faculty strike at St. John's University. Latin America in modern times has feared such control and has kept higher education separate from the Church. The liberal university movement in Spain got its start in the 19th century from the refusal of a group of professors to swear to support Catholic doctrine—a religious version of the loyalty oath. Now the Latin American power elite and U.S. business interests support Americanized universities controlled by the Roman Catholic Church, which is looked upon as a bulwark against communism. The Creole Foundation, belonging to a subsidiary of the Standard Oil Company, refuses to support the Central University in Caracas but is giving massive aid to the Catholic University. In March, 1967, Episcopal Bishop James A. Pike charged in Playboy magazine that the Jesuits had heavy investments in Creole Petroleum. The Jesuits have traditionally been regarded as the allies, and indeed the agents, of conservative ruling groups. Hence they are constitutionally banned from Mexico, but nevertheless operate the Universidad Iberoamericana with the support of commercial companies. In Guadalajara the business community, supported by the U.S. State Department and U.S. foundations, has been promoting the Catholic university to offset the state university, looked upon as "Socialist." In brief, while in the United States there has been a broad move toward the secularization of higher education, in Latin America the trend has been toward clericalization. While in the United States a liberal Supreme Court has been pushing the separation of church and state in education, the thrust of U.S. influence in Latin America has been to strengthen the hand of the Roman Catholic Church in university affairs. The fact that Catholic universities employ some Protestants and Jews should not mislead us as to the focus of power. It must be said that some Catholic universities do an excellent job and that they are usually willing to cooperate with secular, Protestant and Jewish organizations in a way that would have been inconceivable two decades ago. Unfortunately, the death of Pope John XXIII has brought a slight setback in this cordiality.

Thus, American universities are moving toward the position formerly held by Latin American universities, while these are being pushed into "Americanization." This march and countermarch reflect cultural changes. Previously, American faculty and students stuck to their academic business; they did not demonstrate or strike for political reasons. Now alienation from the power elite has produced every form of social protest on our campuses except armed rebellion. In a conscienceless social structure, our academicians have come to regard themselves as the conscience of the nation. That has traditionally been the stance of Latin American intellectuals, but in the Americanized universities of Latin America faculty and students are being told, quite forcefully, that they must concentrate on being good professionals and forget the illusion that they are the conscience of society. The difference is that between the conservative and progressive viewpoints. The managerial class wants universities to turn out competent technicians with a veneer of culture, not independent citizens who will seriously question the origin of power and wealth. In our universities the progressives have become more aggressive; in Latin America they are being weakened or entirely ousted, with the active collusion of U.S. agencies. The Americans who are taking part in what might be called "Operation Latin American University" justify their actions by saying that the liberals who held power in the universities were hostile to the United States and to U.S. business, and had allowed the universities to become chaotic and ineffective. What Latin America needs, the Americans argue, is not campus politicians but qualified engineers and business administrators.

The issue thus enters the domain of foreign policy. What might fairly be called the Reagan viewpoint dominates U.S. influence and aid programs in Latin American education. It is evident in such things as the creation of American-style schools of business, which will turn out U.S.-style business executives. Evident in this emphasis is a curious double standard. We are trying to build academic bridges with the USSR, and government agencies have been inviting a stream of Russian specialists to our campuses. But when a Latin American university enters into relations with the USSR, it is likely to be blacklisted by the United States. When one Latin American university invited some Russian scientists to come as visiting professors, tension between the American Embassy and the university became intolerable, and the rector resigned to lead a leftist political party.

We may be playing with fire. By supporting Roman Catholic universities, we may be unwittingly fanning anti-clericalism, and our university policy generally may become as popular as Governor Reagan's in California. We should study the virulent anti-Americanism of Fidel Castro's Foreign Minister Raúl Roa, an academician who had even been the beneficiary of U.S. largess. The University of Havana was a focal point of the hostility to the academic Americanization described in this article. Without skill and luck our generosity may, as the Spanish say, be contraproducente—which seems to be the origin of our neologism "counterproductive." As our two academic ships pass in the night, they could ask each other, "Is this trip worth while?" The trouble is that neither the captains nor the crews seem to know where they are going.

I think it important, however, to rescue Mr. Gans from his admirers. . . . Gans himself nowhere offers his conclusions as gospel. expensive platitudes

San Francisco, Calif.

Dear Sirs: It is understandable that Elisabeth Mann Borgese, a staff member of the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions which sponsored Pacem in Terris II, would want to put the best possible light on what transpired at that Geneva meeting (The Nation, July 31).

Having sat through its boring sessions, I think the European press reaction to PIT was more accurate. The Journal de Génève headlined its coverage: "Does one have the right to be banal?" and Le Monde said that the conference "uncorked only a series of pious wishes."

One of the few challenging talks of the meeting was by Prof. Paul Lin of McGill University, who argued persuasively that the nuclear nonproliferation treaty negotiations led by the U.S. and the USSR are in reality nothing more than an effort by the big two to preserve their monopoly of power. Mrs. Borgese unfairly dismisses him in her article as a Chinese "spokesman." Lin is a Canadian and a professor of history. He spoke as a scholar, although perhaps somewhat out of harmony with those who, like Mrs. Borgese, thought that "coexistence with China was too remote an issue even to be considered."

Referring to some of the "outstanding" talks, Mrs. Borgese cites Marya Mannes, but doesn't report that her talk contained virtually the only criticism of the conference to be uttered. Politely, Miss Mannes said: "We have suffered deprivations at this meeting. Oh no, not physical. In fact the luxury of our surroundings is perhaps in unhappy contrast to the poverty of our powers. We have been deprived not only of our adversaries but of our greatest allies—the young . . . they know more what is going on than we do here—and the absence of their voices is a tragic omission."

The platitudes uttered were worth neither the near $1 million they cost nor the 5 pages of space they got in The Nation.

yellow peril

Willoughby, O.

Dear Sirs: I register my strong disagreement with the editorial "The Negro and Vietnam" [The Nation, July 17] in which you belittle those who interpret the Vietnamese War as a race war.

Consider the following: (1) The French referred to the Vietnamese as "les jaunes," the Americans refer to them as "the little yellow bastards" or "gooks." (2) The American scale of values—for the destruction of one rubber tree the plantation owner receives $85 compensation, for destruction of one child in an accidentally bombed friendly village the bereft parents receive $34. (3) LBJ's statement—without our military power we would be "at the mercy of every yellow dwarf with a jack knife."

It is difficult to separate colonialism and racism, but just as the Negroes constitute an internal colony here in the U.S., so in Asia Washington's colonial adventure is also a racist war.

A Labor of Love and Learning

A SHORT HISTORY OF IRISH LITERATURE: A Backward Look. By Frank O'Connor. G. P. Putnam's Sons. 264 pp. $5.95.

KEVIN SULLIVAN

Mr. Sullivan is associate dean of the Graduate Faculties at Columbia University and the author of Joyce Among the Jesuits (Columbia University Press).

In Ireland Frank O'Connor's last book has been published under the title The Backward Look and carries as an unobtrusive subtitle, "A Survey of Irish Literature." The same book now appears in America as A Short History of Irish Literature to which is tacked on—gratuitously, it seems, but perhaps guiltily—the subtitle, "A Backward Look." I mention this not to raise a quibble against the commercial wisdom of O'Connor's American publishers but because the interchange of titles can affect the expectation of readers and the response of reviewers on either side of the Atlantic. Clearly a book calling itself a history, however short, on a subject as various, complicated and obscure as Irish literature often is, cannot be read or judged in quite the same way as a book of genial obiter dicta by a distinguished and charming Irish writer taking a last look backward.

There seems nothing to do in such a case but to write two reviews—which is what I propose to do—one of the book in its academic title and gown, the other of the same book as relaxed and learned retrospection.

The book's academic origins are in a series of lectures delivered by the author at Trinity College, Dublin, a year or so before his death on March 10, 1965. The unifying thread of those lectures was a question O'Connor had put to himself: "Is there such a thing as an Irish literature, or is it merely two unrelated subjects linked by a geographical accident?" His answer, ultimately, is affirmative: "If it is not a real subject, then all the subjects of our criticism are likewise dreams." But this is hardly a resounding affirmation. O'Connor, honestly confessing himself "confused by its vagaries as well as by my own lack of academic scholarship," knows that to prove his claim he must establish a continuity—whatever its nature—between literature written in Irish and literature, an Irish literature, written in English. No one, so far as I know, has yet succeeded in this difficult and perhaps impossible task. The best attempt so far made, and that on a limited scale, is Vivian Mercier's The Irish Comic Tradition. Ironically, O'Connor, while full of admiration for Mercier's scholarship, at one time dismissed his thesis as unproved and unprovable.

That irony comes home to roost when O'Connor sets himself the task of surveying the whole of Irish literature from its earliest beginnings down to the rambunctious entertainments of Brendan Behan and the girlish lubricities of Edna O'Brien. And so he can write:

> Sometimes one gets the impression that all the vital political issues of the time [the 19th century] were unimportant compared with the task of bringing the name of Cu Chulainn into English literature. This was finally achieved by a combination of great Celtic scholars and the literary genius of Yeats and his circle, and by the year 1910 it could be said that Irish literature again existed in something like the way in which it had existed about the year 800.

This brief passage illustrates the kind of thing that faults the book as literary history: personal impression, vague speculation, overextended comparison, and the blurring of distinction that allows "English literature" in the first sentence to reappear by magical sleight-of-word as "Irish literature" in the second. (We are not, of course, expected to take seriously the claims of Cu Chulainn, either as myth or history, over those of Daniel O'Connell or Charles Parnell.) What is lacking here and generally throughout the book is method, some critical consistency that will not be seduced from the task at hand, the history of a rich literature—ancient and new—by the blandishments of personal preference or indulgent supposition. O'Connor's dislike of Joyce, for example, is too well known for his devaluation of Ulysses or Finnegans Wake to come now as much of a surprise. But his dismissal of Maria Edgeworth's Castle Rackrent as "utterly didactic and censorious" is both arbitrary and unfair, though it may be no more, as I suspect, than a gentle dig at his friend Thomas Flanagan for the latter's high but just appraisal of that novel as "an almost perfect work of fiction." He seems no less casual, but much more kind, in his appraisal of men like Synge, O'Casey or Colum.

At times O'Connor is even more arbitrary in his praise than in his censure. Lady Gregory's plays have, it is true, been unjustly neglected in recent years, but I doubt that her reputation will be greatly advanced by the extravagant claim that parts of Dervorgilla are "as noble as anything in Irish literature," or that the climax of The Gaol Gate "is as great as anything in classical tragedy." This is neither criticism nor history; it is affection and loyalty, a debt lovingly paid to the memory of a redoubtable lady who helped young Michael O'Donovan find his way in the world of literature which he was to grace for more than forty years as Frank O'Connor.

If the book is not fully satisfactory as literary history, the failure can be traced to its original conception as a series of lectures. It was not thought out from the beginning as a "history." If he had lived, O'Connor would almost certainly have recast it in different form. The appendix to the present book is an example of the way in which he had already rethought his approach to and interpretation of early Irish saga, especially the Táin Bó Cuàilnge which had always a powerful fascination for him. He might also have imposed stricter limitations on himself and his material and not have attempted so much in so little. Even so, it is the book of a learned man and a man who loves his subject however troubled at times the marriage may seem between love and learning. "The Irish," O'Connor writes, "had the choice between imagination and intellect, and they chose imagination." Just so O'Connor: the play of his imagination through Irish literary history constantly diverts him, however engagingly, from the scholarly labors proposed but only imperfectly executed by a fine and voracious intellect.

To turn now from the book as literary history and to consider it as literary retrospection—to read it, that is, under its Irish rather than its American title—is to reduce much of what has been said here to pedantic cavil, as ungrateful as it is inaccurate. Inaccurate because under this other mode O'Connor was not writing a treatise but telling a story; ungrateful because this is a love story, the story of O'Connor's lifelong affair with language—whatever language his country spoke or wrote at whatever time in its long and troubled history. That the story should often be unhappy—what love story is not finally?—and angry and anguished and impatient, is perhaps inevitable. But it has also its moments of glad grace, and it is honestly and lovingly told as such a story should be.

O'Connor had always insisted that the short story, his own special métier, should retain the sound of the storyteller's voice, and in his own practice he adhered faithfully to that principle. Much of the charm of the present book comes from the sound of O'Connor's voice, the sly or humorous or affectionate tone of it when he is talking about Yeats and Lady Gregory, Stephens and Synge and Joyce and other of his near contemporaries, but hardly less so when he evokes for us the remote past of early Irish lyric and saga and those nameless men who copied down or transcribed the stories that had been preserved from still earlier times by the human voice alone.

So great is O'Connor's sympathy with the oral tradition that these voices as he distinguishes among them—as, for example, in the Taín—take on many of the characteristics of living men, shrouded in mist still and only half emerged into light, but distinct now one from the other, each itself and no other. There is a sense in which O'Connor himself is part of this oral tradition, and as a storyteller his insight into the problems and purposes, the partial successes and failures, of these ancient practitioners of the craft surpass anything that might be expected from scholarship alone.

As for method, the scholar's standard may be critical consistency, but the storyteller's touchstone is always "relevance." In talking about a subject that extends from the fifth century A.D. to the present, O'Connor must in the interest of economy hazard certain generalizations and conjectures without which the symmetry of the story would be spoiled. But his view of the subject remains whole, however much the literature, or literatures, may have been divided and fragmented.

He sees, for example, that the Irish success in confining and finally absorbing the Norman invasion was in the end a self-defeating, even a tragic enterprise, for it precluded the political integration of Ireland into the feudal civilization of Europe and left the country exposed to a more alien and ruthless settlement from England in the centuries that followed. And yet the shock of the Normans was enough to start Irish literature on a long and slow decline, its aristocratic traditions gradually degenerating into a folk literature of hillside, bog and cabin, until by the end of the 18th century it had virtually ceased to exist. After Cromwell and the rise of an Anglo-Irish ascendancy, all hope for that literature rapidly disappeared. For the Cromwellian subjugation of Ireland succeeded where the Normans and others had failed because, O'Connor points out, there was never a chance that the remnants of Gaeldom, Catholic and clustered about an enfeebled and futile nobility, could any longer exert that fatal Irish capacity for absorption against the anti-Catholic, anti-Royalist and middle-class force majeure of the new entrepreneurs.

The rest of the story, as O'Connor sees it, is the tragedy of Anglo-Ireland. But that, fortunately, is not the end of it. The storyteller himself had a part in the last chapter, and now a new chapter is in the making. A younger generation of writers has grown up in an Ireland different from that of O'Connor or of those before him—the ascendancy is gone, independence is matter-of-fact—and they are free of that compulsion to be ever looking backward. But whenever they may do so, Frank O'Connor will be part of what they see; and they will know in the work he has left behind what they have gained, and in the memory of the man himself what they have lost.

Listening to Frank O'Connor

HARRIET O'CONNOR

Mrs. O'Connor is the widow of the late Frank O'Connor. She prepared the following memoir especially for The Nation.

It was in a classroom that I first saw Frank O'Connor. A casual, part-time student, I'd decided to take his course at Harvard because of a story of his which treated with humor and urbanity problems I had never realized could be taken that way—not the best of academic reasons. It was summer and he wore a rumpled seersucker suit (which I later discovered he thought a variety of American tweed), a thick, fuzzy, blue and orange tweed tie, and a look both frightened and delighted—as though he didn't quite know what "a simple Irishman" (as he often called himself) was doing at Harvard. With one pair of horn-rimmed glasses in his hand and another pushed up on his forehead he was describing people called "P Celts" who seemed to be importantly different from other people called "C Celts." I wondered briefly what this could have to do with the course I'd enrolled in for Anglo-Irish literature and which sort of a Celt Joyce would turn out to be—but Frank O'Connor's voice was so compelling and the picture he drew of pre-Christian Ireland so fascinating I soon really began to listen.

HARVEY SHAPIRO

I went on listening—with delight and increasing amazement for the next fifteen years. I listened as he talked Irish to a gardener outside Lamont, as he praised the German philologists who'd rescued early Irish sagas from oblivion, as he half-chanted, half-declaimed his translation of "The Lament For Art O'Leary, whose epitaph—"generous, handsome, brave"—delighted him by its aptness and its Irishness). I heard him describe books—often long out of print—by authors whose names were completely new to me—Father Peter O'Leary, Gerald O'Donovan, Asaneth Nicholson, Daniel Corkery. I began to learn that Irish literature is unbelievably old, fragmented and, in part, still untranslated. It was only after we were married that I discovered how much it meant to him, and how hard he worked to gain the knowledge he had.

There was, for example, his struggle to translate the Old Irish poem "The Nun of Beare." The verbal forms in this poem are exceedingly difficult, and scholars have frequently disagreed about the meaning of various words and phrases.

One line—translated by a scholar as "happily the tide returns to its fat" particularly annoyed him. "'Happily the tide returns to its fat'—that's not poetry—it doesn't even make sense." He submitted his most ingenious solutions for final judgment to Dan Binchy, probably the greatest living expert on Old Irish Law and an authority on obscure grammatical forms. Together they'd pore over the text—often Dan would sigh, smile and say: "An absolutely brilliant guess—but I'm afraid it isn't possible—that form didn't exist until a hundred years after this poem was written." But occasionally, with the true scholar's caution, he'd say: "You know, that might be right, and if it is . . ." and that would lead to more days of work on some other obscure line.

But this fascination with the sources of the literature he was a part of extended in every direction. I remember the hours we spent driving up unmarked, muddy boreens or tramping across soggy, furze-covered fields searching for a bit of an eighth-century high cross, or the remains of a carved chancel arch—looking for the concrete, artistic expressions of the ideas and beliefs of those early Celtic people.

I remember too a night at the YMHA in New York, when by cutting the choruses and choosing four plays that were relevant, he gave us a reading of Yeats's plays which was also the story of Yeats's life. That night he pointed toward the importance of the past for Irishmen when he said: "William Butler Yeats saw himself as a man who perhaps never lived, an ancient Irish hero called Cu Chulainn. There was another man in the same town at the same time who also saw himself as Cu Chulainn, a man named Pearse, and his dream ended one spring morning before an English firing squad. Both men knew one another, each knew the other thought that he was Cu Chulainn. The one founded a literature, the other a state."

But what, in all of this, of Frank O'Connor the short-story writer? In a way he was the man we Americans are most concerned about. How often we (friends, wife, editors—particularly editors) said: "Wouldn't you forget the poem, or that lecture, or the translation of the sage and write us a story?" He smiled, and went on with what he was doing, because he knew, as I had to learn, that stories did not come from the same perseverance that knowledge came from.

He said of the stories he wrote: "One writes in a sort of dream, and I can only hope that when I wake, I shall be satisfied with what I have dreamt." When he was writing a story nothing else in the world mattered. He simply wasn't there. And it was always the same when he'd finished. There they would be—the Irish characters in an Irish locale, working out their Irish problems—and this despite the fact that many of them were written while we were living in Brooklyn Heights and about people we knew in America. He explained it once: "I think of characters in terms of the way they talk . . . my memory is always empty of physical details—the color of someone's eyes and hair, or the sort of clothes they wore—but it is always full of voices. . . . The voices tell me how the characters think—if I tried to write as Americans talk I'd not only get the cadences wrong—I'd get the characters wrong as well." Thus my cousin's wife, who told him the story of "The Man of the World" becomes, in that story, a little boy from the lanes of Cork. And in the story which he wrote to tease me —"Expectation of Life"—I become "Sheila Hennessey, the daughter of a small builder in Cork."

Because Frank O'Connor was so passionately interested in people ("In this world," he told me, "people are all that matters") his characters could be, and often are, you or me. But he believed that "people" have ultimately to be "somebody in particular" and that the best way to be somebody in particular is to know who you are and all you can about the tradition that has shaped you. I think this is why he spent so much time looking backward. He wanted to find the pattern—to understand as well as he could the past which produced him and the people he knew, loved and wrote about. I believe the search enriched every word he ever wrote.

Swift Conviviality

VIVIAN MERCIER

Mr. Mercier is a member of the English Department at the University of Colorado. He is the author of The Irish Comic Tradition (Oxford).

Long before Ireland began to realize that tourism was potentially one of its greatest industries, Irish hospitality had become proverbial throughout the English-speaking world. The nearly eighty delegates to the Swift Tercentenary Symposium who converged on Dublin last spring must have carried home with them as a dominant impression the extraordinarily lavish and imaginative hospitality provided for them by the Irish Government, Dublin's two great universities, and most of the leading cultural institutions of the capital of the Irish Republic.

Even nature was in a hospitable mood: incredibly, not a drop of rain fell in Dublin during the festivities of April 25-29. The many trees along the streets were already in full leaf and loud with the song of blackbirds at dawn for the benefit of light sleepers or late roisterers. Tulips of all colors blazed against the emerald of the lawns in Trinity College and St. Stephen's Green, while the main streets and O'Connell Bridge were vivid with wallflowers and tulips, placed there in urns by courtesy of the city government.

The bulk of the delegates, naturally, came from American and British universities, but there were sizable contingents from France and Canada, a fine showing from Belgium, ones and twos from New Zealand, West Germany, Austria, Sweden, Switzerland, Finland, and delegates from Budapest and Leningrad.

In many ways the symposium could be viewed as an ecumenical occasion. Conspicuous at most of the ceremonies were the Very Rev. J. W. Armstrong, Swift's current successor as dean of St. Patrick's Cathedral (Church of Ireland, i.e., Anglican), and a brown-habited Capuchin, Rev. T. M. Crowley, representing the Catholic University of Louvain. The two universities in Dublin, Trinity College (as the one-college University of Dublin is familiarly known) and University College (part of the National University of Ireland)—the former traditionally Protestant and the Almost certainly because of this, Donagh O'Malley, the dynamic Irish Minister for Education, chose the week before the symposium to announce his plans for amalgamating the two institutions into a greater University of Dublin, no part of which could be subject to the ban of the Catholic Archbishop of Dublin. The conversation at the American Embassy cocktail party, which unofficially launched the celebrations, dwelt obsessively on the so-called "shotgun wedding" of the two institutions.

The official celebrations began in the Public Theatre of Trinity College, under a lofty ceiling enlivened by some of the magnificent plaster bas-reliefs for which 18th-century Dublin architecture is renowned. The walls are lined by larger-than-life oil paintings of alumni, including Swift.

The President of Ireland, Eamon de Valera, now in his 85th year and almost blind, but still an erect, imposing figure, made a brief speech that was not entirely ecumenical in spirit. Having mentioned his first acquaintance with the name of Swift in County Limerick folk tales about the dean and his servant Roger, the President went on to describe Swift as a religious bigot, but applauded his Irish patriotism. The provost of Trinity, Dr. A. J. McConnell, and the president of University College, Dublin, Dr. Jeremiah J. Hogan, formerly professor of English at U.C.D., followed with brief speeches. Then the retiring professor of English at University College, London, James Sutherland, delivered a paper planned but left incomplete by his late friend Prof. Herbert Davis, former president of Smith College and editor of The Prose Works of Jonathan Swift, who had died some four weeks earlier.

The same evening Trinity entertained the delegates, President de Valera, Prime Minister Jack Lynch, and other dignitaries at a banquet in the dining hall. This excellent meal was accompanied by some of the fine wines (notably the claret, Ch. Léoville-Barton, 1953) that have made the college cellars justly famous—and doubtless envied by U.C.D. Toasts were drunk to "the President of Ireland" and "the guests," and a telegram from Russia, praising Swift's championship of the common people of Ireland, was read, but speeches were omitted in favor of conversation, which reached a high pitch of liveliness after the cognac and port had circulated. The traditional sonorous Latin graces, recited by members of the Trinity classics department, opened and closed the proceedings.

Next day, the scholarly papers began in earnest. Prof. Irvin Ehrenpreis of the University of Virginia was prevented from reading his paper on Swift's politics by a family misfortune as tragic as the untimely death of Professor Davis, but it was ably read for him by Prof. Oliver Ferguson of Duke University. This, like the other papers on the first two mornings, was given in the room of the Trinity Graduates' Memorial Building used by the College Historical Society (founded by Edmund Burke) for its debates. My own paper, "Swift's Humour," followed that of Professor Ehrenpreis.

At 5 P.M. the same day, the Minister for Finance opened "Swift and His Age: A Tercentenary Exhibition" at the National Gallery of Ireland. Thanks to the generous terms of Bernard Shaw's will, the gallery is being doubled in size.

That night the unwearied delegates were entertained at a reception given by Frank Aiken, Minister for External Affairs, in the State Apartments of Dublin Castle, once the Kremlin of British rule in Ireland, whose walls are still lined with the portraits of British generals and administrators. Beneath them paraded some of modern Ireland's most celebrated faces, including the actors Micheál MacLiammóir (The Importance of Being Oscar) and Hilton Edwards, who recently directed Philadelphia, Here I Come on Broadway. A concert of the music of Swift's Dublin, destined for Irish television, followed the reception, but I evaded it on the ground that Swift hated music.

On Thursday morning Prof. Louis Landa of Princeton and Prof. Ricardo Quintana of Wisconsin, the dean of Swift studies in the United States, read their papers dealing with Swift's churchmanship and the satiric intent and execution of Gulliver's Travels, respectively. The afternoon was filled by a visit to the home of Vanessa (Esther Van Homrigh) at Celbridge, outside Dublin, where the delegates viewed an exhibit and heard a lecture by the Hon. Desmond Guinness.

In the evening we attended a new play at the rebuilt Abbey Theatre, Dearly Beloved Roger by John O'Donovan, author also of Shaw and the Charlatan Genius. This was a highly professional production, brilliantly directed by Edward Golden, who plays Martin Cunningham in the film of Ulysses. Joe Lynch, the versatile actor who plays Blazes Boylan in Ulysses, not only gave an insight into the complexity of Swift but managed to resemble closely the Bindon portraits of the dean. O'Donovan's play was a pageant of Swift's life, interspersed with dramatic readings of much of his verse and some of his prose. The delegates on the whole seemed rather hostile to its adoption of dubious theories about Swift's relationships (in every sense of the word)

DRIVING THROUGH MINNESOTA DURING THE HANOI BOMBINGS

We drive between lakes just turning green;
Late June. The white turkeys have been moved
To new grass.
How long the seconds are in great pain!
Terror just before death,
Shoulders torn, shot
From helicopters, the boy
Tortured with the telephone generator,
"I felt sorry for him,
And blew his head off with a shotgun."
These instants become crystals,
Particles
The grass cannot dissolve. Our own gaiety
Will end up
In Asia, and in your cup you will look down
And see
Black Starfighters.
We were the ones we intended to bomb!
Therefore we will have To go far away
To atone
For the sufferings of the stringy-chested
And the small rice-fed ones, quivering
In the helicopter like wild animals,
Shot in the chest, taken back to be questioned.

with Stella and Vanessa. In the theatre bar after the play, O'Donovan gave us a little lecture in the form of an apology. If his theories required an apology, his ingenious, rather Brechtian entertainment did not.

On the last morning we all congregated in St. Patrick's Cathedral to hear two papers delivered from the pulpit. The first, "The Age of Swift in Ireland," was read by J. G. Simms, historian brother of the Anglican Archbishop of Dublin. After a coffee break in Swift's deanery, we returned to the Cathedral for Bach and Handel selections by the boy choristers.

Then came what was for me the most surreal moment of a surreal week: Austin Clarke, Ireland's greatest living poet, a Catholic by birth and upbringing though strongly anti-clerical, and a worthy successor of Swift in his topical satiric verse, mounted to this Protestant pulpit to deliver a paper on "Swift as a Poet" that pulled few punches about the harshness or obscenity of much of the dean's verse.

We adjourned next to St. Patrick's Hospital, the first mental hospital in Ireland (founded by Swift's legacy) for sherry and a banquet lunch. Austin Clarke recently published his greatest long poem, "Mnemosyne Lay in Dust," which by coincidence deals with the year he spent in St. Patrick's as a patient at the end of World War I. Over a glass of sherry he freely discussed his experiences there.

This extraordinary day reached its climax in the afternoon with an address by Dr. Norman Moore, for twenty years the enlightened master of the hospital, who has fallen completely under the spell of Swift. He gave us a brief history of St. Patrick's and went on to deny that Swift was ever mad, except in the sense that his brain was severely damaged by a stroke at the age of 75. Swift may have had a lifelong fear of insanity, said Dr. Moore, but, if so, he put it to good use by the terms of his will, thus exemplifying the aim of modern psychiatry, "the transmutation of a destructive force into a creative act."

Next came cocktails and champagne at the French Embassy. Oblivious of any need for dinner, many of us went straight from the Embassy to the farewell reception given by U.C.D. in New House, 86 St. Stephen's Green, formerly the residence of that 18th-century Dublin rake "Buck" Whaley. The marvelous rococo plaster reliefs in the reception rooms, along the staircase and over the ceilings provided a gracefully classic contrast to the business suits of the men and the "mod" styles of the younger women. Chief Justice Carroll O'Daly, the tireless chairman of the Symposium Committee, rendered thanks to all his aides, and especially to the unflappable secretary, Dr. Maurice Harmon of U.C.D., and to Miss Mathews of Trinity. He gave special thanks also to Prof. Philip Edward of the University of Essex (formerly of Trinity) and Prof. Roger McHugh of U.C.D., as well as to Mrs. Sybil Le Brocquy, a Dublin hostess and amateur Swift scholar who had first conceived the celebration. Prof. James Sutherland added his thanks on behalf of the delegates.

Next day the delegates piled into buses and were driven along the coast south of Dublin, past Joyce's Martello tower and via the Vico Road to Loughlinstown House, one of the homes of the Irish-Australian millionaire, William Galvin. The printed menu for our alfresco lunch under the trees there ran to 8 pages of 18th-century prose and verse, including the verse recipe for one of the dishes, "Mr. Gay's Knuckle," addressed by the poet John Gay to Swift: it proved to be a sort of veal goulash. Most of the guests preferred venison, lamb, rabbit, lobster or salmon, washed down by white or red Burgundy and, as the menu spelled it, "champaign." The well-designed menu bore the imprint of the Dolmen Press, headed by Liam Miller, Dublin's most enterprising printer and publisher. Dolmen, in association with the Oxford University Press and Dufour Editions, will issue the symposium papers and other Swift studies in the fall under the title Jonathan Swift: A Dublin Tercentenary Tribute.

As I left the Irish International Airlines plane at Chicago and said goodby to Ireland, I echoed fervently the familiar Gaelic lines translated by Frank O'Connor:

> The sudent's life is pleasant,
> And pleasant is his labour . . . .

ROLFE HUMPHRIES

The Collected Poems of Rolfe Humphries was published in 1965 by Indiana University Press. Mr. Humphries is retired from the faculty of Amherst College and now lives in California.

Alfred Henry Lewis (1859-1914) wrote approximately twenty books, sometimes as many as three appearing in a single year. His production was mainly fiction, and the fiction mainly short stories. The Wolfville chronicles were his best-known works, though, sadly, they are almost unknown to the present generation of readers. He wrote at least one novel, The President (1904): he also wrote biographies. He seems to have been drawn to reprobates, or at least to characters whose probity was unconventional; we find him dealing with Andy Jackson, Aaron Burr, the Tammany boss Richard Croker. He was interested enough to supply an introduction to John Doyle Lee's account of the confessions of his days as the (allegedly) official assassin of the Mormon Church under Brigham Young. Other titles include Confessions of a Detective, The Apaches of New York, Nation-famous New York Murders. But his reputation in his day was based most solidly on the Wolfville yarns, and it is on these that his fame must rest.

There might, however, be time and space for a quick glance at some of the biographical writing. Lewis' first volume was Richard Croker (Life Publishing Co., 1901). This was his third book, following Wolfville, and Sandburrs, which appeared, respectively, in 1897 and 1900. As biography, this is a curious performance indeed; of its 372 pages, not over a third say anything whatever about Croker; Lewis digresses all over the place, with general opinions on politics, his philosophies (often enough conflicting) of life, sketches of Aaron Burr, later the subject of another volume, Grover Cleveland, William McKinley, Arthur Pue Gorman, David B. Hill. He warns us in his first chapter that he will behave in this way, and his final sentence proclaims no regret: "I have had, on subjects, various and several, the unpent pleasure of saying what I thought and why I thought it." What he thought is not entirely consistent: he professed admiration for Burr as against Hamilton, for Democrats as against Republicans, for Tammany Hall as against goo-goos, for democracy as against plutocracy, for the Old South as against New York, and for the Far West as against the effete East. In general, his political ideas are a curious anticipation of the kind of stuff Shaw wrote many years later, in the text and preface of Geneva. The style is highly idiosyncratic: one of his favorite words, apparently, was the preposition of, which he employs as a synonym, almost, of to, for, by, with, and there is an elaborate florid quality to much that he puts down. Yet he can be devastatingly direct and forthright:

> Jones of Nevada once told that of all whom he had met in high places Cleveland was mentally the most abundantly dark. When he came to be President, he had not read the Constitution of the country.

Again, on Cleveland:

> He had no mental finenesses; no taste for art nor music. He knew no pleasant difference between a Murillo and a three-sheet poster. He would have had no preference for one of Schubert's serenades over The Arkansaw Traveler. He would rather talk than read, eat than talk, fish than eat, drink than fish.

Or on McKinley:

> McKinley is the middle size of man. He is passive; he is acted upon and does not act. He is prudent of himself; nor over-sensitive. He strikes poses and becomes a picture. He shrinks from the new. He sees nothing that has not been seen, hears nothing that has not been heard, finds nothing that has not been found, says nothing that has not been said, thinks nothing that has not been thought, knows nothing that has not been known, does nothing that has not been done, and would neither eat nor breathe were there not precedent for each. He is a peg of a President on which Money hangs its hat as it sits down to the conduct of government—a snubbing post to which all craft, pirate and merchantman, tie up alike. Is he honest? —yes.

The last of the biographies written by Lewis, An American Patrician, the Story of Aaron Burr, appeared in 1908. The style is florid indeed, with a great deal of imagined dialogue, few dates, almost no documentation, though some of the letters are no doubt authentic; I am not historian enough to know. I do not think any man could truthfully call this work judiciously objective; there is little doubt that the sympathies of the author lie with Burr, not only as against Hamilton but also against Washington; no question whatever but that Burr is the hero, though patrician seems strange terminology to apply to the son of a preacher, to the eventual first leader of Tammany Hall. For all its extravagance, the text, especially the dialogue, does have a sense of character, of dramatic tension; one wonders whether Lewis himself might not have had the stage in mind in some scenes, for example, of verbal fencing between Burr, Washington, Israel Putnam. To sum up: for the researcher in American Studies, the political writing of Lewis would afford, I surmise, a wealth of material, raw ore, a crude but fascinating combination of post-Populist, Bullmoose-progressive, and proto-Fascist elements.

His first book, Wolfville, was published by Stokes in 1897 and went into at least fourteen printings. The author presents the doings of this Arizona polis as they are recalled and recounted by the Old Cattleman, septuagenarian, bachelor, now retired, living comfortably, with some personal attendants, we are not told exactly where in the East or South, some place like Saratoga or White Sulphur Springs, comfortable, not too fashionably gaudy, with wide verandas and spacious private cottages. We very soon come to know Wolfville's leading citizens, Sam Enright, alcalde; Jack Moore, kettle tender to the Stranglers; Doc Peets, the most educated sharp in Arizona; Cherokee Hall, who presides over the games of chance; Texas Thompson, whose wife sold up his cattle at public vendue for her alimony; Dan Boggs; Dave Tutt; Col. William Greene Sterret, editor and publisher of the Wolfville Daily Coyote, is introduced in a later volume. High in the councils also are a few estimable females; Faro Nell, who serves as lookout for Cherokee Hall; Tucson Jennie, spouse of Dave Tutt; Mrs. Rucker, who operates the O. K. Restaurant, henpecking her spouse, that most surly Boniface, into taking refuge among the Indians. There are also lesser characters in permanent residence (if any residence, where there is so much gunplay, can be called permanent)—Old Monte, who drives the stage; Huggins, his closest rival as a drunkard; Black Jack, who tends bar in the Red Light Saloon; Hamilton, who runs the Dance Hall. There are many transients, the Stinging Lizard, Jaybird Bob, Pinon Bill, Crawfish Jim, The Man from Red Dog, The Man from Yellowhouse, as well as miners, cowboys, et al., so listed on the playbill of the Broad Street Theatre production written by Clyde Fitch and Willis Steele and presented in October of 1905.

In Sandburrs, published in 1900 by Stokes, with George Luks as one of the illustrators, Lewis has broadened his field to include the New York underworld; some of the stories are told straight, some, the more preposterous, are ascribed to the Office Boy; some, mainly those from the Annals of the Bend, are recounted by one Chucky in a dreadful dese-and-dose patois. The Old Cattleman has the floor on other occasions in this volume, as the Wolfville stories continue; these are far and away the best narratives, though Lewis tried once more, in the Black Lion Inn stories (published by Russell in 1903), to provide his best narrator with some competition from fellow guests at that snow-bound hostel, The Jolly Doctor, the Red-Nosed Gentleman, The Sour Gentleman and Sioux Sam; again The Old Cattleman wins hands down. Some of the tales in this collection may have been leftovers from Wolfville Days and Wolfville Nights, published, by both Stokes and Grosset and Dunlap, in the same year, 1902.

These stories assay a high percentage of violence; some of the humor depends on crude, if not cruel, practical joking; killing by gunfire, and lynching by the rope, are commonplaces of existence, or the termination thereof. Yet, so the Old Cattleman insists, Wolfville, compared with an Eastern metropolis, is a model of serene and lawful composure, and for this point of view there is something to be said.

The Frontier is not exactly the gentlest of places. Wolfville is xenophobe, but whether the phrase fear of the stranger is to be construed as containing an objective or a subjective genitive depends a good deal on who is the xenos, the white man, or the Mexican or the Indian. Which is the racial minority? Here the Negro, except the Buffalo soldier who may have deserted from the U.S. Cavalry, is virtually unknown; the Chinese is regarded with both affection and disdain as a worthy but inconsequential menial; the Indian and the Mexican are low-down, dangerous, untrustworthy varmints, whose speedy extermination is looked upon as more than a desideratum. Yet there is a good deal of ambivalence in the Old Cattleman's attitude here, for in almost every story in which Indian or Mexican figures as the principal actor, he is presented as a personage of dignity, bravery, high honor according to his code (which differs, to be sure, from the white man's) of gentleness, wisdom, humor.

An occasional coward crops up, but Wolfville is not a locale where the cult of the anti-hero is rife. The virtues are those of the epic; first and foremost, physical courage. And what else? Teaching the Iliad to college freshmen taking required humanities courses, I have found them pathetically at a loss when I ask this question. "Pride?," some bolder spirit will suggest, with interrogative diffidence. (This usually begets a digression into the difference between pride and arrogance, or an attempt to define what is meant by conceit.) And—? (Silence.) Thrift? A desire for security? Altruism? (Embarrassed dead end.) I give up, and tell them the answers, though my statements still take the form of questions, now rhetorical—what about courtesy? generosity? hospitality? absolute inviolability of an honor code? humor? (Sir, is humor heroic?), magnanimity (as distinguished from Forgive your enemies, or Turn the other cheek), zest, gusto, delight in living? That blessed infant, Enright Peets Tutt, at the age of 8, would have less trouble with such queries; Enright would know. He'd know better.

"To judge a poem or piece of prose," wrote Robert Frost in the days of his gathering power and confidence, "you go the same way to work—apply the one test—greatest test. You listen for the sentence sounds. If you find some of those not bookish, caught fresh from the mouths of people, some of them striking, all of them definite and recognizable, so recognizable that with a little trouble you can place them and even name them, you know you have found a writer." Exactly. Or, as almost any Wolfville citizen would put it, "That's whatever!" But this does not mean that the sentence has to be sub-Wordsworthian in tone, or in some of Frost's own muted and suggestive cadences. No; there is a place also for the gorgeous, the hyperbolic, the rhetoric of "Look, the morn in russet mantle clad," of "the multitudinous seas incarnadine," where true to life does not mean stenographic accuracy of transcript, but where faith is kept with life in the sense of liveliness, élan, panache, vigor, gusto, zest, vitality. It is by this above all that you know you have found a writer when you have found Lewis. Take, for example, some lines from the story about "The Dismissal of Silver Phil," in Wolfville Nights. This felon, by some extraordinary perversion of Arizona justice, has actually been tried by a jury.

> Dooms slow an' shiftless as they shore be, at the wind-up Silver Phil's found guilty, an' is put in nom'nation by the presidin' alcalde to be hanged; the time bein' set in a crazy-hoss fashion for a month away. As Silver Phil—which he's that bad an' hard he comes mighty clost to bein' game—is leavin' the co't-room with the marshal who's ridin' herd on him, he says:
> "I ain't payin' much attention at the time,"—Silver Phil's talkin' to that marshal gent,—"bein' I'm thinkin' of something else, but do I understand that old grey sport on the bench to say you-all is to hang me next month?"
> "That's whatever!" assents this marshal gent, "an' you can gamble a bloo stack that hangin' you is a bet we ain't none likely to overlook. Which we're out to put our whole grateful souls into the dooty."
>
> "Now I thinks of it," observes Silver Phil, "I'm some averse to bein' hanged. I reckons, speakin' free an' free as between fellow sports, that in order for that execootion to be a blindin' success I'll have to be thar personal?"
> "It's one of the mighty few o'casions," responds the marshal, "when

Or hear the Old Cattleman talking about Huggins, who fomented the great Wolfville strike of the printers against Col. William Greene Sterret's Daily Coyote (Wolfville Days)—

> But speakin' of this Huggins party, I never likes him. Aside from his bein' mostly drunk, which, no matter what some may say or think, I holds impairs a gent's valyoo as a social factor, Huggins is avaricious an' dotes on money to the p'int of bein' sordid. Or Sam Enright rebuking Boggs for his impulsive qualities:

> "Dan," says Enright, "when I reflects on the hole we drug you out of, an' the way you-all gets in, you reminds me of that Thomas Benton dog I owns when I'm a yoothful child on the Cumberland. Which Thomas Benton that a-away is a mighty industrious dog and would turn over a quarter-section of land any afternoon diggin' out a ground-hawg. But thar's this drawback to Thomas Benton which impairs his market valyoo. Some folks used to regyard it as a foible; but it's worse, it's a deefect. As I remarks, this Thomas Benton dog would throw his whole soul into the work, an' dig for a ground-hawg like he ain't got another dollar. But thar's this pecooliarity: After that Thomas Benton dog has done dug out the ground-hawg for a couple of hours, you all is forced to get a spade an' dig out that Thomas Benton dog. He's dead now these yere forty years, but if he's livin' I'd shore change his name an' rebrand him 'Dan'l Boggs.' "

The same method can be used more aphoristically; Col. William Greene Sterret remarks of his brother Jeff: "Jeff's reedic'lous fond of fishin'; which he'd sooner fish than read Paradise Lost." And of his grandfather, who liked his liquor more than somewhat: "I can remember how on them impressif occasions, I would stand an' look at him. I'd think to myse'f—I was mebby eight at the time—'He's ondoubted the greatest man on earth, but my! how blurred he is!' " Dan Boggs has comment, along somewhat similar lines, of his father's demeanor in the War between the States:

> My old pap is a colonel with Gen'ral Price, an' on this evenin' is engaged in leadin' one of the most intrepid retreats of the war. As he's prancin' along at the head of his men where a great commander belongs, he's shore scandalized by hearin' his r'ar gyard firin' on the Yanks. So he rides back, my old pap does, an' he says: "Yere, you-all eediots! Whatever do you mean by shootin' at them Yankees? Don't you know it only makes 'em madder?"

How good is the Lewis ear? This is hard to say; the foregoing should certainly have established something about his imaginative use of rhetoric, and it is possible that a trained phonetician could form deductions as to the accuracy of the dialect. I note a tendency for some consonants to be dropped, for some vowels to be lengthened, but this may be simply a concession to the convention of the time, when a phonetic spelling, and a solecistic grammar, were regyarded as mighty yoomerous; Mark Twain, at times; Mr. Dooley; Bre'r Remus—to say nothing of a host of lesser men—illustrate the point. This does bother the reader somewhat, so that he delays over words rather than goes along with the flow, the run, of the sentences; it is easy to miss the splendors of the epithet if you have to say a word out loud to yourself before you can sense what it means.

I might point out that the vocabulary has tremendous range, somewhat at the risk of inconsistency; for Dan Boggs, who can neither read nor write, makes use of the same vocabulary, grammar, sentence structure, as does Doc Peets, the most eddicated sharp in Arizona. Natural enough, I suppose, since all the narration comes to us through the Old Cattleman, sometimes at third, or even fourth, remove; quotes within quotes within quotes are not at all uncommon. It makes us listen for the sentence sounds, not isolated, but in the narrative context, with the yarn spinners digressing, as yarn spinners do, and telling stories within stories within stories. The same treatment, without the phonetic aspects, exists in the Metamorphoses of Ovid and, for that matter, the Iliad of Homer. Also, probably, if the whole truth were known, in literature as much prior to Homer as Homer is to us.

In Wolfville Folks, which appeared with the imprint of D. Appleton & Co., in 1908, Lewis varies his method slightly; chapter and yarn no longer correspond exactly, but one tale will run through two or three chapters, the culminating incident, usually, to illustrate some prior discussion or philosophical argument among the leading citizens. Some of the stories are retold from earlier versions, and improved; on the other hand, there begins to be a considerable amount of self-repetition, the bold similies become clichés, the blind dog gropes too often in the meat shop, the pan of milk comes fluttering too many times from the top shelf, Texas Thompson insists too many times on the injustices perpetrated by that divorced helpmeet of his in Laredo, Boggs overasserts the sagacity of Doc Peets.

Lewis' great achievement—in my own opinion, a much more substantial contribution than that of Bret Harte—is that he has created, with no tremendous strain on our willing suspension of disbelief, a town, its people, their language, larger than life, to be sure, but hardy, vigorous and delightful. Poetic, also, if one accepts the definition of poetry as being memorable speech; these cadences lend themselves very readily to ear and voice. Which my brother and I to this day converse in Wolfvillese on mighty slight provocation, and have done so, off and on, for close to five decades. Let me suggest, by way of close, that some publisher might do very much worse than reissue at least some of the Wolfville yarns, a selection as viable as anything we have in the area of tall-tale Americana; and that, likewise, such establishments as care for the spoken word, perpetuate, on disk or tape, before it is too late, the voice of the Old Cattleman.

MUSIC

Benjamin Boretz

The lessons to be learned from the Hamburg State Opera's performances at the Metropolitan Opera House during the Lincoln Center Festival '67 are those of repertory and discipline rather than of conception or execution. For the repertorial choices were obvious under the circumstances: three core classics of the 20th-century literature (Berg's Lulu, Hindemith's Mathis der Maler, Stravinsky's The Rake's Progress), two works of particular relevance to a German company (Janacek's Jenufa, a classic in German-speaking countries, and Jacobovsky and the Colonel, a recent work by the young German composer Giselher Klebe) and an American opera originally commissioned and performed by the company (Gunther Schuller's The Visitation). The point is that such programing need never in itself be "imaginative"; all that is required is a minimal awareness of the appropriate literature (and the awareness of Rolf Liebermann, a sophisticated composer who is the director of the company, is considerably beyond such trivial boundaries). It is certain that no major opera company in the world would have missed the extraordinary opportunity to give first New York performances of Lulu and Mathis, to one-up the Metropolitan's notorious single production of The Rake, or—perhaps the greatest gamesmanship of all—to give the local (and American) première of a work by one of our own most prestigious advanced composers.

All this could have been noted immediately upon the announcement of the repertory. But the real irony of the affair was that in every production I attended (all but Jenufa and Jacobovsky), it was obvious that the Metropolitan's own company could have presented considerably superior performances of these very works, that, in fact, the ability of the Hamburg company to perform them had nothing to do with any notable artistic capacity but merely demonstrated that a reasonably professional company, of even such minimal resources by comparison with those of the Metropolitan megalith, could do so simply by an act of decision and discipline.

In particular, neither the little theatre-pit orchestra imported with the company, nor its conductor, Leopold Ludwig, was more adequate to the demands of the scores than any other routine German opera-house ensemble; which is to say, quite inadequate to reproduce more than a skeletal semblance even of the surface involved, with no hint of the sonic depths of any of the nuances, and with an amount of sloppy playing (more in attack, rhythm and tone quality than in actual "pitch") that would not be tolerated by most professional American orchestras. The comparisons that one was constantly impelled to make with the extraordinary performance last season by the Metropolitan's own orchestra, under Karl Böhm, of a work of comparable difficulty, Strauss's Die Frau ohne Schatten, were truly disheartening. Even in the musically best of the Hamburg performances, The Rake, there was a notable raggedness of ensemble, deadness of sonority and—perhaps revealing as sources of the foregoing—an incompetence of solo playing that seemed particularly forlorn under the officially conspicuous circumstances and in the grandiose surroundings.

Paradoxically, another effect of the Hamburg performances was to vindicate, in some respects, the Metropolitan's own attitude toward the performance of such literature. For both the economics and the environmental character of the new house—like those of the old—are inescapably bound to maximally lavish productions of maximally popular works. The costs of producing any opera in the house on an appropriate scale are such that every performance must be a sellout, and the capacity of the new premises makes this requirement virtually one of mass-media appeal. The fact that even the first performances of even the certified masterpieces in the Hamburg series drew no more than a 61 per cent paid attendance (according to a normally reliable source) is a powerful counter-argument to those who would recast the Metropolitan into a responsible cultural institution.

Whether or not it is a major sociocultural pity that such a house was built with public funds in the first place—and the domination of large-scale American operatic performance by a company with the Metropolitan's attitudes thereby assured—this is nonetheless the actual situation; and no virtuous intentions will make it any the less incongruous to subject delicate and intricate works to an arena whose dedication to cultural Populism is depressingly evident in every physical detail. I, for one, will no longer feel compelled to demand reform from the Metropolitan.

Other aspects of the Hamburg performances were interesting in these multiple respects as well. Thus, the small scale of both the sights and sounds of all the productions (reflecting not only limitations of performances but also the size of the house for which they were designed) was devastating visually but surprisingly less so vocally, even though some of the voices were of almost sub-operatic proportions. This may be partly due to the undeniably superior (though highly variable) acoustics of the hall; but it also indicates that judicious vocal-instrumental balance and, especially, accurate pitch production is more important for generating audibility and intelligibility than the usual reliance on vocal volume and mannerism. And in general, it was quite true that the singing of the Hamburg company was far more disciplined and at least literally accurate than is usually the case in local operatic performances; moreover, this discipline extended to some of the operatic acting, normally a rather marginal activity. As a result, a quite few distinguished realizations of individual roles emerged in several of the operas. And, significantly, some of these were by young American singers "expatriated" to European companies by the Metropolitan's cannibalistic "star" system.

But again, even though the stage discipline tended to be high, its execution was often rather routine, and overall it gave signs of no remarkable directorial concepts. The Schuller Visitation suffered most cruelly from Gunther Rennert's unimaginative eclecticism, borrowing clichés from old American-scene movies of the thirties and from routine melodramatic theatre just where originality of conception, projection and—especially—timing were most crucially needed. The production of Lulu, marred by the far more fundamental disabilities noted below, was also so perfunctory in its casual one-set amalgam of circus-ring and bourgeois apartment, and its unkeyed direction of movement, that it succeeded in projecting the Berg-Wedekind high Expressionistic verbal, dramatic and musical continuity into a soap-operatic nonchalance. Even The Rake's Progress, the most relevant and integral production (directed by Gian-Carlo Menotti), suffered from incessant "business" hostile to the self-contained efficiency of the textual-musical conjunction, and adding the distraction of a broad visual gag just in time to obscure a musical-verbal one of much more elevated wit, or frantic side-show activity just when concentration on words and music was most appropriate.

As far as the individual productions are concerned, space precludes more than an encapsulated summary of some notable features.

Mathis der Maler: Although perhaps it is ultimately a victim of Hindemith's characteristic substitution of musical and dramatic earnestness and external "significance" for genuine music-dramatic ideas, with its consequent "talky" neutrality and static solemnity, Mathis nevertheless has an impressive total integrity and seriousness that could scarcely survive the irresponsible elision, in the present production, of a major portion of the work, colorless orchestral sonority, and the generally undistinguished vocalism and direction.

The Rake's Progress: This was the most distinguished of the Hamburg performances. In particular, Loren Driscoll was as musically and dramatically accomplished a Tom as he appeared to be on the recent Columbia recording, Tatiana Troyanos was a remarkable Baba, and Arlene Saunders was an accurate and delicate Ann, though her inflective range was rather small. The principal vocal difficulty was Tom Krause's Shadow, whose pitch uncertainty and verbal obscurity were in contrast even to the peripheral roles.

Lulu: The serious misrepresentation of this work in its first New York performance was an act of regrettable irresponsibility on the part of the Hamburg company. For now that the existence of a virtually complete and easily realizable third act for Lulu (left unfinished by Berg) has been made public by George Perle and others, it was astonishing to find the Hamburg Opera still offering the absurd "expedient" of an orchestral movement interspersed with vocal fragments (an absurdity heightened by slides with verbal legends summarizing the plot). Even more inexplicable was the absence of any indication in the program or on stage that this was anything but a complete performance, or even that the work was not intended by Berg for performance precisely in this way—which could only indicate to an uninformed audience that Berg's superb dramatic capacities, evident everywhere in the first two acts, had suddenly disappeared for the conclusion. Almost as irresponsible was the substitution of a series of silly (and devastatingly continuity-breaking) slides and titles in the second act for the film explicitly required and described in minuscule detail in the score. In other respects, the performance suffered more than others from the general orchestral and conductorial shortcomings, but the vocal performances, including those of the most minor roles, were surprisingly adequate even where Berg's procedure of "simultaneous characterization" of a multiplicity of parts presented the most formidable problems. The intense, wholly physical imagery of the opera required more maturity and subtlety than Anneliese Rothenberg's excessively kittenish Lulu conveyed, but her representation of the vocal line was otherwise quite competent.

The Visitation: A new work of major proportions and implications, The Visitation will require far more than this manifestly tentative first production to be adequately perceived. At first encounter, it appears to be an extraordinary attempt at a synthesis of several of the significant 20th-century confluences of music and theatre—of the American "operatic" social verismo of works like the Weill-Rice Street Scene, and the popular-music into serious-theatre manner of the earlier Brecht-Weill works and Porgy and Bess, with the syntax and surface of works like Berg's Wozzeck. This intention is signaled by the libretto, a realization of Kafka's The Trial in terms of American Negro repression; and the Wozzeck parallel is evident both in the "character-and-situation sketch" aspect of the scenes of the first act, and in specific details of musical gesture from the figurational level to the darkened-stage orchestral interlude just before the banal music-accompanied final scene (a children's song in Wozzeck, a New Orleans street funeral dirge in The Visitation). Indeed, this latter conjunction seems almost an explicit allusion, as well as an ingenious climactic clue to the "hidden" signification of the drama.

The principal apparent obstacles in the work itself to the realization of this extraordinary idea were some verbal infelicities in the text, as well as the fragmentary character of some of the dramatic and musical developments. But this impression was particularly difficult to confirm in the present production, whose timing, both of action and scene change (seriously flawed by the mechanical failure of the Metropolitan's turntable) was obviously erratic, and whose performances (especially by McHenry Boatwright in the principal role of Carver Jones) seemed insecurely sung and acted as caricature.

Forewarned Is Forearmed

Tomorrow's top news story need not catch you unprepared. Time and again, The Nation has called attention to coming events well before they happened. Two examples: On November 19, 1960, we carried a story about the impending Bay of Pigs disaster, which actually occurred six months later. On March 27 of this year, we warned of the coming coup in Greece, four weeks before it hit the headlines. What Nation subscribers are reading this week is giving them a "sneak preview" of some of the front page news of next month, or next year. Why not join this group of alert and forewarned citizens?

Land Between the Lakes

Knoxville, Tenn.

Dear Sirs: I am surprised and shocked that The Nation, in John Egerton's article, "TVA: The Halo Slips" [July 3], should lend itself as a vehicle for land speculators and promoters seeking to capture for their personal benefit values created entirely with public funds.

TVA's "Land Between the Lakes" is a bold and imaginative plan to utilize a historically undeveloped and depressed land area, isolated by two man-made reservoirs, to create a recreation-conservation-education facility unique in the nation. The concept has been highly praised by various experts in this field who have studied the plans and visited the limited operation now under way. . . .

The reluctance of the average property owner to leave his home to make way for public improvements is understandable. The property owners that Mr. Egerton depicts as heroically resisting the intrusion of government, however, are those who sought to make quick killings with the inflated value of land in the midst of a publicly financed project. If The Nation seeks to support their cause, it should have been frank enough to further identify Mr. Egerton as the son-in-law of George Bleidt, one of the real estate promoters who have fought the hardest to retain the right to secure windfall profits on 440 acres of land he and his wife own in the middle of the project. Mr. Egerton himself owns tracts in the area totaling 130 acres which he did not purchase until after the project had been announced. . . .

Frank E. Smith
Director, Tennessee Valley Authority

Nashville, Tenn.

Dear Sirs: I have not tried to conceal my personal involvement in the Between-the-Lakes controversy from anyone. It seems to me that Mr. Smith's complaint is beside the point. The central issue is whether or not the story is accurate; I believe that it is, and I am willing to defend it. In gathering my information I interviewed Mr. Milliken in person and Mr. Smith by phone; they stated their case, and I reported it. I also interviewed, and subsequently quoted, some of the area residents (but not my father-in-law). I believe my story is a fair and accurate account of TVA's handling of the project. It will be interesting to see what other specific complaints Mr. Smith raises; if they are more directly relevant to the contents of the story itself, I would welcome and appreciate the opportunity to answer them.

The Big Issue

Over the years since 1945, the Executive has steadily encroached on the powers of Congress in the area of foreign policy and the use of the armed forces. This has not been entirely a matter of Presidential usurpation. Changes in military technique have played a part, as have the hazards growing out of the cold war. A primary factor has been default in exercising responsibility by both the House and the Senate. Even while the Senate is preparing to reassert itself, only three members (Gruening, Morse, and Stephen M. Young) voted against the $70.1 billion defense appropriation bill, to which will be added further undetermined costs of the Vietnamese War. The most emphatic legislative protest against the war would be to refuse to continue to finance it, but only three Senators, against eighty-five, were willing to brave the accusation of "letting down our boys."

Nevertheless, the Senate now shows readiness to react against what amounts to Executive dictatorship in initiating and carrying on wars without leave of Congress. The tentatively successful fight to curb the Pentagon's arms peddling through the Export-Import Bank, the Congressional outcry over the Administration's dispatching of transport aircraft to the Congo last month to support the Mobutu government, and the present embittered discussion of the Tonkin Gulf resolution, are indications that the legislative worm is beginning to turn. If it chooses, it need not be a worm at all.

Mr. Johnson, through his mouthpiece, Nicholas de B. Katzenbach, has probably overplayed his hand. Mr. Katzenbach told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that when Congress passed the Tonkin Gulf resolution in August, 1964, it had authorized the President "to use the armed forces of the United States in whatever way was necessary." Sen. Albert Gore demurred—did then the resolution authorize war with China? Katzenbach retorted, without naming China, that the resolution did have that force. ". . . in the course of that authorization," he maintained, "there can be risks, there can be risks taken. Other people could be involved. You could have that situation arise."

Many Senators now feel that they were dragooned into supporting the Tonkin declaration—as indeed they were, but as much through their own qualms as through the President's aggressiveness. They were not pleased to hear that if the present bombing operations on the border between North Vietnam and China result in war between the United States and China, or if such a war should break out through some future military probing by our armed forces, they would be held to have acquiesced by a hurriedly passed declaration now three years old. They were brought face to face with what Sen. Eugene McCarthy calls a "prescription for dictatorship" on a four-year basis with Congress having no right to interfere with anything that the President, as Commander in Chief of the armed forces, feels like having them do. As if to rub salt into the wounds, Katzenbach chose to testify with heat, bordering on arrogance; the usual amenities of discussion in a Foreign Relations Committee hearing were quite discarded.

Nor has Mr. Johnson done anything personally to cool things down. On the contrary, at his press conference of August 18 he challenged Congress to withdraw the Tonkin resolution if it felt that the Administration had acted unwisely or improperly. This is much like a man who has endorsed another man's note being told by the borrower (who has squandered the money) that he can rescind the endorsement. It is like the other remedy—impeachment of the President—which exists only in theory.

Nevertheless, with the mood now welling up in the Senate, there are indications of a determined effort to put some restraint on Mr. Johnson's war-minded Administration. Pending before the Senate is Senator Fulbright's resolution, which in effect complains that the President is overcommitting the United States militarily and neglecting opportunities to make peace in Vietnam. The resolution would have no substantive effect, but it would constitute a strong, formal criticism of the procedures under which foreign policy is currently made. Some Senators feel that the Fulbright remonstrance may pick up as many as thirty-five or forty votes. If so, wavering Senators may come out more strongly against the present embroilment in Southeast Asia.

If only supine resistance is offered, a de facto dictatorship may be in the offing—if it is not here already. An American dictatorship need not follow the European pattern, with salutes, slogans and enormous assemblages of fanatics. But it can be just as lethal to democracy.

Pentagon Euphoria

One of the most dangerous aspects of the present situation in Southeast Asia is the Pentagon's idiotic reaction to the "silence" in Peking. By what computerized intelligence does the Pentagon know that at some level of provocation Peking will not intervene? The same euphoria, the same confidence, prevailed on another occasion—in Korea. In that episode a very experienced field commander proved to be badly mistaken in his judgment of Chinese intentions. Is there any reason to believe that lesser men are wiser or more perceptive?

Those who know something about China are deeply impressed by Chinese scientific and technological achievements. The notion that the internal turmoil in China has somehow incapacitated the Chinese military is a dogma that needs to be closely examined. It now rests on assumptions and impressions that may prove to be misleading. In the meantime, the Pentagon's jaunty confidence builds up hawkish sentiment in Congress. A Pentagon spokesman recently said that the situation in Vietnam had "the smell of success" to him. In most comment from responsible reporters in the field, it has the smell of defeat, in the sense of stalemate which all America's military power cannot overcome.

The net effect, so far, of the decision to move bombing to a distance of 10 miles from the Chinese border, from 25 miles previously, is the loss of two more U.S. aircraft and three pilots dead, with a fourth in Chinese hands. This is a stupid and callous waste of manpower. The aircraft, unarmed, single-engine Intruders from the carrier Constellation, were carrying heavy bomb loads, perhaps the maximum of 18,000 pounds apiece. Their best speed is 650 mph. This means that neither in maneuverability nor speed can they match MIG interceptors, yet a single minute of flight may take them through the 10-mile border zone and into China. It is a prescription for trouble for the pilots and whatever may result from border violations. If the Pentagon's clairvoyance regarding Chinese intentions is no better than this kind of mission planning, the odds against war between the United States and China are shortening.

One Nervous Victory

One reason the Senate doves are so ineffective is that they are such ad hoc birds. Today they are antimilitarists; tomorrow they aren't. As a group they show very little courage and not much more consistency. Witness their fluttering confusion in the debate over whether to permit the Pentagon to use the Export-Import Bank for selling arms to underdeveloped nations via secret loans. An amendment blocking such sales was opposed by ten or so Senators—the likes of Hart, Hartke, Robert Kennedy, and McCarthy—who, on the subject of Vietnam, take the soft line. With their vote, the amendment would have passed.

To kill the amendment, the Administration had put around the rumor that if it passed, this nation would not be able to sell arms to Israel (ignoring the fact that under the Pentagon-Exim Bank arrangement, as it presently exists, we have sold three times more arms to Arabs than we have to Jews). Wayward doves refused to understand that the amendment would have absolutely no effect on Israel, whose average annual income of $1,000 hardly groups it with the Latin American countries, where per capita income drops to $200. It took a week of cloakroom argument by relatively steadfast peacemakers such as Clark and Morse to persuade the dove defectors that, as Morse put it, "the Administration is throwing the word 'Israel' around to do an erroneous propaganda job."

Fortunately, when essentially the same question that was raised on the Exim Bank bill came up again on the Foreign Aid bill, nearly all the doves had been coaxed into returning to the peaceful side, and the Pentagon's arms traffic with poor countries was voted down.

Chalk up one nervous victory. But what about next time? Why, for instance, is Senator Clark getting support only from Ohio's courageous old man, Stephen Young, in his fight to keep the Pentagon from embarking on the useless deployment of the Nike X anti-ballistic missile system which Secretary McNamara says will cost the country $40 billion? For more than a year Clark has struggled privately to get Robert Kennedy to join him in opposing this Pentagon madness, but Kennedy refuses to do so. Most of the other doves are just as reluctant.

It is, of course, a politically dangerous position for Clark or any other Senator to take. It puts him in a head-to-head tussle with the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and he is handicapped in marshaling his argument against the anti-missile system because most of the information is classified. Even more important, it throws Clark up against the powerful NASA contractors, who are frantically seeking a new boondoggle outlet now that the moonshot is losing its appeal. They can't turn to building more offensive nuclear missiles, because the country has more than enough of those already, so the contractors want the anti-missile system begun, and, with the Pentagon on their side, they are stopped only by the budget for Vietnam. Once the Asian budget can be reduced, they will be off and running—and heaven help the politicians who try to stand in their way.

So far only Clark and Young have shown any willingness to do so. Out of a 100-man Senate, that is a mighty small flock of consistent doves.

Dealing Out The Poor

Probably the most repressive social-welfare legislation in thirty years is now before the Congress. The House has passed by a vote of 415 to 3 a series of amendments to the Social Security bill designed to deal with the rising public-assistance rolls.

The new provisions include the following: a freeze on the federal reimbursements to the Aid to Dependent Children program based upon the proportion of poor children who received assistance in January, 1967; a cut-off of federally reimbursed relief for adults over 16, including mothers with small children, who refuse to accept work or training; a cut-off of any welfare assistance to individuals receiving unemployment insurance, no matter how little; and a cut-off of assistance to men who have not shown substantial participation in the work force (i.e., who have not been employed for a year and a half out of the last three years).

Suggestive of the moral sentiments which inform this legislation is a provision which requires states to establish programs to track down fathers, "using all laws applicable to obtain support for children. . . ."

Moderates are confused by some alleged welfare rehabilitational measures included in the bill, such as federal reimbursements for day-care centers, and provisions for work incentives to recipients which would allow them to keep a portion of their earnings. While in themselves these measures are desirable, they pale beside the enormity of the proposed repressions, which no doubt they are intended to make more palatable.

The new "reforms" are clearly designed to deal with rising welfare rolls. The rolls are, in fact, rising because of the mass migration of poor black people to the cities, where welfare practices are somewhat less restrictive than in the rural South. Minor gains in welfare notwithstanding, the movement of so many poor nonwhites to the cities has not relieved their suffering, as the riots show, but it is spawning a wide range of repressive measures like the present legislation. Cutting already meager welfare benefits is certain to bring more suffering, and the wisdom of such measures now is certainly doubtful.

Student Power at College Park

College Park, Md.

The New Left delegates wanted to talk about their entanglement with the Central Intelligence Agency—and with the government in general—but a majority of the 1,300-odd delegates to the National Student Association's 20th Congress (August 13-26) dispensed with that subject almost immediately. After a few perfunctory speeches by the officers, who overplayed their loss of innocence to the point of dullness, the student leaders got down to business in the University of Maryland's cavernous Reckord Armory. The radicals continued to tell them that NSA was "undemocratic" and "unrepresentative," and that it should be replaced by a student union with direct dues-paying members. But the delegates rejected even most of the mild internal reforms suggested by the officers. They were much more interested in turning outward—to the campuses.

For the first time in NSA's history, in fact, they began dealing with the issues on which the organization can take meaningful action. NSA Congresses in the past have voted through policy stands on a plethora of issues ranging from Vietnam to the draft. This year, the delegates urged that NSA back those judgments with programs that involve students on a large scale. They reduced the number of issues to be considered and emphasized the mandates.

The subject of greatest concern was "student power": the role of the students in running the university. The delegates passed almost unanimously a strong resolution that demanded total authority over rules on housing, student activities, visiting hours in dormitories and other matters of "solely student concern." The resolution urged the faculties and administrations to give them "joint control" over grading systems, policies on administrations and financial aid, hiring and dismissal of faculty, course requirements and curriculum reform. And it provided for a legal aid fund to finance challenges in the courts.

In an anti-draft resolution, the students voted to "organize and support resistance" to Selective Service with an ambitious program of legal aid, counseling and fund raising on member and nonmember campuses. On "black power," they urged "unification" of all blacks in America entirely by their own leadership, and liberation "by any means necessary." Many of the liberals objected to these last four words because they appeared to condone, as one put it, "any sort of violence, any sort of insurrection." But the Negro delegates, an estimated fifty of the 1,200 delegates, persuaded the Congress that the words would mean violence only if white society failed to meet the needs of the ghetto. After a threatened "black walkout" and a bitter debate, the resolution passed intact. It urged the whites to "educate" middle-class white communities, organize poor whites, and explain the concept of black power to their fellow white students.

By the end of the legislative plenary sessions, most of the delegates were no longer worried by the question of "representativeness." They believed—probably quite correctly—that most of their contemporaries on campus were apathetic and apolitical, and very little concerned with being "represented" on such matters. NSA's role would not be to express the thinking of students, but rather to spur and lead it. The CIA publicity, they contended, had strengthened the organization because it had allowed NSA to break clearly with the agency and, as NSA vice president Richard Stearns put it, "any publicity is good publicity." Since February the organization has attracted sixty new member schools and has lost only one, pushing its total school membership to 334. NSA would have to mobilize students, as NSA president W. Eugene Groves said, "for specific interest."

Spurred by their concern with Vietnam, the students were asking more and more radical questions—not just about the institutions of the university but the institutions of the entire society. Few, of course, were giving radical answers or calling for the wholesale demolition of those institutions. But most were intensely concerned with the unresponsiveness of power holders to the will of the people. A University of Illinois senior, who termed himself a "conservative," criticized the inability of Congress and "ordinary citizens" to control foreign policy. A Notre Dame junior noted the possibility that "private enterprise" must be "making profits" off the war. And many of the delegates wondered out loud—almost in spite of themselves—whether the institutions could survive.

RICHARD BLUMENTHAL

Deutscher and Zilliacus

The cause of sanity in the affairs of nations received a grievous setback in the deaths of Konni Zilliacus and Isaac Deutscher. "Zilly," Philip Noel-Baker wrote in his eulogy in the London Tribune, was "multifariously unique," even in his name and ancestry. The name was Greek but Zilliacus had only a tiny admixture of Greek blood: his father was a Finnish revolutionary against the Czar, his mother was American, the son was educated in primary schools in Sweden, Finland and Brooklyn, and graduated from Yale at the top of the class of 1915. He flew in the Royal Flying Corps in World War I and was grounded by the General Staff because he spoke ten or a dozen languages fluently and there was use for him in a military-diplomatic capacity. Russian was one of his languages and in 1917 he was attached to the British military mission to the counter-revolutionary Admiral Kolchak, and Zilliacus' revulsion from that was one of the factors that brought him into the Labour Party and the House of Commons, of which he was perhaps the stormiest member over many years. He was one of the leading supporters of the League of Nations, as doughty a fighter against appeasement of Mussolini and Hitler as was Winston Churchill, and after World War II he never tired of warning the British people that the real danger came not from the Soviet Union but from the nuclear militarists of the West. The cold war went on, but when Zilliacus died The Times (of London) paid glowing tribute to his ability, courage and independence.

Independence—that was one of the traits he shared with Deutscher, the foremost authority on modern Russian life and history, the author of the only really informative biographies of Stalin and Trotsky. His book on Lenin he did not live to finish. He was no friend of Stalin's—in 1932 he was expelled from the Polish Communist Party for anti-Stalinist activities—but, characteristically, his 1949 work on Stalin was coolly detached. At this time, and throughout his life, Isaac Deutscher refused to allow the animosities of politics to color his writing.

Kentucky's Coal Beds of Sedition

PAUL GOOD

Mr. Good is a free-lance writer who specializes in reporting on civil rights and related events in the North and South.

Hazard, Ky.

Tourists driving mountain roads in Eastern Kentucky's Pike County see billboards picturing a proud mare and foal gamboling in blue grass with the slogan: "Kentucky—Great for Family Vacations." It's a lovely image. But in recent weeks some ugly Kentucky realities have come to the fore in that vacation paradise where 40 per cent of the nation's one-room schools are found and children have the highest TB rate in the nation. It was in Pike County on August 11 that three anti-poverty workers—one an Appalachian Volunteer—were arrested on sedition charges. Underlying the arrests is a story of the cruellest white poverty, of rapacious coal-mine operators, and of right-wing politicians whose shopworn smear tactics would be laughable if they weren't so effective.

So effective that on August 18 OEO Director Sargent Shriver cut off all funds to Appalachian Volunteers in Kentucky. AV has received funds from such respectable sources as the Field Foundation, but depends heavily on OEO money for training hundreds of VISTA workers who assist Kentucky's legions of poor. Shriver, in a craven display of instant capitulation to the growing forces of reaction, canceled funds without any hearing and without even notifying AV head Milton Ogle in Bristol, Tenn., that action was being taken.

Ogle, an unradical Kentuckian, protested unavailingly that volunteer Joe Mulloy wasn't guilty of sedition or anything else. But neither Shriver nor his office spoke to Ogle. When Shriver threw the Child Guidance Development of Mississippi Head Start program to the state's political wolves last year, he at least went through the motions of an investigation. It is a commentary on the current Washington climate that this was thought unnecessary in Appalachia.

The separate midnight arrests of Mulloy and Mr. and Mrs. Alan McSurely of the Southern Conference Educational Fund (SCEF) were made by a dozen men led by Pike County prosecuting attorney Thomas Ratliff. He has long been a coal-mine lease operator and presently is the Republican candidate for lieutenant governor. His running mate, Louie Nunn, has pledged that if elected governor he would run SCEF out of the state along with other "subversives." What constitutes a subversive today in Kentucky (and possibly in Washington, to judge from Shriver's action) may be gleaned from the evidence seized from Mulloy. Ratliff described materials taken from him and the McSurelys as "a Communistic library out of this world." Mulloy's total contribution was:

Great Russian Short Stories, the poems and sayings of Mao-Tse-tung, Pushkin's short stories, Lenin's works, Catch-22 by Joseph Heller, and an account of the Berkeley Student Movement. Some of this material was on the reading list of Mulloy's political science class at the Uuniversity of Louisville. Prosecutor Ratliff left behind in Mulloy's room and did not mention The Conscience of a Conservative by B. Goldwater, John Stormer's None Dare Call It Treason, something by William Buckley, The Complete Works of Thomas Merton, the works of Carl Sandburg and Robert Frost, and two Bibles.

The chain of events behind the arrests started millions of years ago when nature formed an estimated 35 billion tons of soft coal under the lushly green hills of the Appalachian chain in Eastern Kentucky. More than half a century of mining has removed only 2 billion tons, the extraction enriching giant absentee-owned corporations like U.S. Steel, Republic Steel and Ford, while leaving the area impoverished. John L. Lewis' United Mineworkers of America unionized many Eastern Kentucky fields in the thirties and forties after violent and bloody opposition from operators. During World War II and briefly afterward, miners were among America's highest paid industrial servants. Eastern Kentucky knew sufficiency if not prosperity, while wholly dependent on the mineral version of a one-crop economy.

All those years coal operators paid the state a pittance in taxes and the counties virtually nothing, while reaping fortunes through depreciation allowances and capital gains. Kentuckian Harry Caudill, author of Night Comes to the Cumberlands, described one industry tactic in testimony before the U.S. Senate Committee on Government Operations last June:

> It is as easy to rob a little Appalachian county of its revenues as it is to rob a child of his candy. For example, an immense firm once bought a modern continuous coal mining machine . . . the machine cost $75,000 and was used by the parent firm for a few months. It was then sold to a Kentucky subsidiary for $5,000 and this amount was stated in the bill of sale. On the next assessment date the bill was produced to the Tax Commissioner. By that time the machine had depreciated for an additional six months and so its value was fixed at > $3,000. Since the county's rate was 40% of the fair market value, it entered the assessor's books at $1,200. At that time I was driving a Ford automobile bought 37 days after the (coal) machine was sold as new. I wound up with my car assessed for more than a mining machine that had cost nearly as much as a railroad locomotive.

Meanwhile, Kentucky's educational system was stagnating with counties unable to scrape up enough taxes to run the schools more than a few months of the year. State and federal funds prevented a complete breakdown, but generations were born to live and die in ignorance (nearly a quarter of all East Kentuckians over 24 cannot read or write). In the mid-fifties, overnight automation swept the hills and hollows like a plague. An industry indifferent to the plight of miners simply laid off thousands, never to be rehired. The federal government displayed no more interest than it would have had the miners been in Patagonia. The UMW, with Lewis retired, proved inept, at the very least, in seeking federal remedies and providing critically needed medical and pension benefits to destitute miners. Today it is virtually impossible to talk to an ex-miner without hearing a tale of UMW failure to honor commitments made to union veterans.

The final physical link to the August raid recalls the folk song, You Load Sixteen Tons. The miner who still owed his soul to the company store sang of Number Nine coal. This is a rich seam that runs at around 1,800 feet, mountain-top level in Eastern Kentucky. In the late fifties, strip mining was introduced to the region. Techniques and machines were developed enabling operators to gouge coal from mountainsides without burrowing underground. The operators had bought mineral rights forty and fifty years ago from farmers who sold the rights to tens of thousands of acres for a paltry 25c or 50c an acre. They had envisioned the classic shaft-mining operations underground that did not disturb farm or woodland and signed so-called "broad forms" which only barred the operator from inflicting "malicious" damage on the property. But when strip mining began in earnest, the result on the land was catastrophic. [See "Strip-Mine Morality: The Landscaping of Hell" by Wendell Berry, The Nation, January 24, 1966.]

Forty million tons of coal were stripped out of Kentucky last year. I saw part of the result in Eastern Kentucky on a recent visit to Young's Fork of Clear Creek, 10 miles north of Hazard in Knott County. Picture a green hilltop raked by a giant claw uprooting every tree, bush and blade of grass and scraping the mountain down to the bone. The displaced earth and debris tumbles down a 30-degree slope in a massive landslide onto woods and streams below. Huge tree trunks protrude like matchsticks at crazy angles from a swath of earth and rock advancing relentlessly as heavy regional rainfall churns it into a mudslide. Far below is a small farm and a once clear stream. Its sedimentation rate has increased an incredible 30 thousand times, killing fish and polluting the farm's water supply. Above on the scalped mountain head, the exposed rock bears a resemblance to the glacial striations of the Grand Canyon. But there is no grandeur.

Instead, for as far as one can see in an area snaking through two counties, is a ribbon of moonscape desolation. Mile after mile of bulldozed road runs along the eerie lip of the Number Nine seam. Here and there machines have sculptured little buttes, raw earth and rock on the sides, and on top green caps where birds still sing in the desolation, a melancholy reminder of what all the mountaintop was like before.

It is a profitable operation requiring few men. One firm in Perry County alone holds orders from TVA for $100 million. To combat the devastation that immediately despoiled water supplies and woodlands, and in its scarification of the earth not only affronted the senses but threatened economic hopes for development of tourism, mountain people organized. They formed the 1,000-member Appalachian Group to Save the Land and People, a grass-roots organization that promoted the radical idea of taxing each ton of coal taken from Kentucky before the region's patrimony vanished without a trace of native profit. The group, composed of highly American, Daniel Boone types distributed pamphlets with the following questions and answers:

Q. Doesn't strip mining employ lots of Eastern Kentuckians?

A. No. A very large strip-mining operation bringing millions of dollars of profit to the operator can be run with a handful of men. They are paid whatever the operator feels he can get away with.

Q. Doesn't strip mining help our economy in other ways?

A. No. In fact it costs the taxpayers of this state about a dollar every time a ton of coal is strip mined. That figures out to millions of dollars a year—in expensive reclamation and reforestation, in road repairs [laden coal trucks chew up highways while their overloads are winked at by county judges "sympathetic" to the operators], flood-control projects, water-pollution control. We pay the strip miners to destroy us.

Q. What will happen to Eastern Kentucky if strip mining isn't stopped?

A. In a few years, every coal-mining county will be a crisscross of shattered mountains and ruined valleys. Thousands of people will have to leave. [Letcher Co. population has gone from a peak of 44,000 to 24,000 while Leslie Co. lost half its population in ten years. General economic conditions along with strip mining are factors in this exodus.]

The Appalachian Volunteers enthusiastically assisted the Appalachian Group, perhaps exceeding Washington's concept of the limitations that should be imposed on fighting poverty with tax dollars. But strip mining in Eastern Kentucky is like laying a lash on the back of a dying man and the Volunteers felt that you had to stop new punishment while you treated old wounds. At any rate, the Appalachian Group with AV help fought against the "broad forms" which the prize-winning Louisville Courier-Journal called "a wretched document that has haunted Kentucky and brought ruin to its mountain people for long enough."

Democratic Kentucky Gov. Edward T. Breathitt agreed, although taking pains to point out that strip mining in the flatlands of Western Kentucky could be carried out with reclamation safeguards. Last year the legislature passed a reclamation bill, remindful of those Con Edison signs in New York that say, "We'll clean up and move on." The bill outlawed stripping on slopes steeper than 33 degrees and prescribed mild penalties for operators who did not plant grass and trees to cover the ravaged hillsides.

But the insufficiency of this approach was evident at the Young's Fork operation. Slides moved down the legally permissible slope. Locust saplings planted here and there, then uprooted by rain, dotted the landscape. Splotches of green furze sprouted on the hillside like a dime-size growth of hair on a bald man's head. But no grass could ever grow from the exposed rock or from the wasteland of coal, crushed rock and slag left behind by the bulldozers where a few brave saplings shivered in a wet wind.

So people at Young's Fork were moved to nonlegislative action. The shattered hulk of a $300,000 coal gouger lay 100 yards from the end of the scar. It had been dynamited a month before and totally wrecked. In its cab, the sprung controls (Swing Left, Boom Down, Engine Throttle) no longer moved the boom's pendulous might and the red steel snout that had been rooting in the mountainside capable of raising a 30,000-pound weight in one bite lay slack-jawed. Dynamite had carried a message that appeals could not get through and the Mountain Top Stripping and Pine Bluff Augering Co. had suspended operations there.

Over the line in Pike Co. (where subversive hunter and lieutenant governor candidate Ratliff was county prosecutor), opposition had taken a nonviolent form. Farmer Jink Ray and his neighbors had lain down in front of the bulldozers of the Puritan Coal Co., come with an ancient broad form in hand to strip mine the land. The company obtained an injunction from the Pike Co. court, forbidding Ray to interfere. But Governor Breathitt bravely ordered a temporary suspension of the Puritan permit under provisions of Kentucky mining law. It was the first time in its history that the state government had so boldly challenged the divine right of mine operators.

On August 1, Breathitt made the suspension stick. The State Department of Natural Resources revoked the Puritan permit to strip mine in Pike Co. It was a big political risk, calculated to rouse the wrath of the operators. And it came at a time when other elements were ruffling the status quo of the poverty-stricken scene in Eastern Kentucky. The Citizens Crusade Against Poverty, organized with strong backing from Walter Reuther, was looking into the scope of nation-wide poverty and planned to convene a "board of inquiry" in Hazard, Ky., on August 22 to sketch in that Appalachian phase of the overall poverty picture. Much of its Kentucky research had been organized by the Appalachian Volunteers, already anethema to the mining powers that be.

It did not take inspired investigation to recognize Kentucky poverty. Ten of the nation's twenty poorest counties are located there. In the four-county OEO area comprising Leslie, Knott, Letcher and Perry (LKLP) Counties, an average of 60 per cent of the families make under the poverty minimum of $3,000 a year. Of Letcher County's 6,700 families, 1,470 make under $1,000. Shriver's office, with much ballyhoo, had allocated $6.5 billion to the eleven-state Appalachia area over two years with many millions going into Kentucky. But Edwin J. Stafford, director of the LKLP Community Action Program, declared: "About these programs I can say this flatly: they have not eradicated poverty in Eastern Kentucky."

Well, no one ever expected them to do this quickly, if at all, and it is not Shriver's fault that the Congress pinches poverty pennies when a massive and continuous flow of dollars is needed. But much of what is allotted never gets to the poor. All dole is divided into three parts by 1967 governmental ukase and the poor are supposed to have one-third representation on the OEO boards. This works out in practice only where strong mobilizing efforts are made by civil rights organizations or groups like AV to get poor people, often ignorant and universally intimidated, to press for a meaningful voice. OEO critics in Eastern Kentucky say with some justification that too many OEO dollars are going to fatten middle-class staffs as assistant directors and executive secretaries proliferate.

In Hazard, Perry Co., a straight-talking mountain man named Everett Tharp, who directs the OEO program, sounds disillusioned. "There are long-range plans for highways to come in and dams to be built," he says. "Eventually that might help the economy. But it's a long way off. What I'd like to see—but I don't see it—is a broad, comprehensive manpower plan for these four counties. Like the Job Corps or WPA. Heavy-equipment training, mechanics, teach 'em a trade."

What he has been able to offer to an army of applicants are platoon-size programs that are barely stopgap. For example, only thirty-four chronically unemployed mountaineers, many in their 50s and 60s, were enrolled under OEO's pre-vocational training. This was hastily designed to absorb men from the Labor Department's work experience and training program (called Happy Pappies in Kentucky) which had been crimped by fund shortages. The men earned $64 a week for eight weeks. What did they learn? They were taught how to dress, and how to fill out job applications and income-tax forms. The irony, even the cruelty, of teaching men hungering for work how to fill out applications for nonexistent jobs and tax forms for income they do not make is too apparent.

Sitting on the swaybacked porch of his shack in a hollow outside Hazard, Grover Chandler, father of seven and a Happy Pappy graduate said:

> About all I did in the vocation program was plant saplings. I don't want to lie about nothing. If I say it didn't he'p me, it didn't he'p me and that's the truth. They promised us a job when we came out. That's what got us all stirred up when there weren't none. I ain't had regular work in two years and with seven kids it's just hard, I tell you. What's aggravatin' me so much is school starts this month and we have four to be goin' and there isn't any money for shoes.

Chandler and his family are not starving only because of the Food Stamp program. During the brief time he was a Happy Pappy, his stamps were cut off because he was making too much money. Now the family gets $86 worth for $3 and these buy food for about two and a half weeks. Then they borrow from a friend who is working, the same friend who lends them money for the stamps. Since Chandler is employable the family can get no welfare under Kentucky law, despite the fact that his wife is chronically ill and needs help in caring for the children ranging from 2 to 10. Chandler, a fourth grade school dropout, recites his tale of woes in accents remarkably free of self-pity. This is common with these mountain people. Poverty has become a way of life as unremarkable as the morning sun.

But unrest has been increasing as SCEF workers and Appalachian Volunteers encourage the poor to press for whatever rights were left them and to demand significant national aid for a region whose mineral riches have helped to power America's wealth-producing industrial growth during this century. The successful unity of the Appalachian Group to Save the Land and the People encouraged the notion that the powers that be were not invincible. The group threatened to fill the jails in protest if strip mining continued. So it was no accident that only eleven days elapsed between Governor Breathitt's revocation of the Puritan strip-mine permit in Pike Co. and the midnight raid by Pike Co. prosecutor Ratliff. The time had come to show who was boss.

Ratliff, past president of the Independent Coal Operators' Association, denied AV charges that his raid was politically or economically motivated to aid his coal-mining friends. "These are the smear tactics always used by their kind against anyone who exposes them," he said. "From what I have seen of the evidence in this case, it is possible that Communist sympathizers may have infiltrated the anti-poverty program not only in Pike Co. but in other sections of the country as well."

But Ratliff did not specify against whom sedition had been committed. Was it the county, the state or, perhaps, the Puritan Coal Co.? The question seemed academic since Supreme Court rulings in the past have found state sedition statutes unconstitutional. In 1954, for example, Carl Braden—present head of SCEF—was convicted of sedition after he had sold his home in a white section of Louisville to a Negro family. The conviction was later set aside by the Court of Appeals. Ratliff conceded that "the Supreme Court has made it very difficult to prosecute Communists." Nothing daunted, he pressed the central theme of his prosecution: "Every piece of evidence we have points to just one objective, to stir up dissension and create turmoil among our poor."

While it is Ratliff's prerogative to believe the poor should assent to orderly impoverishment, Shriver would seem in an awkward position if his precipitate cutoff of Volunteer funds signified agreement that his volunteer Mulloy was seditious. (Governor Breathitt had caved in and had officially requested Shriver to make the fund suspension. It is hard to be brave for long in a state that is the captive of America's largest corporations.) In the second annual OEO report, entitled The Quiet Revolution, posthumous praise was lavished on a Kentucky VISTA volunteer named Phil Johnson who died in an accident.

"When 22-year-old Phil Johnson arrived in Breathitt County," read Shriver's official report, "his first act was to knock the rotting wood steps off the local school and knock over the deteriorating outhouses behind the school. He went to the local school superintendent, a woman, and said that if she would send some lumber to the school, he would get some people to replace the worn-out facilities. She was taken aback by this approach but agreed to his request.

"This act seemed to set Johnson's style as a VISTA in the county, a style which his field supervisor described as 'awkward but beautiful.'

"Phil Johnson showed more than style. Assigned to the Appalachian Volunteers, Bristol, Tenn., he talked to numerous people, listened to their ideas . . . he got people talking . . . when they began talking about forming a county-wide organization of their own, he became an effective organizer."

Phil Johnson was "beautiful" as he knocked down the steps of a public school without permission and organized poor people. But what a difference a year makes. Something ugly is loose when Appalachian Volunteer Joe Mulloy tries to organize poor people in 1967 without knocking down anything. Is it seditious to inquire where the ugliness lies?

TV Editorials: How Brave & Free?

VICTOR H. BERNSTEIN

Mr. Bernstein, a free-lance writer, was managing editor of The Nation from 1952 to 1963. He is the author of Final Judgment: The Story of Nuremberg.

TV is not all wasteland; some of it is near vacuum. When is the last time you heard a TV station openly take sides on such pressing issues as the Vietnamese War, the Middle East, or Mr. Johnson's qualifications for the Presidency? I am not talking of the comments of a politico being interviewed or of a guest speaker; I am talking about the opinion of the owner and/or management of the station itself, and presented as such in the way that a newspaper editorial is proffered as the opinion of the publisher.

Some stations do editorialize, as we shall see; but in general the editorial voice of the most powerful and extensive of news media comes out more squeak than thunder. This is a regrettable phenomenon, since democracy functions by virtue of the availability of public forums. Formerly, the multiplicity of newspapers guaranteed a certain minimum, at least, of editorial conflict from which readers could profit. Today the number of one-newspaper towns is growing from year to year, and in metropolitan areas especially there is a tendency for dailies to fold up entirely and steal quietly away. But the broadcast industry continues to squeak as its thunder becomes more and more urgently needed.

If radio and TV have been slow and squeamish about taking up the growing editorial slack, the reasons lie as much in Washington as in their own lack of initiative. To understand this, a bit of history is essential. For imaginable reasons, the pioneer broadcasters of the twenties and the early thirties had no interest in doing anything so venturesome as expressing a political opinion. They had other things to worry about. In 1937-38, however, Boston's WAAB pioneered the field—not only taking sides on public issues but also endorsing political candidates. The matter was brought before the Federal Communications Commission. The core question involved was clear enough: Did the broadcaster's constitutional right of free speech include his right to exploit the air, a public property, to disseminate his private opinions? In 1941 the commission rendered a landmark opinion—known in the industry as the Mayflower decision—against the licensee: "It is . . . clear that with the limitations in frequencies inherent in the nature of radio, the public interest can never be served by a dedication of any broadcast facility to the support of his own partisan ends. . . In brief, the broadcaster cannot be an advocate."

Liberals endorsed the decision, as did the American Civil Liberties Union. It seemed to them that a handful of licensees would monopolize the air and bombard the country with their (no doubt reactionary) opinions. But as stations multiplied, pressure grew on the FCC to revise its attitude in the light not only of the First Amendment but also of the public benefit to be derived from the open exchange of opinion on public matters. Gradually the commission responded; in 1949 the drastic Mayflower decision was rescinded with the stipulation that a station must practice "fairness" in allowing the opposition to have an equal opportunity for reply. Today this doctrine means that it is the duty of the licensee, even if he has to donate the time, to air conflicting viewpoints after one side of the controversy has been broadcast. How much time the conflicting viewpoints must be given on the air, deponent sayeth not; "fairness" is the criterion. (It should be noted here that the fairness doctrine does not apply to editorial statements aired by individuals in their own right and who are not presented as spokesmen for the licensee; thus, an Eric Sevareid can editorialize all he wants and is in no way constrained to present an opposing view.)

Actually, the FCC has done an about-face in its attitude toward editorializing; it has gone from prohibition to cautious consent to outright encouragement. In 1962, Chairman Newton N. Minow told a conference of editorial broadcasters: "The population is increasing at an explosive rate . . . but . . . the number of metropolitan newspapers which traditionally have served our people is decreasing. I believe that it is a matter of urgent national importance that radio and television reach out for their greatest potential. . . ."

Surveys made in 1963 showed that approximately a third of all TV stations were editorializing. But only half of the third were editorializing on a regular basis; the rest did so only occasionally. Moreover, 87 per cent of the total time devoted to editorials was concerned with community, county or state subjects.

WCBS-TV, the Columbia Broadcasting System's New York outlet, does more gross business than any other TV station in the country. It was also among the first TV channels to broadcast a daily editorial, and one of the very few to have installed a special editorial department and hired a competent and experienced newsman to run it. Thus WCBS-TV editorials can be said to be prepared and delivered under optimum conditions, given the general circumstances under which the broadcasting industry operates. How good is the program? What are its strengths and weaknesses?

Judged by size of audience, the station's director of editorials, Michael F. Keating, must be reckoned as among the most influential editorialists in the country. Each weekday at 6:55 P.M., a million and a quarter viewers are tuned to him as he delivers a two-minute editorial; each following afternoon at 1:25 he repeats the text for the benefit of 300,000 additional listeners. This makes an audience that the ordinary newspaper editorial writer, who is fortunate if he can capture the attention of 10 per cent of his newspaper's readers, must contemplate with envy.

Mr. Keating is a pleasant young man whose owlish glasses add a scholarly note to an all-American face. He talks in simple terms, mostly about local and state problems, and to the political sophisticate much of what he says conveys little more than that here is one young man who is against sin. Of course, the vast majority of people who listen to TV haven't gone to college, and Keating keeps this fact in mind. Thus, when he argues that New York's abortion laws are an abortion, and that drug addicts are sick people, he may not be breaking any new intellectual ground, but he is seeking to break the thought patterns of a million New Yorkers who, for the most part, are longer on prejudice than they are on schooling.

Keating's homilies are presented as the views of the station management. More accurately, they represent his own views as accepted by management. He writes his own texts and usually chooses his own subjects. He is also largely responsible for choosing his opposition under the fairness doctrine of the FCC. Over the long haul, nearly a third of the editorials on his show are delivered by outsiders who have taken exception to something he has said.

But Keating is not his own agent. The station's general manager, to whom he is responsible, reads his scripts beforehand and can wield a veto. Moreover, on Monday mornings he submits ideas for the coming week's editorials to a board consisting of the general manager, the news director, the program director and the director of community services. Sometimes new ideas come out of the conference; sometimes his own are altered, but generally the week's programs adhere closely to Keating's original suggestions. When there is serious disagreement, the solution is usually to drop the suggested topic; there is an unwritten rule that the editorial director will not be ordered to air any opinion to which he does not subscribe.

"On the whole," says Mr. Keating, "I enjoy considerable freedom." Much of this freedom goes to him by default. C.B.S. was one of the early and valiant fighters for the right of broadcasters to editorialize, but no one seems to have given much thought to what the stations would say once they had the right to say it. WCBS-TV had been broadcasting editorials at erratic intervals for some years when, in 1964, it decided to institute a daily program. At the time, Keating was Albany correspondent for the New York Herald Tribune and had made occasional guest appearances on the Newsmakers, a panel program. WCBS executives liked what they saw and invited him to join the staff.

"Did they ask about your political attitudes before hiring you?" I asked Keating.

"No, not at all."

"Doen't that seem odd, considering you were being hired not as a reporter but as an editorial spokesman for the station?"

"Well, they knew my record, and I suppose they asked around about me. It must have been perfectly clear to them that I wasn't a Communist."

Was it equally clear to them that he wasn't too conservative to be their spokesman? One gets the feeling that they didn't give the matter much thought. They wanted a presentable spokesman with good delivery; what he would deliver constituted a problem they would meet when they came to it.

So, as a journalist with a mind of his own, Keating does a good deal of their thinking for them. Considering the size of his audience and the prestige of his employer, it appears to be a heavy responsibility for one who is barely a dozen years out of school. Keating is a Canadian, who was graduated from St. Francis Xavier University in Antigonish, Nova Scotia, in 1955, worked for a while on the Rome (N.Y.) Daily Sentinel, and spent about seven years in Albany as political correspondent, first for the Associated Press and then for the Herald Tribune.

He has turned out to be no more a conservative than a Communist. His editorials, succinct and clear if not always exciting, are in the humanitarian and reformist tradition established by such C.B.S. personalities as Ed Murrow and Fred Friendly. WCBS-TV fought hard for a civilian review board and lost; it had better luck with a campaign for a state law granting compensation to crime victims. In addition to continuing campaigns for clear air and water, decent treatment for addicts, the control of gun sales, and changes in the state's abortion laws, the station has pleaded in recent months for better pay for migrant workers, voting rights for 18 year olds, freedom for political demonstrators, and the appointment rather than the election of judges. On race riots, Keating has put the station on record as favoring law and order, but always with the reminder that underlying causes must be dealt with. A Catholic, he has nevertheless taken the liberal position both on the state abortion law and on the law banning state aid to denominational schools.

About 300 words make up a two-minute editorial. This would not appear to be a burdensome stint, but it requires an economy in writing that can be time consuming; and when you are on a million-plus screens, you try to be careful not only in what you say but how you say it. To add to the work, his program draws an average of fifty letters a week which must be answered (the number may jump to 200 on a "hot" issue like the civilian review board). Then there is the business of selecting an opponent worthy of receiving air time; this is often the most burdensome job of all.

"We would like to remind our viewers," Keating tells his audience once a week or so at the close of an editorial, "that WCBS-TV will consider requests for time for the presentation of views differing from ours." This is a bonanza for sundry individuals and officers of relatively obscure organizations who are suddenly handed an audience of a million-plus on prime time. Among Keating's opposition guests in recent months have been the president of the Associated Third Class Mail Users, the chairman of the Committee for a Vital Village, and a vice president of the New York State Optometric Association.

It is on the "hot" issues, which call not merely for the reasonable time for reply demanded by the fairness doctrine but for something approximating equal time, that complications develop. This is especially true when the opposition comes from several sources, each eager to have its say. Between December, 1966, and May, 1967, Keating devoted sixteen shows (counting the evening presentation and the next day's repeat as one show) to the gun-control problem. Half of these were given over to opposition spokesmen, including Woodson D. Scott, vice president of the National Rifle Association, whose talents as a debater may be questioned, but not his gift as a publicist. He spoke on prime evening time that normally costs an advertiser $2,340 a minute; the next afternoon's repeat would have cost $625 a minute; Scott and his association got the time for nothing.

Keating's campaign in behalf of a civilian review board lasted from February to October, 1966; again air time was shared equally with the opposition. And as of this writing, Keating has spoken three times against any amendment to the state law banning aid to denominational schools; speaking for dropping the law, or amending it, have been a parents' group, a Catholic spokesman and a spokesman for orthodox Jewry.

Has WCBS-TV been going overboard to be fair? It has certainly not been going overboard to persuade. "Our whole purpose," Keating explained, "is to provoke discussion." Laudable: but is this the purpose of an editorial? Newspapers don't usually yield editorial space to the opposition; the letters column is the place for that. Keating would seem to be running a kind of "letters column of the air"; as editor, he chooses the subject, but otherwise he is simply one of the contributors. He did not choose this role; it is the natural result of the fairness doctrine, and it goes to the heart of the problem of radio-TV editorializing.

This balancing act between assertion and counter-assertion called for by the doctrine must, of course, rob any editorial campaign of its dynamic. One is saying, "Yes, but . . ." all the time. Moreover the doctrine discourages that kind of sharp concern with public personalities that so often gives zest to an editorial. "Any attack . . . upon the honesty, character, integrity or like personal qualities of an identified person or group," reads an FCC ruling, requires notice beforehand of the time of the broadcast to the person or group attacked, a script of the broadcast and "a reasonable opportunity to respond." To avoid this rigmarole, the tendency is to avoid personalities and deal with ideas as abstractions.

Equally constricting is the problem of subject matter. In common with most broadcasters of editorial programs, WCBS-TV focuses almost exclusively on state and local issues. Of forty-odd subjects touched on by Keating during April, May and June of this year, the bulk was divided about evenly between community and state. Only five dealt more or less directly with the national scene: "junk mail," oil dumping at sea, the censure of Senator Dodd, gun control, and a plea for federal money to help New York City protect visiting notables from abroad. The nearest he came to an international subject was to congratulate the citizens of New York and Glassboro, N.J., for their courteous treatment of Mr. Kosygin. One follows his program as one might follow the editorial page of a small-town newspaper; it fills a need, a vital need, but however intelligent and well written the editorials, they leave an even larger need unmet. The net effect is one of blandness.

Aware of this, Keating has sought permission to widen his focus; it will be interesting to see what decision comes down. There is a lot involved. The fairness doctrine has tended to discourage many licensees from editorializing at all. Adhering to it on a local level is often troublesome enough; on national issues, the burden becomes greater. Once a licensee begins to deal critically with national policy and national figures, he is fooling around with the ultimate source of power from which all blessings flow—his license to operate. On occasion Congress, naturally averse to anything that might enlarge the number of its potential critics, has growled menacingly at the whole idea of station editorials; some Congressmen have even challenged FCC's right to permit them. The commissioners themselves are appointed by the Executive branch; how freely and how long would they permit a licensee to fulminate against the Administration? Maybe entirely freely and forever; maybe something short of that. "Why," one broadcasting executive said to me, "should we take the risk of finding out?"

A prime editorial function, obviously, is the endorsement of political candidates. The industry's approach to this responsibility has been gingerly, to say the least. With network encouragement, WCBS-TV endorsed its first candidate in 1965—Lindsay for mayor. But even stations otherwise willing to enter the controversial area of partisan politics are given pause by the FCC regulations:

> Where a licensee, in an editorial, (1) endorses or (2) opposes a legally qualified candidate or candidates, > the licensee shall, within 24 hours after the editorial, transmit to respectively (1) the other qualified candidate or candidates for the same office or (2) the candidate opposed in the editorial (1) notification of the date and time of the editorial; (2) a script or tape of the editorial; and (3) an offer of a reasonable opportunity for a candidate to respond over the licensee's facilities. . . .

What constitutes "reasonable" opportunity? "Equal" opportunity? Under such reasoning, where there are three candidates for an office, for every two minutes a station devotes to its favored candidate, it must give away four minutes to the opposition. Aside from the money value of prime time, there would seem to be no percentage in that. It is no wonder so many licensees are tempted to say, "To hell with the whole business."

Broadcast editorialists meet annually at a national conference; this fall, as at preceding conferences, loud voices will be raised in pleas that freedom of speech must be considered at least as inviolable as freedom of the press. Conditions, which have changed notably since Mayflower, favor their cause. As UHF develops, available frequencies are no longer so limited; with the multiplication of stations, the fear of monopoly has faded. There is more monopoly in the newspaper field than in radio-TV. Today there are approximately 1,750 English-language dailies in the country; the number of radio and TV stations is almost three and a half times greater—6,045. The contrast is even more striking in metropolitan areas. New York City now has thirty-six radio and nine TV stations—and three newspapers; Chicago has thirty-four radio and nine TV stations—and four newspapers.

I am not suggesting that the time has come for abandonment of all controls over broadcasting content. If a commentator or a person who has purchased time for a series of programs singles out an individual for highly adverse comment, the person so attacked should, as a matter of simple "fairness," be given an opportunity to reply. But the time may have arrived for some modification of the "fairness" doctrine in relation to editorial opinion which is, after all, clearly identified as the opinion of the station. If the opposition is given a fair play in panel shows, debates, the news footage, etc., the licensee's control over his two-minute opinion spot should no more be questioned than Mr. Sulzberger's control over the editorial columns of The New York Times. The ACLU, which has long since reversed its policy on broadcast editorials, puts it this way:

> An editorial should clearly be identified as an expression of the station's opinion. Editorializing on any subject matter should be done in the context of the station's over-all balanced programming. . . . If a station puts on a forum discussion or . . . a spokesman . . . favoring the current immigration system, then the station is free to oppose the system in an editorial without including a spokesman for the other side.

Of course, the fairness doctrine is not the only hindrance to the freedom of the broadcast editorialist. I asked Keating whether, if he were convinced that cigarette smoking was injurious, detergents were ruining the country's sewer systems, and car makers were underemphasizing safety, he would feel free to say so editorially. "I would have to be very sure of my facts," he answered. I guess he would. Among the sacrificial lambs sometimes placed on the altar of the free-enterprise system is editorial freedom. Still, one day WCBS-TV may surprise us.

THE FACES OF FIDELISMO

LINDA EDER

Miss Eder, UN observer for The Nation, is a member of a Colombian-American family, and has written on Colombian women and Manhattan children.

Havana

A stringy haired woman raises her arms in the classic position of a flamenco dance, smiles broadly as she circles the stage, her castanets thumping; bows with pleasure when a bouquet of wilted roses is placed in her waiting arms. A group of singers raise their voices in swinging rumbas, eyes glued to the leader or ogling the watchers, the women undulating their hips or patting their hair. Rushing off at the close, they stretch their hands coaxingly toward the departing audience imploring a smoke, some with two or three cigarettes dangling from their lips.

Correspondents from around the world were conducted through the National Psychiatric Hospital outside of Havana on one of the tours to Cuban show places during the recent conference of the Organization of Latin American Solidarity. "We have transformed an asylum into a garden," said the director, describing the former disgraceful condition of the home for chronic psychotics and showing us the multi-colored contemporary dormitories, bar-less windows, well-kept rose bowers, inmates woodworking, weaving, tending a chicken farm, smirking through a primary arithmetic class. Then, before the pathos of illness became too strong for our tastes, we were ushered to the rhythmic blare of an inmates' band playing rumbas and revolutionary anthems into a large hall and plied with plentiful food and drink, chatter and laughter. As we piled into our buses, weighed down with flowers from director, attendants and inmates who cheered and waved a warm goodby, we might have been leaving a carnival.

Havana leaves the same impression of scatterbrained gaiety, pathos, dogged organization. A scant week in Cuba, spent mainly in the capital, is sufficient only for random observation. The view was further blurred by the conference itself, planned to coincide with the July 26th anniversary of the ill-fated Moncada insurrection.

This celebration of defeat exemplifies the credo voiced by Regis Debray: "for a revolutionary, failure is a springboard. As a source of theory it is richer than victory. . . ."

"They have hung a curtain over everything during the OLAS conference," a forcibly retired professional said to me. "When you leave," he whispered in cynical resignation, "the curtain will be lifted and things will drag along as they usually do."

But standing out boldly was a painting from the Salon de mai exhibition from Paris. An ugly monster with great teeth bared in a snarling grimace squats complacently while it nurses its young. Its shape is the map of Manhattan with avenues and cross streets, the protrusion near the Bowery forming a large breast from which a voracious white infant draws its milk; a smaller breast is sucked by an undernourished black infant. The opening of the exhibition coincided with the opening of OLAS; the painting could represent the official Cuban view of the United States. Multiply the Manhattan beast a hundredfold, include our "lackey" countries and organizations, and you have the Solidarity Conference line against the racist archenemy.

But for all the virulence of the attacks—daily in the OLAS plenary sessions, everywhere on banners, street-corner posters, neon-lighted and flashing billboards showing fighters with raised guns, in newspapers, magazines, leaflets—the Cuban people seem as loath to hate as did the people at the asylum. Government officials and the man in the street smiled warmly at the North American imperialist.

"Our every action is a war scream against imperialism and a clamor for people's unity against the great enemy of mankind: the United States of North America." The focus of the conference was on Che Guevara's words, broadcast to the Tricontinental Conference in Havana, which initiated OLAS a year and a half ago. Among the many neat packets of printed material delivered to our hotel rooms twice daily were nicely bound speeches by Fidel and others by Che, the government organs Granma, El Mundo and Bohemia, printed in several languages with careful regard to our native tongues. "The duty of every revolutionary is to make revolution" and the "one, two, three, many Vietnams" Che urged the people to create were the most ubiquitous slogans. To deplete the United States, to destroy imperialism by a world confrontation, to "carry the war into every corner the enemy happens to carry it . . . to his home, to his centers of entertainment . . . to prevent him from having a moment of peace . . . his moral fiber shall begin to decline. He will even become more beastly, but we shall notice how the signs of decadence begin to appear."

But in their homes and centers of entertainment, Cuban revolutionaries, apathetic residents and embryonic counterrevolutionaries provided attention and warmth. At the ballet (Alicia Alonzo's classic company is of the best), at the beach, at a night club, the Cubans showed love, not war. In the ornate hotel which put up the press, surrounded by placards of hate, everybody from the chambermaid to the very proper maitre d' smiled at us pleasantly. Every courtesy was extended to the correspondents by the officials in the OLAS press room, including automobile service ("taxis are very hard to find," we were told soothingly, and indeed they were since all the government-owned taxi fleet was assigned to OLAS and the Salon de Mayo), and affirmative responses followed requests for interviews, with everyone but Castro. They looked genuinely offended when I refused to allow my hotel bill—board and room and bar—to be paid by the government.

The government taxi drivers at our disposal all day were courteous despite strict orders to refuse extra pay or tips. "The private cabs," said a slight pock-marked driver, "earn thirty to forty pesos a day" (a peso is exactly equal to our dollar) while he receives a monthly stipend of 180 pesos for an average of six to seven hours (with no overtime whatsoever for the sixteen hours worked during the conference). However, he said, although he earned much more before the revolution, he has security now. If he needs a spare part, the government supplies it—from many used cars left behind by wealthy expatriates. They pay for gas too, which is very expensive. Private owners not only incur the expenses but often can't get the needed part, he said, as his '58 Chevrolet turned a corner noisily, its patched bumper rattling. "Still—" he concluded wistfully, "security or not, it's hard to support a wife and three children on this salary." Had he known, after Fidel came in, what he knows now . . . but here the cab drew up to the hotel for a waiting official and our conversation ended.

A fellow government driver, another day, however, could only raise his voice in enthusiasm. "If you stay longer in Havana," he said, "I will invite you to my home so that my señora and I can show you how well a poor man lives today." I left too soon to accept his hospitality.

A friendly spinster whom I met in a post office queue took me to her home and showed me her view of the Caribbean, the peeling paint on her walls, and her almost empty larder. I had asked her if she would like to stop some place and chat over a cup of coffee. She raised her eyebrows. And where, she asked, were we to find coffee? There used to be cafeterias, little coffee stands all over, but not now. Maybe I could get some in my hotel, but not she.

"See what we are allowed to buy," she said, opening her ration book, being careful not to let me see her name. Food allowance included six tiny cans of milk a month per person—(fresh and powdered were reserved for young children or health cases), three pounds of rice, one each of lard and oil. A weekly ration of three-fourths of a pound of meat, divided between first class and soup meat. Chicken is not rationed but (despite the Mental Hospital's fine chicken farm) she never gets any. "And only one and a half ounces of our beloved coffee each week. But many buy coffee in the black market."

As we wandered together through one of the best markets in Havana, she pointed out the almost empty shelves, with a few plantains and yucca, some candies covered with flies, and several cans of evaporated milk, and quoted the household articles permitted: a small piece of soap per month for personal use, one cake for laundry, six little tubes of toothpaste during the year ("and it tasted of cucarachas!"). Scant supplies of toilet paper, no sanitary napkins . . . thank heaven for cotton!" she finished ruefully.

"But," said my incognito friend, "I wouldn't mind the scarcity if it weren't for the lack of liberty. For instance, I can't go anywhere. If we leave Havana, we must report our destination to the police, our length of stay, the exact time of our return," she said like a girl complaining of signing-out rules at boarding school. "But worse, there is the vigilancia, the Comite de Defensa with known and unknown watchers in a block-by-block system."

"If I leave my home to go and visit my son in the United States," said an elderly widow whom I visited in her comfortable apartment in one of the better sections, "I can never come back to it. They will come and take an inventory of everything in it, as they did when my husband died. And they will take it all. Of course, if I go on a visit to an approved country, I can return to my home, but I am too old to travel for pleasure, and besides it takes so long to wait for permission to leave." She bemoaned the decline of her area: "There used to be beautiful houses around here; now they are taken over by those horrible young people."

The former fine homes, embassies and many large buildings have been given over to the elect of Cuba—the young scholarship students or becados. True, the buildings are not kept up as they had been: they need paint, the lawns are uncut and brown patched, weeds intertwine with flowers and empty lots are prone to debris. But the becados, girls and boys, are rigidly if lovingly handled. Antonio, my 19-year-old escort who had volunteered to serve as a press attache during his month's vacation, has a carefully supervised program of study, homework and an hour of sports from 6:45 in the mornings until lights out at night.

The one complaint I heard from him against his beloved government, during the week he served as my escort, was that the only time he could see his girl was during his biweekly weekend off, for he accepted the military march back and forth to school with his fellow becados and felt that he progressed rapidly in his intense course of study because his motives were all altruistic, all to help his country and the revolution.

The young are indeed well treated in Cuba. They say they get great exhilaration from the annual volunteer program in the sugar-cane fields, for although they work harder physically than they ever have, there is of a spirit of fiesta and comradeship to the work. "For Cuba, for the revolution" stirs them on. Moral coercion is used also to recruit the volunteer militia. This rotating vigilance finds men and women with holsters at their sides patrolling a store, a hotel, a factory or other place of business.

Young girls have been given a new type of work during the past year, and one finds at every traffic intersection in Havana a young woman from 17 to her early 20s dressed in pert green and white uniform, cautiously directing traffic, calling "Look out, my child!" to a woman old enough to be her grandmother who attempts to jaywalk, admitting that the green suede boots and long sleeves are pretty warm in the middle of the day, but saying that her work is "very pretty, very pretty," being firm that she will not allow herself to be photographed as it is not permitted.

Everywhere, within and without the city limits, are playgrounds for young children. Good use has been made of formerly exclusive country clubs and beach clubs to turn them over for the use of the people who, according to revolutionary theory, had nothing in pre-Castro days but a miserable stony beach to loll upon, while now buses take them to handsome Santa Maria and Varadero beaches, where they can stay in a hotel for $5 daily for room and board (the same fee charged a decade ago, according to counterrevolutionaries, who claim there were many spots available to the public).

No one can deny, however, the efficiency and thoughtfulness displayed in the baby-care centers scattered throughout the city and the country. Walking in unescorted and unannounced, I was impressed by the well-planned facilities for the children of working mothers, from the ages of 45 days to 6 years, by the numerous attendants, the loving handling of "Infant Igenia" aged 3 months, who got boiled milk and water as the sign over her crib stated, and by the delight shown by the mothers as they came to collect their children in the evening. A little sign kept the mothers from encroaching: "Mami: let me eat my potato with tranquillity, don't hurry to collect me; come after 5 o'clock and wait in the waiting room. Your son."

Did the Cubans hope to convert us? Surely there was great effort made here, at first by subtle gestures of friendship, later by comradely warmth over rum highballs at any one of the pleasant parties arranged for the press, and by steady argument, listening and then trapping the opponent. "Of course you know that the U.S. wants to murder Fidel," a press attache said the night before the government's spectacular CIA coup. "The U.S. is always planning to invade Cuba," said another. "But think how safe everything is here; you said so yourself." And indeed I had. Walking through the almost deserted streets of Havana alone at midnight, along the crumbling but beautiful Malecon encircling drive, I felt far safer than on a Manhattan street. "We have reduced our police stations in the city from sixteen to three," I was told. The same official grew more intense and his eyes burned with fervor. "I lived in New York and worked in Harlem as a pharmacist. I saw the growing degradation, was begged to supply the need for drugs. I paid an exorbitant rent. Tell them when you go back," he continued almost supplicating, "that in 1970 nobody will have to pay rent in Cuba. Nobody." "Don't forget to tell them about the rent-free homes," he said as I said my goodbys a few days later.

Or did they want to show us up "to all the world," as the vice president of the proceedings bellowed, as cynical, wicked, intent on invasion and murder. The mock trial of six infiltrators, five of them alleged spies for the CIA, could have been an authentic capture and subsequent conversion, although three had been apprehended a scant nineteen days before, and two of them had turned themselves in; the Central Intelligence Agency can hardly claim complete innocence in such cases. It could have been skillful counterespionage by actors trained not only to delude but to amuse. (One of the prisoners, constantly proclaiming innocence, said he had left Cuba originally for "personal reasons," which he admitted to being trouble with his mother-in-law.) Or it could have been a combination of both. The dramatic display of the prisoners could have been planned many months before as a penultimate climax, Fidel always being able to usurp the main role. We were notified mysteriously enough ("they always do things this way," said one hardened journalist) by whispered announcements the day previous of a very important press conference. Rumors circulated among the press that possibly it could be Fidel appearing ahead of time; the more wide-eyed believed in the possibility of Guevara's reappearance, and some said it might be his voice from the mountains of Bolivia or wherever he was hiding. The day of the 9 A.M. appointment, word had leaked out; the Havana papers carried the capture story, to the ire of the foreign dailies. But as the press conference continued into its fourth hour, and more of the press asked lengthier questions ("it was like the Nuremberg trials" said one U.S. reporter), the anti-imperialist crescendo rose higher and higher until it reached its peak with Uruguayan Vice President Arismendi's shout to the effect that every shade of opinion from almost every country in the world had been permitted free access to the prisoners, with the resultant exposure of the monstrous United States. His request that the conference denounce the United States (a somewhat superfluous formality in view of every delegate's speech to date) ended in thunderous applause, bringing the assembly to its feet to clap hands in rhythmic and deafening accord.

Away from the spacious conference halls of the Havana Libre Hotel, which deftly combines Hiltonism with Fidelism, the visitor receives the blast of Havana's pitiless blue skies in near-100 degree weather, as he walks past the French or Cuban or Czechoslovakian films shown in neighborhood movies ("Who are You, Polly McGoo?" something about Marilyn Monroe, a documentary about the revolution . . . past Sunday strollers on the rampa, a sort of city boardwalk, and returns to the less luxurious but equally pretentious Capri Hotel. Its hot water tap doesn't work, but who cares, for neither does the air conditioning in the bedroom ("yes, a pretty hotel" says the repair man who is on call all night long, "but very badly constructed") and cold baths are colder than the roof-top swimming pool, which affords a chance to see buxom Russians splashing with their children.

One of the women assigned to the foreign press, most cordial and warmhearted always, grabbed my arm and (cajolingly) sincerely murmured her sympathy for me during the press conference. Two others at lunch immediately said: "We like you—as people; it is your government that is at fault. You are not." That evening, the delegates, the press and visitors there for the Salon de Mayo exhibit were treated to an enormous party held on the exquisite grounds of a former country club converted into a fine art school. Once more Antonio, the studious and courteous young guide assigned to escort me to functions, was at my side to make sure that the lavish food and plentiful daiquiris reached me, or that I missed none of the entertainment—three bands spotlighted from different directions and elaborate and splendid folk dances illustrating the history of Cuba.

Driving to the airport in the dawn, my sleepy becado escort pointed out the tower monument to the apostle Marti, the home of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Cuba—"like the Kremlin," he said knowledgeably and proudly. Even in the near darkness, huge billboards strikingly proclaimed OLAS: "the Duty of Every Revolutionary is to Make Revolution," and the inevitable red-spattered men with guns or the faces of fallen Moncada heroes. Antonio, who rightfully prided himself on his dedication to his work and the cause, looked a little nonplused at my plea to open his eyes as well. The last sight as the plane taxied down the runway was a group of uniformed becado girl students on the observation deck, waving flags proclaiming the victories of the Cuban baseball players at Winnipeg.

One is left with feelings of fear, doubt, admiration, and hope: fear for the indoctrination of hatred starting so early in life, doubt of our own understanding and ability to cope with it, admiration for what they have done and the plan they are pursuing. The hope is that hatred for the Yanqui imperialist is hardly a sufficient motivation for a lasting society. To instill that hatred they must, like Lady Macbeth, ask to "fill me, from the crown to the toe, top-full of direst cruelty! make thick my blood, stop up the access and passage to remorse, that no compunctious visitings of nature shake my fell purpose." Debray says "especially is it a battle within the guerrillero himself to overcome his old habits, to erase the marks left on his body by the incubator—his weakness. In the early months the enemy to be conquered is himself."

IN DARKEST AMERICA

VICTOR ULLMAN

Mr. Ullman, formerly a newsman, is now assistant to the president of the University of Toledo. His latest book is Treat Them Human (Crown).

It is generally agreed that the civil rights movement in the Deep South is dead. But burial would be premature. The body stirs, at least in the Delta counties of Mississippi. The year 1967 is perhaps the most important and potentially revolutionary period in darkest America since 1890 when Mississippi closed its doors.

This is due to some millions of "foreign agitators" who go by the name of Christians and, in 1965, prevented the stillbirth of the Delta Ministry of the National Council of Churches. Totally unnoted in the news media on last February 6 was an event in Washington, D.C., marking this fact, one of history's most ironic twists.

On that day the natives of darkest America sent to the enlightened Christians of Africa a token of gratitude for their aid in the rescue of their mission to Mississippi. It was a most fitting token too, a cross of light oak and dark hickory, beautifully laminated and finished by unskilled black hands in the heart of America's color jungle, a mission known as Freedom City, near Greenville, Miss. It was the kind of token American missionaries used to send back from Africa to their American churches.

The cross was handed over to Dr. Z. K. Matthews, first ambassador to the United States from Africa's newest republic, Botswana (formerly Bechuanaland). It was brought from Freedom City by Owen Brooks, acting director of the Delta Ministry, an Episcopalian and a product of the Roxbury Negro ghetto of Boston. He asked Dr. Matthews to send it along to Africa with the message: "Without the concern of the people overseas, including those in Africa and Asia, our work might have ended in 1965. Your help came at a most critical time."

That was literally true. In 1965, after the long, hot summer of 1964 and its glorious stirring of the American conscience, the Negroes of the Deep South were deserted. The white liberals of the North discovered that integration meant them too, and they retreated to convenient gradualistic sociological theories about ghettos. The congregations of the Northern churches found out too that Christian brotherhood actually meant sharing their own pews. Both groups looked the other way when the civil rights collection plate was passed, and so the valiant CORE, SNCC, SCLC and other cohorts suffered from malnutrition.

But deep in the morass of broken Negro hopes there remained a handful of younger preachers who had been sent South by the National Council of Churches to serve as spiritual advisers to the embattled youngsters of 1964. They stayed while the rest went home and became the Delta Ministry, a permanent Christian mission with a simple and undramatic program.

The Delta Ministry was set up to spend at least ten years in a threefold undertaking: to teach words and numbers to illiterate adults and plantation children, to teach new skills to Negroes who had known only the use of the cotton chopping ax and hoe, and to teach the meanings of citizenship to the largest group of native-born Americans ever denied the rights of citizenship.

This is a most pedestrian program. It has had its beatings and arrests, most recently a death too when Ben Brown, a Delta Ministry volunteer, was shot in the back by police in Jackson, Miss. But how can classes in reading, writing and arithmetic make headlines? And so about a score of young preachers and volunteers in the Delta counties struggled and starved with their pupils. The member churches of the National Council simply did not match the modest program with money.

The plight of the Delta Ministry was learned by the Interchurch Aid branch of the World Council of Churches and, early in 1965, world Christianity adopted benighted and wealthy America as an object of its missionary efforts. From the Christian Council of South Africa came the sum of $280, and from the Cameroons, the Evangelical Church sent $686, the Presbyterian Church, $100. From the starvation areas of India the National Christian Council contributed $211, and the East Asia "Least Coin" Fund raised the princely sum of $1,000 for the Christian mission to America. The East Asia Christian Conference, Australia and New Zealand all sent money from the Pacific. The British Council of Churches and Germany's "Bread for the World" movement led all other churches in the amounts of contributions; they were joined by Holland, France, Denmark and Finland. The Canadian churches also gave.

In 1965, while American Christians dawdled, Christians from fourteen countries contributed approximately $89,000 to the Delta Ministry; they added approximately $50,000 in 1966. The exact total of foreign gifts for the two years was $138,927, whereas the American churches, which had initiated the Delta Ministry as their own domestic missionary effort, gave a total of $242,000, mostly during 1966, of which $103,000 came from the Methodists. They gave little and late—the conscience of world Christianity is apparently more responsive than that of Americans. It was proved again last April.

One of the Delta Ministry's most audacious dreams is Freedom City. It is a cooperative colony on 415 acres, and its twenty-three adults and forty-eight children are refugees from plantation misery and from the planters themselves. These Negro families are the remains of more than 100 families thrown off plantations, thrown out of the empty Greenville Air Force base by the military, flooded out of a tent city, given temporary quarters in Mount Beulah near Jackson, and finally reaching their land in July, 1966.

For nearly a year they starved, for the Delta Ministry could not afford to feed them. They had no homes, only a barn. Approximately once a month some Northern churches sent food and they had meat bones for soup about as often. All the money they could earn or raise went into a milk fund for the children. The Mississippi Welfare Department refused either aid or certification for federal foods because some families were without stoves: they had no houses, and cooked in a communal kitchen.

After his visit there with other Senators who were horrified by the starvation conditions which have existed in the Delta for many years, Sen. Joseph S. Clark of Pennsylvania spoke of Freedom City with sincerity and sorrow.

> I was very much impressed with Mr. Bradford who is the Negro head of the project, but there is certainly plenty of grinding poverty at Freedom City right now, and I don't see at the moment too much hope of success of the project unless a very substantial federal grant is forthcoming which will enable these people to work out of the cycle of poverty in which they are presently living. I am a little concerned as to whether they can find an adequate market for the crops they intend to raise. It's a most hopeful enterprise, and I wish it well but I certainly couldn't say that as of this moment I would be very optimistic about it.

This spring the whole dream of a "city" of their own looked as though it was at an end. There was no money for seed and fertilizer. If they could not get a crop into the ground, they were finished. There was a mortgage payment due on April 7. Where in the world could they get $10,000?

Federal money did not save this valiant effort. The fertilizer and seed money was raised out of the $2,800 retained from the mortgage payment from last year's late wheat crop, plus a private contribution. The mortgage money is another story. It goes back to last October and to the Dutch. No American TV network has ever seen anything worth reporting in Freedom City. The Dutch radio and TV network IKOR did; they sent a team over to record this struggle for freedom in Freedom City. An hour-long TV show went on the air in Holland on Christmas Day, 1966, and was repeated on February 5. There was a strong reaction; a church-oriented layman's organization known as the "Wild Goose Committee" responded. This organization has just one purpose, to meet emergency needs wherever in the world they arise, to do so immediately and by mobilizing the entire country.

On February 26, a Sunday, the "Wild Goose Committee" broadcast a five-minute radio appeal over IKOR and sent its forces out to collect. On April 4, the treasurer of Freedom City received a draft for 40,000 guilders (approximately $11,000). On April 7, the mortgage payment was met. On May 1, all the men, women and children were in the fields, planting seed in the prepared and fertilized ground. They planted soy beans, wheat and vegetables, these Negroes who had always worked in cotton. They hate cotton and refuse to plant it.

Freedom City is not all. The work of the Delta Ministry during the past two years has changed the complexion of the civil rights struggle. It is a Christian mission to bring self-emancipation to the Negroes of the Delta and thereby establish a new pattern of living for Negroes in the South. It would not have been possible without the Christians of the world.

For instance, in 1965 the Delta Ministry staff and volunteers were faced with the problem of hunger among thousands of families. Over the opposition of the Mississippi Welfare Department, the Delta Ministry went to Washington and obtained federal surplus foods to be given directly to the needy families, Negro and white. Some 150,000 families received such aid, and in March, 1967, the last available report, the number had risen to 405,000 families.

The Delta Ministry initiated the first Headstart programs in Mississippi and, before turning them over to community action groups, had seen to it that 9,000 preschool children had at least one full meal a day. Through federal programs secured by the Delta Ministry, by-passing state authorities, 3,000 Negroes found off-plantation employment. The Delta Ministry was responsible for bringing $40 million in federal aid directly to the poor Negroes and whites of the Delta, against the opposition of local Congressmen and authorities for whom calculated starvation is a strategy for getting rid of Negroes. (The Delta's biggest export is not cotton; it is Negroes shipped north.)

All during the hunger crises, the Delta Ministry struggled to launch its program. A home industry called Freedomcrafts was begun in 1965, making pecan candy. Then woodworking began with Nativity sets, beautiful eight-piece figurines of unusual, simple design. At four sites in the Delta counties, adults and children were taught to use jigs, to rub and finish woods. Freedomcrafts products are sold through churches all over the country.

Then the "schools" appeared up and down the Delta, from the Tennessee border to Vicksburg. In abandoned shacks, collapsing sheds and garages, wherever a roof could be found, Delta Ministry volunteers began to teach adults and children. At Freedom City, for instance, children and field hands attend classes in the barn from 5:30 to 7:30 P.M. Mondays through Fridays.

There are also "Citizenship Classes" for adults of voting age, which constitute, perhaps, the most important educative force in Mississippi today, for they teach the fundamentals of citizenship. It is a fact hard to grasp that after three generations without a vote or any sort of participation, people must be taught the "why" as well as the "what" of government. Among these Negroes the oldest can recall stories of grandfathers who once voted, as though it were some mystic rite. To them government is "The Man" who has no laws, regulations or restraints.

To the whites, the horror of these classses is that they produce black citizens, who may actually vote. They now have the right, through the Voting Rights Act of 1965, and the end of registration bars, poll tax, "literacy" tests no professor at Ole Miss could ever pass.

On November 7, there will be an election in Mississippi. Its outcome is unpredictable because the Delta Ministry has produced black citizens. Approximately 180,000 Negroes are expected to be voting for the "bread and butter" county offices, as well as the state offices. This will be their first chance to shake the foundations of the county system in which all white power is centered. At this writing, there are over 126 Negro candidates for county and state offices in Mississippi.

There already have been Negro candidates in Mississippi this year. There were two all-Negro slates opposing two all-white slates in the towns of Moorhead (pop. 1,784) and Sunflower City (pop. 662) on May 2. The elections were ordered by the federal courts, which had set aside the previous all-white vote for municipal offices. White slates won both elections. which was expected in Moorhead, but not in Sunflower City, where the registered Negroes outnumbered the whites by thirty-one votes. But even so, the eighty-two sets of white county officials in as many Mississippi counties are uneasy. The White Citizens Councils are fearful and fretful. The candidates for state office, from the governor down, must learn new campaign tactics since 90 per cent of the registered Negroes voted in Moorhead and Sunflower City.

For the first time since Reconstruction, candidates for office in Mississippi had to reckon with a Negro vote. For the first time since 1890 a Negro, the Delta Ministry's Joe Harris, was appointed an election official. White candidates had knocked for the first time on Negro doors for votes. For the first time in memory of Sunflower City's oldest resident the mud of the Negro streets had been covered with gravel, and those streets bore proud new signs blazoning their names in bright green and white. For the first time in Mississippi's history Negro residents received in their mail an appeal addressed "TO ALL CITIZENS OF SUNFLOWER" from the Mayor and the Police Department. ("No one, including the United States Government can make you vote in any election. This is your free choice and yours alone.")

Joseph Harris

Because of the election officials' treatment of Joe Harris, the results of the election in Sunflower City are now in the federal courts. On election eve the white board rescinded an agreement that Harris was to help all Negro voters who requested assistance in marking their ballots. This task was given a white election official, John S. Parker. To assure that the puzzled Negro would not be intimidated, the election board also ordered that a Justice Department observer be present in each case. On the face of it this guaranteed fair and impartial help.

But supposing you were a Negro in Sunflower City and you failed to indicate to John S. Parker that you intended to vote for his brother, Alderman Joel T. Parker, running for re-election? You might want a prescription filled one day and need credit at the drugstore; in Sunflower City the only drugstore is owned and run by Alderman Joel T. Parker. He received the highest Aldermanic vote.

Such arrangements, however, are standard practice in Mississippi county politics; what was important in the May 2 elections was the development of native Mississippi Negro leadership. Joe Harris is an example. This young man, a veteran of the civil rights movement, became eligible to vote last October 21, when he celebrated his 21st birthday. He was among those Negro youngsters who marched, sat-in, left classrooms for jail cells in 1964. A brilliant student in high school and junior college, he first sat-in in 1963. He was a student leader in Tougaloo University, near Jackson, when the Delta Ministry called him in 1965.

The Delta Ministry has twelve other Mississippi Negroes like Joe Harris on its staff of twenty-six. They all would probably reply as John Bradford did to the question of why they did not follow their families north: "My idea is that this is home to me, as I know it, and I think that if the problems here will ever be worked out, then we're going to have to do it. I don't feel that anyone else can come down here and tell us how to do it. They can come and help us with it, and help us work on it, but I think we're the ones that are going to have to fight the battle."

These young men and women are not afraid. In the Sunflower City campaign Joe Harris was a dark David taking on a political Goliath. Harris has a neighbor, just 8.4 miles from his shack in Sunflower City, and there was a political skirmish on May 2 between the two. The white neighbor is a Delta planter named James O. Eastland of Doddsville, whose 5,800 cotton acres stretch to within half a dozen miles of Sunflower City.

Eastland plays two roles, but serves only himself, at home or in the U.S. Senate. At 63, he retains the limited stature of a Mississippi county politician. His twenty-five years in Washington have been a political accident. He is not responsible for his power as chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee—the Congressional "Establishment" and successive Presidents are—but this massive Senatorial nonentity is well known as Congress' leading racist and obstructionist. Eastland, the Delta planter, is not so well known. He owns the Sunflower County political structure, and the White Citizens Councils were born in his county seat of Indianola in 1954. He is wealthy, powerful and vengeful.

That is why the challenge of the Delta Ministry's young Joe Harris on November 7 has him and every other Delta planter in a dither. In fact, the coming state and county elections are a nightmare to the white power structure of all eighty-two counties. Consider Planter Eastland's case.

His rich cotton land, selling for between $400 and $500 an acre throughout the Delta, is appraised in the county tax assessor's office at $18,200, or an average of $3.14 an acre. The personal property valuation, including the cotton pickers which cost about $15,000 to replace, is set at $750. A few miles north in Ruleville, the tax valuation on the huge Eastland & Lindsey Gin Mill is $8,400. That includes everything—plant and machinery, equipment, offices. Suppose the current Sunflower County tax assessor, Mrs. F. E. Fraiser, were to be defeated for re-election and a Negro tax assessor elected by Sunflower County's 8,000 registered Negro voters? Would there be a tax reappraisal of those 5,000 Eastland acres?

But that's not all that disturbs the Senator's sleep. What if Negroes are elected as county supervisors (the key offices), and saw to it that federal money was devoted to retraining planter Eastland's cotton field hands so they could earn more than the average of 29c an hour for adults and 21c for children he paid during the last cotton chopping and picking season? The families he no longer wants, due to mechanization and the new $1 minimum per hour wage scale, would be likely to stay in Sunflower County instead of heading north. In such a catastrophe Senator Eastland would have to dig into the soil conservation payments and cotton parity price payments he receives annually from the federal government and pay for schools. That would be enough to cause a Senator to make another speech about States' rights.

This is the substance of the possible revolution on November 7 among all the Eastlands in all the Mississippi counties, no matter what the candidates say. It is why the Senator himself said that the Delta Ministry is "infiltrated by Communists," his favorite gambit which in Washington produces an impolite yawn.

There are 180,000 new and black votes which nobody can count. There are the Joe Harrises of the Delta Ministry to lead them. There is world Christianity, if not American Christianity, behind the gigantic effort to teach Negroes in darkest America to read, to earn and to vote.

For the first time in seventy-seven years, Mississippi has an opportunity to rise from its position of fiftieth state in income, education, living standards, social action and political freedom. And, for the first time, Mississippi politicians are right as they fulminate against "foreign agitators" working through the Delta Ministry. Those Christians have to be exposed wherever they operate their subversive organizations.

Deutscher's chosen subjects were communism, Marxism, Soviet Russia and the emergent figures of the Revolution, but he would have been a great scholar in any other field. He read and listened to everyone's views but bowed to none, nor did he take refuge in a safe eclecticism: when he had the facts, he made up his own mind. He was living proof in his own person that a man could be a Socialist and not be subservient either to a ruling group or an official ideology. Had he remained in Poland, he might have become a member of the political elite after World War II, but he was more the scholar than the politician, and it was fortunate that he found refuge in England and outlets for his work in The Observer and The Economist — and The Nation. For many years he brought clarity into situations that other writers only obscured, and the fact that he had a large audience shows that intellectual ability and independence do not always go unrewarded. He died—at 60—when his research and unbiased understanding were more urgently needed than ever.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Story of a Country Doctor

A FORTUNATE MAN. By John Berger. Photographs by Jean Mohr. Holt, Rinehart & Winston. 157 pp. $5.95.

GEORGE A. SILVER, M.D.

Dr. Silver is deputy assistant secretary for Health and Scientific Affairs in the Department of Health, Education and Welfare.

This is a beautiful book, beautifully written, and illustrated with striking, movingly apt photographs. Its beauty should occasion no surprise because it is a long, thoughtful essay on man, written by a brilliant art critic and social commentator.

The fortunate man is Dr. John Sassall, a country doctor by choice, in a depressed English country setting. The place may not matter, in the ordinary sense, since the relativity of human experience is accentuated. However, the evocative prose and the pictures do not so much complement the scenes and episodes as give pure visual expression to the heard and spoken words:

> English autumn mornings are often like mornings nowhere else in the world. The air is cold. The floorboards are cold. It is perhaps this coldness which sharpens the tang of the hot cup of tea. Outside, steps on the gravel crunch a little more loudly than a month ago because of the very slight frost.

Berger has undertaken to evoke two levels of humanity in his long, somewhat rambling essay: the country doctor, and a country doctor. Sassall, a country doctor, comes through more strongly than the genus, particularly since the photographs of the grim parish he serves and its moody parishioners command our attention even when the essayist is generalizing on man, the role of the doctor or eschatology. One parishioner:

> With the warm water and cotton wool he cleaned away the little droplet of blood from her worn, large arm, the colour of stone or bread, as though it had acquired the colour through its scrubbing and baking.

And another:

> She wore a very worn black lace petticoat. The room was as little furnished as the kitchen. There was a large bed in one corner with some blankets on it and some more blankets on the floor. There was also a chest of drawers with a clock on it and a transistor radio. The windows were overgrown with thick ivy and since there was no plaster ceiling and holes in the rafters, the room scarcely seemed geometric and was more like a hide in a wood.

It is refreshing, and necessary for an objective writer to undertake to describe the other world of medicine, the one of care and cure. Some potboiling novelists have managed to earn several livelihoods from romanticizing medicine just as others have done rather well by grim surgery on the profession and professionals. Somehow the view of the doctor-patient cosmos isolated from economics and politics has not had a fair exposure. Berger compensates for this:

> We can now return to our original question. How is it that Sassall is acknowledged as a good doctor? By his cures? This would seem to be the answer. But I doubt it. You have to be a startlingly bad doctor and make many mistakes before the results tell against you. In the eyes of the layman the results alway tend to favour the doctor. No, he is acknowledged as a good doctor because he meets the deep but unformulated expectation of the sick for a sense of fraternity. He recognizes them. Sometimes he fails—often because he has missed a critical opportunity and the patient's suppressed resentment becomes too hard to break through—but there is about him the constant will of a man trying to recognize.

An image emerges of what the golden-age doctor might have been—or should have been. Berger touches on the pity and pain and fear which has been the traditional role of the doctor to allay. In the few vignettes of the doctor's patients he introduces the sensitivity and selflessness a doctor is expected to have and the vast relief it can bring.

About to leave a desperately sick woman's side, recognizing the unvoiced despair of her husband, Dr. Sassall stays, asks for a cup of tea, chats, taking the time for reassurance in response to a mute plea. Gravely treating a young girl, in symptoms that might have been dismissed as adolescence or egocentricity, sympathetically he finds a need for self-expression:

> "I sometimes wonder," he says, "how much of me is the last of the old traditional country doctor and how much of me is a doctor of the future. Can you be both?"

Our health planning and budgeting today, necessary as it may be, comprehends the loss of the human relationship, but seems unable to replace or sustain it. Family doctors are disappearing, relatively and absolutely, in numbers. Perhaps compassionate support was never really there to the degree we would like to think it ought to be now. It certainly cannot ever be without the Sassalls. In looking to a future in which better medical care is brought to all of our people, we need better organization, more specialists, a wider distribution of all types of physicians, and new types of health workers. But without the deep insights and sympathy and understanding of a figure like the family doctor, interposed between the mechanical marvels of modern scientific medicine and suffering men, it will be hopeless.

Within the struggling pilot programs of community health services and neighborhood health centers, there will need to be Sassalls — questioning, listening, hastening to serve and soothe. Peabody said: "The secret of the care of the patient is caring for the patient." And Berger makes a similar point:

> Some of the young who decide to become doctors are at first influenced by this ideal. But I would suggest that one of the fundamental reasons why so many doctors become cynical and disillusioned is precisely because, when the abstract idealism has worn thin, they are uncertain about the value of the actual lives of the patients they are treating. This is not because they are callous or personally inhuman: it is because they live in and accept a society which is incapable of knowing what a human life is worth.

Before we simply sigh and put Berger's book away, responsible medical educators might consider using it as a text in medicine and perhaps as the best examination for admission to medical school. Anyone who reads it unmoved should not become a doctor;

> We give the doctor access to our bodies. Apart from the doctor, we only grant such access voluntarily to lovers—and many are frightened to do even this. Yet the doctor is a comparative stranger.

There is another aspect to Berger's deep, thoughtful commentary. He correlates the dilemma of the doctor's questioning to humanity's quest, and here he makes equally striking observations. In a not unlikely analogy he sees Sassall as a creation of Conrad's—an ex-navy officer, living a shipboard life, whose interim existence is of the same questing nature of Conrad's heroes:

> The rooms remind one of a ship's officer's cabin. There is the same cosiness, the same ingenuity in fitting many things into a small space, the same odd juxtaposition of domestic furniture and personal effects with instruments and appliances.
> It is as though time became the equivalent of Conrad's sea: the sickness the equivalent of the weather. It is time which can promise "the peace of God" and which can lash and destroy with "unimaginable" fury. Again, I am forced to use what may be a clumsy metaphor in the attempt to define a hidden, subjective experience—the generalized impact on a doctor's imagination of the suffering which he meets almost daily and which cannot be settled by writing prescriptions.

Not merely the analogue of Sassall to Conrad heroes but the stuff of which we ourselves, every day, doctor or patient, search for and seek—the roots of life and its meanings:

> It is impossible to say now whether this period of crisis was induced by his decision to examine within himself the basis of what up to now he had projected outwards as "the unimaginable," or whether he entered a period of crisis and therefore decided to look more closely at himself. Either way it bears some resemblance to the period of isolation and crisis which precedes in Siberian and African medicine the professional emergence of the shaman or the inyanga. The Zulus have a name for this process. The inyanga, they say, suffers because the spirits will give him no peace and he becomes "a house of dreams."

A beautiful book. Sociologists have said all this about doctors and the doctor-patient relationship and the divergence of expectation of the two. But there is a world of difference between Berger's creative presentation and a sociological document: the difference between Oscar Lewis and Zola, for example, on the culture of poverty.

MAGIC NIGHT AT THE REFORMATORY

We're here because we're here, and the gray-haired salesman begins
Our act with coins, plucking them out of the air
With his white fingers;
And in this room, in this building, in a reformatory,
All the young men sit still in their folding chairs
To see him making
Something from nothing. When he coughs, the coins spill out of his [illegible]
Into a nickel-plated bucket. He grins.
What am I doing
Grinning here with the others, shaking, waiting my turn,
Sweating it out at the edge of the platform?
The trick is showing
Your teeth at the right time. What Every Boy Should Know.
The applause goes on, then off; they pass it out,
Then jerk it back,
Looking around to see what the others are putting or taking.
The money shines in their eyes; they purse their mouths.
Now the fat banker
Is tearing a newspaper down and crossways, dividing
Who from How and cutting the bad news
In half again and again
To a wad the size of a wallet and then unfolding it whole.
"For God's sake, don't teach them anything they can use,"
The warden said,
"And no female assistants." Deadpanned, they slump in their seats,
Not being fooled, not being taken in.
The doctor cuts a rope,
Knots it, restores it, and bumbles offstage, dropping his scissors.
The architect conjures doves from a warming pan,
And one flaps up,
Goes skittering around the windowless room, flies back
To become a squab which he gnaws for an exit.
And then I'm on
With only a deck of cards, watching my hands grow thick
Through waterfall and accordion shuffles, fans,
Sloppy arm-turnovers,
And color changes I learned when I was too young and too lucky
To get arrested except on Hallowe'en.
I remember friends
Who taught me to steal books, then how to write them.
What kind of sleight of hand will work tomorrow?
What kind of example
Were we supposed to be? The white, Indian, and Negro Faces are watching to see what we can do,
If anything—
Production, destruction, restoration, illusion, manipulation,
With no intermission, with nothing usable
In a house of correction,
And I finish by throwing cards with a flick of the wrist, skimming
One after the other over their heads
And into the dark
At the back of the room where they smack into the wall, then drop
To the floor like sparrows conking themselves on glass.
The random applause
Says nothing to anyone. The lights go on. One Indian
Is trying to throw a card with a flick of the wrist.
It sticks in his fingers.
And we, the nervous Society of American Magicians,
Cluster to talk about ourselves. The guards

Reform the audience
And file it loud and long through a corridor, to vanish.
Under the floodlit night, we stroll to the gate
Which opens as if by magic.

DAVID WAGONER

What's That in the Tank?

THE TIME OF FRIENDSHIP. By Paul Bowles. Holt, Rinehart & Winston. 215 pp. $4.95.

CHARLES T. SAMUELS

Mr. Samuels, who teaches at Williams College, is at work on a critical study of Henry James.

Paul Bowles's previous collection of short fiction, published seventeen years ago, was dedicated to "my mother, who first read me the stories of Poe," but Bowles improved on his master. With muted prose, he refined Poe's menacing but frequently hysterical atmosphere, while his tropical and African settings provided a more plausible backdrop for terror than Poe could dream up in his New York Grub Street. More important, Bowles writes out of an ironist's vision of human bestiality, whereas Poe writes mostly for emotional effect. Nevertheless, master and pupil share defects of clarity and variety which are as evident in Bowles's new stories as in The Delicate Prey.

"Doña Faustina" begins its black course in a way Poe might have envied ("No one could understand why Doña Faustina had bought the inn."), and its puzzles create progressive anxiety. What ripples the water from the bottom of Doña Faustina's tank? Why does she allow a mestizo interloper to rape her, and what did she feed him before the act?

Bowles's answers are appropriately awful. The lady bought the inn for the purpose of hiding kidnaped babies, the tank contained crocodiles to which she fed their corpses, and her banquet d'amour was a baby's heart. The heart should have conferred "the power of thirty-seven" (presumably babies) on the offspring of her violation, but the significance of so bizarre an act is still in doubt by the end of the tale. Doña Faustina's son does become so strong and cunning that he is made a police colonel, but when he captures thirty-seven bandits in a stunning coup, he lets them go. Did Bowles intend a joke about the unexpected effect of witchcraft (including a parody of the Resurrection: the boy's name is Jesus Maria) or a warning against exotic diets? The ending encourages facetiousness, but the rest of the tale is too sinister to be taken for comedy.

More characteristic but equally puzzling is "Tapiama," about an American photographer in the tropics who lets himself be taken to an island cantina, where he gets drunk and encounters some ominous denizens. As events become more phantasmagoric, the hero's desire to attain freedom through self-abandonment seems to fail him. Challenged to remain, he loses heart; but when he tries to row himself back to his hotel he gets lost, only to be picked up by five men who refuse him return. Instead they insist that he repeat the sound of a talking bird that caws "Idigaraga" at them from a nearby tree.

His experience is a nightmare "whose painful logic he followed with the entire fiber of his being, without however, once being given a clear vision of what agonizing destinies were at stake." After creating the experience with great power and vividness, Bowles leaves the reader just as perplexed. The five men tell the photographer that the bird is one which invades others' nests and bemoans its unpopularity when expelled, but any parallel that might be drawn to the hero is confounded by his unbirdlike passivity and indifference.

A third evocative tale is more deft in characterization and complex in structure. "The Hours After Noon" concerns a pension proprietor described, in the first section, as a woman whose dissatisfaction with her present makes her hate the romantic past which throws it into low relief. The story's epigraph (from Baudelaire), a pattern of statements and verbal echoes, bits of action and décor—even the heroine's name (Mrs. Callender)—all point to a serious consideration of time and memory; but the plot scarcely articulates the theme. Mrs. Callender nearly causes an affair between her daughter and a roué guest by warning the girl against a surrender which would, in effect, repeat her own past. However, the affair doesn't come off, while the girl becomes involved but quickly uninvolved with another man. Nevertheless, the story concludes with the roué's murder, though Bowles makes it difficult to know who killed him and why.

Seldom does one encounter stories so carefully composed, with atmosphere so commanding, prose so fluent, and purpose so little ascertainable. One walks through a dream where everything is simultaneously vivid and muffled. There are exceptions, like "The Wind at Beni Midar," a gruesome anecdote about superstition, and "The Hyena" and "The Garden," parables whose ironic dispatch provides especially sharp versions of Bowles's belief that evil is unconquerable. Other tales like "The Successor" and "A Friend of the World" are clearly conceived, but they are too slight to relieve the book's mood of indefinite malaise.

The title story, about a Swiss schoolteacher wintering in Algeria, who befriends a street urchin, is the volume's one substantial success. Making the boy her factotum, the schoolteacher inspires "an attitude of respect bordering on adoration . . . [which] never altered unless she inadvertently tangled with the subject of Islam. . . ." Beneath her friendship and charity, unacknowledged but determinant, is a sense that the boy is culturally inferior, as well as poor. Trying to train him in the civilized religion of the Nazarenes, the schoolteacher fails, but she thinks she has attained a truer understanding of Slimane, the street urchin.

Throughout their friendship, she knew that the worsening Algerian War would soon make her vacations impossible. What she did not know was that Slimane longed to reach a city where he could take part in it. When she is finally expelled by the French, the tearful boy insists on accompanying her to her place of departure. By allowing him to bid his friend goodby however, she has unwittingly provided him with the chance to be killed by the very civilized people she had wanted him to emulate. As her train pulls out, she wryly thinks: "If only death were absolutely certain in wartime. . . . the waiting would not be so painful."

"The Time of Friendship" is the best story Bowles has published, but it is so absolutely atypical, both in its realistic cultural implications and in its tenderness, that it prevents us from making any generalizations about his art. When I reviewed Bowles's most recent novel in 1966, I recommended that we reconsider this once celebrated writer who had grown into a neglected middle age. Up Above the World was also neglected, and I now think I know why. Save for the title story, the new collection reveals neither development nor deepening. Bowles's style is still masterly in its maintenance of tension. His vision is still acerbic and his inventions exotic. But his significance still shimmers fitfully; and when we reach the bottom, it seems either shallow or stagnant. There may be a crocodile down there, but if his teeth haven't gone bad they still chew the same stuff.

Upheaval in a Chinese Village

FANSHEN: A Documentary of Revolution in a Chinese Village. By William Hinton. Monthly Review Press. 637 pp. $12.50.

C. P. FITZGERALD

Mr. FitzGerald teaches Far Eastern history at Australian National University. He is the author of Birth of Communist China and, most recently, Concise History of East Asia (both Frederick A. Praeger).

Fanshen is an extraordinary book; it was beyond expectation that twenty-one years after the end of the Second World War there could still appear a work by a first-hand observer of the early phase of the Chinese Communist Revolution, the land distribution which followed the surrender of the Japanese armies in China and was concurrent with the civil war which ended the Nationalist rule. The book covers these years, late 1945, 1946 and 1947, down to the end of 1948, when the final triumph of the Communist People's Liberation Army was a foregone conclusion.

The scene is the village which Mr. Hinton translates as "Long Bow Village" (a slightly pedantic rendering, as if we were to call a Fletcher Street, Arrow Maker's Street). This village is examined in great detail, the lives of its inhabitants are related from the years before the war, through the Japanese occupation, and then through the momentous happenings of the early revolutionary phase. Hinton knew these people, interviewed them and recorded their stories, judged their characters. The book is a true documentary based on very copious notes, which after many years of legal obstruction at last became available to the author and permitted him to produce this invaluable report.

It will, one may hope, dispose of many myths, both those of the Left and of the Right. Peasants undergoing revolutionary changes, and their local leadership, appear neither as pure heroes of the people, nor yet as devils of destruction and subversion but as human beings still inspired with hopes, still divided by jealousies, greed and fear, still apt to take advantage of their new authority, and yet struggling out of their ignorance and limited lives to create something new and fundamentally different from the age-old pattern of rural existence in China.

All this, as observed in Long Bow, went on in the province of Shansi, which before the war was always called the "model province," because it had no civil wars and kept out of those of other provinces; it had much less banditry, and had made some development of communications and some industrial progress. Hinton does not refer to these facts, which put the story he tells into an even sharper light. For in the "model province," it is now all too clear, the ancient oppression of the poor by the rich, the subjection of the peasantry to the rural landlords was as cruel and as prevalent as anywhere else.

Even so, as he notes, Long Bow had an unusually mixed population; there were many families who had come to this mountain village from the plains of Hopei—where the armies countermarched year by year, and even from Shantung. These people were in fact refugees from the even greater evils of life in their native districts. Instead of huge bandit armies and the scarcely better forces sent out to fight them, they found in Shansi and in Long Bow settled landlords, still ruling the village, and in the ancient manner. There might as well have been no republican revolution in 1911. In Long Bow life was unchanged since time immemorial.

The Japanese invasion, which divided the people into collaborators and resistance, was the first shock; the surrender of Japan and the coming of the Communist forces, the incorporation of the village into the Liberated Area of the Shansi-Hopei-Honan-Shantung Border Region, one of the largest areas which by the end of the war had become a Communist Liberated region, was the second and decisive transformation. Land reform began at once; the landlords, not very numerous, but owning more than half the lands in the village, were dispossessed, in some cases slain, and in almost all cases driven away with nothing but their clothes. The close connection between collaborators and landlords helped to give a touch of extra ferocity to this phase.

The movement was still in the hands of the peasants, mostly poor peasants. The local Communist Party had not yet been formed, the district party machine was not yet in control of the rural villages. As Hinton truly says, this phase could have turned out as no more than a "jacquerie," an ill-organized, spontaneous uprising of the most oppressed, and would infallibly have been destroyed through its own lack of cohesion and program for the future had not the Communist Party come onto the scene and, over three years, gradually instilled discipline, order and a step-by-step program for rational land division and economic progress. One all-important fact emerges with perfect clarity; the Chinese agrarian revolution was spontaneous; the consolidation of that movement into a social and political revolution was the work of the Communist Party, and without that organization it would never have succeeded. This is a fact which should be pondered in other countries in Asia.

The Chinese Communist leaders were from the first aware of the difficulties and obstacles that must be overcome. It is perhaps ironic today to read the following quotation from Liu Shao-ch'i, the much abused "top party person." In his book, How To Be a Good Communist, Liu writes:

> . . . even if the opposition and rebuff of the great majority of people force him (the Communist) into temporary isolation—glorious isolation—and even if on this account he may be endangered he will still be able t stem the tide and uphold truth and will never resign himself to drifting with the tide. So far as he himself is concerned he has nothing to fear . . . for the sake of certain important aims of the Party and of the Revolution he is required to endure insults, shoulder heavy burdens, and to do work which he is reluctant to do . . .

Hinton shows that whatever may now be said of the man who wrote those prophetic words, this was the standard of conduct which dedicated members of the party tried to apply and often succeeded in attaining.

An interesting aspect of the life of Long Bow, which as the author says will somewhat dim the existing image of the old Chinese family, is the evidence he provides not only for vice and licentious conduct by the landlord families but also for loose morals among the peasantry. It is perhaps possible that the mixed population of Long Bow, with many residents who were not natives of the village or had parents who had migrated there, made this feature of life more prominent than it may have been in villages where the clan structure was less impaired and more stable. The influence of this factor on the struggles for land reform and revolutionary reconstruction was often significant. It is a point which helps to explain, what every visitor to Communist China observes, the obsessive puritanism of the present society.

Much must have happened in Long Bow in the past seventeen years. The meticulous sharing out of the land will have been superseded by the Co-operative Farm and then by the Commune. It would be fascinating to know, from a village so closely observed in the early stage, how these later developments were received in a community which Hinton has rendered so live and vivid to the reader that each individual and family becomes a familiar character.

Finally there is the question: What does the Cultural Revolution mean to such people, who have undergone a still more significant cultural revolution already—that which transformed them from degraded illiterates into men and women who can now read and write.

If these questions cannot be answered by the exact and objective observation of a Western scholar, all who study modern China must be grateful for what they have received, a definitive report on what really went on when the Communist Revolution came to China.

E. R. von FREIBURG

Von Freiburg is a pseudonym for a bilingual East-West writer team of two who have lived in both Germanys for many years.

For Uwe Johnson, who left East Germany in 1959, yet could never completely lose it nor find himself in West Germany, his homeland is not merely divided but kaleidoscopically splintered. In novel after novel, with endless pains, he sweeps the glittering shards of his national identity together and tries to make them function, if not as what they were, then at least as what they are or might be, knowing from the start that even this melancholy compromise must fail.

In his third novel, which could as aptly be titled "The Third Book about Uwe," he is once again pursuing the will-o'-the-wisp of Germany's truth, which always beckons from that side of the frontier where he is not, and lures him "home from home."

Truth? Well, "the things you'd call the truth, since that's how it looks to you," as Karsch says. Karsch is Uwe Johnson's alter ego, an invented West German writer who has agreed to write Achim's biography. A sort of Holy Ghost, he exists solely in his function, which is to mediate between Johnson and his subject. The subject—insofar as one can determine it, piecemeal as it is presented—is an East German bicycle champion, former Hitler youth, and later, thanks to having been star athlete and pin-up boy of the German Democratic Republic, a deputy to the People's Chamber. We get op art views of the champion and his associates, which tease the eye with bars and dots of negative description. Here we see, in not seeing, Achim's girl friend Karin:

> . . . for some time now he began sensing her presence again before he actually saw her, as though she filled an open, only temporarily covered spot in his attention with the long-expected reality of footsteps and echo and long-limbed motion; I mean: he'd recognize her from the way eyes followed her, like a furrow, as she walked from the door to the counter.

The author's preoccupation with manipulating light—literally, light—also comes through in such straightforward passages as, "The light from the small table lamps, the wind-ridden light from the street lamps and the gray radiance of night merged across his notebooks." But the expected is what Johnson never gives you. He slips you "if I see what you mean" when you were just anticipating "if you see what I mean." He cancels life in the living and admits it to objects: "In the middle of the blue crowd empty streetcars stood waiting, nonplused and yellow." Nothing is whole, all is eye-dazzling juxtaposition of fragmented approaches. The very paragraphs may suddenly be left dangling, without a period, the thought itself abandoned. The new paragraph may start unindented, in the middle of an unheralded remark from elsewhere.

The extraordinary presentation appears to be the result not of any straining for originality but of the real obstructions set up by our warring world and the objective impossibility of "getting the facts" in their entirety from either side, East or West, as long as the state of war persists. The purpose of the now-you-see-it-now-you-don't technique is presumably to eliminate the clichés that proceed from deceptive brightness—that is, light which by revealing too much actually reveals nothing.

Unfortunately, not much is revealed this way either. When Johnson shows us his hero in the flashes of a broken mirror (with so many details missing between the pieces) and tells us in effect, "We can never really find the truth about the two Germanys or anything else," we may agree if we have stuck with him to the end, but many readers will lose patience long before that; for as Johnson so disarmingly confesses on page 96, "this is not a story." It is the negation of a story, moving crabwise from one anti-climax to the next. Thus Karsch tries to describe Achim's first visit to West Berlin where he felt like a foreigner:

> Nothing invited him . . . he was as distant from them [the West Berliners] as the impression of Sunday morning from working days; there was movement all around him that left him standing still, the way Sunday stops and leaves one standing alone and helpless in lonely rooms. In this clean remoteness in this neat foreign country, Sundaylike alone and insecure.
> —Something like that perhaps? asked Karsch.

> In a way . . .

Possibly for related reasons, Rolf Schneider does not emerge in Bridges and Bars as a whole or convincing personality. One of East Germany's more gifted and versatile younger writers, best known for his competent radio plays, Schneider seems to be trying to prove in this collection of short stories that he can also juggle the unfamiliar and do literary saltos, and as a circus performer imitating the West and the past he really does succeed admirably, he amuses and diverts, although with a singularly waxen humor. One wonders: Is this his way of coping with the heartaches of being a German—by evading, rehashing, play-acting? Some of the stories so blatantly resemble famous models, from Kafka to Grass, that one is bound to assume Schneider did them as a playful exercise; one is tempted to write "very good" at the top and hand his paper back to him. Indeed, the writing is most accomplished. It is synthetic, that is all.

Two of the ten playwrights in Postwar German Theatre are Swiss, one is a Hungarian living in Switzerland, and one was a prewar dramatist. Eight of the eleven plays are one-acters, none is by an East German; and of West Germany's important writers for the stage, Rolf Hochhuth, Martin Walser and Christian Geissler are left out. The translations are excellent, but the leitmotiv of this disappointingly biased selection is the entrapped and self-pitying intellectual in the modern world, which does not give a fair picture of the German drama today. A notable treasure in the volume (apart from the three full-length classics by Kaiser, Borchert and Sylvanus) is Tankred Dorst's witty "Freedom for Clemens," about a man who prefers yearning for freedom to actually choosing it when it is offered.

Third-Party Expectations

GIDEON'S ARMY. By Curtis D. MacDougall. Introduction by H. H. Wilson. Marzani & Munsell. 3 Vols. 884 pp., $19.50.

CYNTHIA L. ADCOCK

Mrs. Adcock's studies in history and journalism have centered on American radicalism and the Progressive Party.

The notion that the Presidential election of 1968 is likely to be a repeat of 1948 appears often in the American press today. James Reston, Tom Wicker, The New Republic's T.R.B., and other columnists anticipate four candidates: a Democrat (Johnson); a Republican; a States'-Righter (George Wallace of Alabama replacing the 1948 contender Strom Thurmond), and a peace-civil rights candidate in place of Henry Wallace, Progressive Party candidate in 1948.

Indeed, many basic elements of the political situations then and now are similar. A legendary, liberal President (Roosevelt, Kennedy) died in office, and was replaced by a relatively conservative Vice President (Truman, Johnson); corn-ball humor replaced sophistication in the White House. Henry Wallace and the most prominent of Roosevelt's liberal advisers were sent into exile by Truman; Robert Kennedy and many New Frontiersmen have left Johnson's Administration. In 1948, we had escalation of the cold war to be followed by the Korean War; today we have the war in Vietnam.

These similarities make it timely to reread the story of the Progressive Party of 1948. Gideon's Army, by Curtis MacDougall, narrates the growth of the Progressive movement from Henry Wallace's defeat for the 1944 Vice Presidential nomination to his defeat as Progressive Presidential candidate. Volume I carried the story up to Wallace's announcement that he would run for President. Only the most interested reader will fight his way through the turgid repetitive prose, the succession of headline clichés in place of analysis, and the errors in punctuation that veil the author's meaning. Inexpert writing notwithstanding, MacDougall is professor of journalism at Northwestern, and was for many years a practicing journalist. He ran for the Senate from Illinois on the Progressive ticket, and has an insider's knowledge of the movement. When he narrates the Progressive campaign itself, in Volumes II and III, his writing improves markedly; we are caught up in the drama, and find that he, too, seeks to analyze the experience.

For MacDougall, "the story of the Progressive party of 1948 is one of an unsuccessful attempt to impress the electorate with the prime importance of foreign affairs as they related to world peace." The basic technique of the campaign was that of mass appeal by the national leaders, Wallace and Vice Presidential candidate Sen. Glen Taylor. The party's greatest weakness was the failure to build local organizations.

Although Communists and extreme left wingers were very active in the party, MacDougall sees their influence as generally "conservative." They restrained Wallace's tendency to rant about "Wall Street imperialism," and urged him to emphasize bread-and-butter issues rather than foreign policy. In an extensive discussion of Progressive platform writing, MacDougall shows that no clear-cut Left-Right schism existed, and his hundreds of interviews with party workers since 1950 lend weight to these conclusions.

In the story of the Progressive Party, it is the overwhelming predominance of Henry Agard Wallace which looms largest. Liberals and radicals alike made a cult of this corn-fed, apolitical, idealistic product of America's heartland, who used the rhetoric of Eastern urban radicals and the Popular Front. He gave to radicals the hope that all of America could be converted. In a chilling intimate portrait, however, MacDougall shows us Henry Wallace as cold, stingy and smug, the kind of man who could say: "I always made it clear whenever extremists were in conversation with me that I believe in God."

The naive trust with which he was received by party workers no longer exists—it cannot be granted to Robert Kennedy or any other major politician today. Nor are today's politicians likely to duplicate the innocent enthusiasm with which Wallace left his party to lead a personal crusade (he did not even put up a battle for the Democratic Presidential nomination).

Wallace was willing to leave his party because he confidently expected a large vote of approval from the American people rather than the overwhelming defeat he suffered. The expectation was for 5 million votes; 1 million were actually received. (The party won no electoral votes and only 2.38 per cent of the popular vote.)

The Progressives' aim was to demonstrate that "the United States is not behind the bipartisan reactionary war policy which is dividing the world into two armed camps." And though opposition to Truman's foreign policy was quite as widespread as is present opposition to the war in Vietnam, 1948 (and 1966 as well) demonstrate how poorly peace candidates may run.

The Progressives of 1948 believed firmly in the promise of the New Deal, and aimed at restoring a valid tradition to its rightful place. To do so a third party seemed a natural response if the two major parties were abandoning the tradition. Today the Left is bewildered and divided in its explanations for what soured the tradition. How did the enthusiasm of the New Deal welfare programs produce for millions the despondency of life on the dole? Or the war machine, built to defend us against Hitler, sow the seeds for Vietnam and for future Vietnams, with helicopters in Thailand and napalm in Peru? A third party seems self-defeating and premature to much of the Left today. From SDS to SNCC to older radicals, the Left is dissatisfied with protest techniques; it wants to concentrate on building a political movement with a commitment that will last beyond any single issue like Vietnam.

MacDougall's book makes obvious another significant difference between 1948 and our own times. In 1948 the Left was an exiled "rump" of a major party, coalesced about a single national leader-in-exile. It thus resembled the other Progressive parties of our century—Theodore Roosevelt's Bull Moosers of 1912 and the La Follette movement in 1924. Today the Left more closely resembles the early stages of the two most successful third parties in our history, the Republicans in the 1850s, and the Populists of the 1890s. Both were strongest on the local level, based on well-established protest movements led by a variety of regional organizers and bitterly alienated from the national leadership of major parties.

In 1948 American radicalism was organized about the Democratic Party. The major groups in the Progressive Party were those who had formed in 1944 to support Roosevelt's re-election. Indeed, many radicals had enjoyed Establishment status under Roosevelt. Today the civil rights and peace movements are outside the Establishment. They contend equally with Democratic and Republican foot dragging. When they turn to electoral politics, activists from both movements build their own organizations and select their own candidates, even if these run in the Democratic primary. The "CIPA" movement (Committees for Independent Political

100 Years of Fighting Stampedes*

THE NATION has managed to survive, the Decatur (Illinois) Herald observed on the occasion of our centennial, "by fighting stampedes for over 100 years."

Heading off stampedes is peculiarly American; the country has the energy and space to set hoofs really thundering. We call to mind only a few of the most irrational flights: the jingoism that plunged us into wars with Mexico and Spain, the hypocritical hysteria of Prohibition, the "uproar" of McCarthyism, "Let's Get Hoffa!," "Send in the Marines!" (to Haiti, Nicaragua, the Dominican Republic, Cuba, etc.), "We must beat the Russians to the moon," the anti-missile missile, the SST. The list is long. Some of the stampedes of the last 102 years ran over us roughshod, some we slowed a bit, some we helped to stop. But there are few we failed to challenge. If you think Bonanza is where the action is, come out on the range with The Nation.

Action) proliferates, but still only in local politics.

In the absence of a national leader-in-exile, and with radicals very skeptical of a national third party, it seems unlikely that a major independent challenge to President Johnson will develop in 1968. Liberals, dissatisfied with the war in Vietnam, are more likely to defect to the Republican Party, as the ADA recently warned the President.

The very complexity of our political society militates against new parties. No single group is strong enough to change the structure. Change must come through coalition and compromise, usually through the vehicles of the major parties. The primary election makes intra-party accommodation even more likely. The electoral-vote system, where the winner takes all of a state's votes, makes a minor party almost a hopeless cause. Since 1948, new nominating petition and vote-winning requirements for getting on the ballot have multiplied the difficulties as well.

Minor parties of course agitated for many reforms later adopted by the major parties—the convention system of nominations, woman and Negro suffrage, direct election of Senators, the income tax, prohibition, and postal savings bonds. But nonparty pressure groups engaged in similar agitation. And third parties have even more often served as burial grounds for reforms, such as the single tax, free coinage of silver, fiat money and government ownership of railroads and telegraph lines. In short, the third party is not a proven vehicle for advancing change, especially of foreign policy. Perhaps they are more often a safety valve for frustrated reformers and radicals. In a society as bureaucratic as ours, such emotional release is valuable, and Progressive Party workers remember their crusade with intense nostalgia.

MacDougall credits the Progressive Party with causing an immediate shift to the left by the Democratic Party. Today, bogged down in Vietnam, our cities filled with racial unrest, and the war on poverty ground to a halt, the change seems neither significant nor lasting. The threat of a Democratic schism did cause Truman to veto the Taft-Hartley bill, but he made no effort to prevent Congress from voting to override. Truman evinced no feeling of obligation to the Left after he was re-elected.

A successful party, minor or major, requires an organized power base, and this the Progressives lacked. Does such an independent base for a new third party exist today? Economic conditions, too, are a paramount factor in the success of third parties. When a major price drop is combined with a severe or prolonged drop in business activity, protest voting reaches new heights. When the war in Vietnam is over, will a recession follow? It is such factors, rather than any foreign policy issue, that augur the fate of a future third party. At any rate, these seem to be the lessons of 1948 for the politicians of 1968.

Heroes of a Bad Time

CHILDREN OF CRISIS: A Study of Courage and Fear. By Robert Coles, M.D. Little, Brown & Co. 401 pp. $8.50.

ROBERT BELENKY

Mr. Belenky is associate professor, Graduate School of Arts and Sciences at Boston College.

Children of Crisis is an important social document about the personal correlates of political change in the American South. Robert Coles, a child psychiatrist, spent several years in the South, first as an Air Force doctor and then as a participant observer in the civil rights struggles of the early 1960s. He became particularly concerned with the effects of these struggles on those who fought: the children, their parents and teachers, the civil rights activists and the racists. Coles lived among the protagonists, became a trusted and helpful friend to many and listened patiently to all.

> What I am trying to do [Coles explains] is describe certain lives; specifically, describe the way those lives have come to terms with the political and social changes that have taken place in a particular region of this country. . . . I have tried . . . to . . . locate my body and mind where certain citizens are up against difficult times, so that their lives, like those of the sick, may have something to teach the rest of us.

A most unusual mental health practitioner, Dr. Coles has produced a labor of love—no, a love song—to his "patients" (clinical terms don't really apply—we should call them friends, I suppose). Through them psychiatrist Coles has "gained insights" about being in touch with life and the world. He in turn has attempted to pass the message on.

But communication is not always free of clutter. Coles's perspective is sometimes uncertain. Torn between a totally involved, advocacy-of-change position and an objective, remote and scientifically correct stance, he sometimes sounds as if he is at a clinical staffing or a professorial colloquium. Most of the time, however, he resolves the conflict by saying simply what he thinks.

Coles himself manages to emerge at least as clearly as do the people he describes. He is an interesting man, ambling, comfortable, loquacious. Although he writes about revolution with considerable sympathy, there is a notable absence of strident, jarring sound. He writes as if smoking a pipe. His manner is gentle, humane, almost aesthetic. One can readily understand why people, busy in the midst of shattering crises, would choose to spend so much of their time in conversation with this man.

Coles provides us with rare opportunities to know a diverse selection of people living in the eye of the storm: Ruby, a 6-year-old Negro girl who had to brave angry mobs each day in order to attend a nearly empty classroom; a cultured white schoolteacher who almost fainted when she saw a Negro woman in the shower but who came eventually to request an integrated classroom (not really a non sequitur); a puritanical, self-denying Negro teacher who does not want integration—"we're so anxious to 'integrate' that some of us are willing to lose ourselves, to disappear"; Larry, the white liberal in conflict who came to be useful, respected, appreciated—despite himself . . . and then there were shopkeepers, professors, a grand Southern lady and others.

He discovers that little of what he sees can be understood in terms of psychopathology, either of the individual or of groups. Neither the little school children, nor the civil rights demonstrators, nor even the lynchers and burners are by and large mentally ill or in any real sense beyond the fringes of workaday encounters. And Coles concludes that participation in struggle, even when it becomes most frightening and discouraging, may have a salutary effect on the human psyche. Ruby said: "So I told Granny that as bad as they make it for us, the stronger I'll get."

But the actors are never larger than life; they are neither heroes nor villains of the monumental sort. The message that continually comes through is that, despite our expectations, people involved on all sides were perfectly ordinary—just like the rest of us. Most seemed simply to have been thrust by accident into the mainstream of history and there they managed to swim only because they weren't prepared to sink. Although most modern psychiatrists leave little to chance, Dr. Coles seems to be saying that people often happen to get caught in a tidal movement of social forces and just simply do what they have to.

On the other hand, Coles precisely discards historical determinism. People are most assuredly not passively buffeted about by circumstances but in fact create circumstances—sometimes with considerable fervor. As with everything else there seems to be a middle ground, a dialectic, and more fascinating even than the philosophy are the explorations of the people, those, for example, who buck the current: the determined Southern white liberals, sometimes secretly heroic, often by necessity openly so; or those who swim with the ebbing ante-bellum tide and must spend enormous psychic energy to maintain the conditions of a fantasy—that complex of myth and feelings known as American racism. Then there are those who change. George, although presumably still a segregationist, first torments Lois, then considers her "our nigger" and finally asks to sign her yearbook out of respect, sympathy and admiration—as well as guilt.

Coles is at his best when he describes and records. He is a fine social documenter—a journalist in the best sense—and his book is a rich provision of sensitively excavated material of the recent struggles in the South.

THEATRE

ROBERT F. SAYRE

Mr. Sayre is a member of the English Department and Center for Modern Letters at the University of Iowa, and the author of The Examined Self: Benjamin Franklin, Henry Adams, Henry James (Princeton).

San Francisco

This summer's productions of the San Francisco Mime Troupe have been Commedia dell' Arte versions of Carlo Goldoni's L'Amant Militaire (translated by Betty Schwimmer, adapted by Joan Holden), and Lope de Rueda's Olive Pits (adapted by Peter Berg and Peter Cohon). The "theatres," as has been the case for the last six years, are public parks in San Francisco and the Bay Area, where Olive Pits is done Wednesdays-Fridays and L'Amant weekends.

On the surface, this combination must seem like an awful anomaly, another San Francisco weirdy to go with jazz-poetry and cable cars. In New York, after all, "authentic" revivals of commedia are for college drama societies, the park is for Shakespeare (if possible), and Goldoni and Lope de Rueda are for Off-Broadway.

Yet in San Francisco it all works. L'Amant is an hour and three-quarters of grotesque anti-military satire, in which the analogy of the Spanish imperial army in Italy and the United States in Vietnam is quite intended and deftly elaborated. The Pantalone is a grabby collaborator who is interested in marrying his ravishing daughter to the Spanish "Generale." The Harlequin is a sweet little guy who gets tricked into enlisting and then, when he tries to get out by dressing as a woman, gets arrested as a "pervert, fairy, draft dodger"! At other moments comic Spanish soldiers strut like automated GIs and go through rifle drill with crutches. Between scenes a gravel-voiced puppet roars out anti-war ballads and leads the audience in chanting "Hell No; We Won't Go."

Olive Pits satirizes commercial agriculture, really an equally sensitive subject in this rich state. In it the Pantalone is a poor farmer who thinks he can beat the system by investing and becoming an olive grower. He turns his daughter's dowry over to a Scaramouche who steals it, cheats the daughter, and leaves him in debt at something like 75 per cent interest.

Thus, what unites the various elements of these two plays is their political purpose. Both are illustrations of the principle that any nimble, serious theatre today almost must be political. Ronnie Davis, who directs the Troupe, refers to it as "guerrilla theatre." He started it in 1959 as a sort of cell group within the San Francisco Actors Workshop, but two years later broke loose to try to play in public parks. The motto became "Commitment and Fresh Air," even though the park department did its best to stop performances and thus limit the latter. The legend is that it supports itself strictly on what its actors beg, wandering-player-like, from the audience at the end of each show; and of outdoor shows the legend is apparently true. But whatever the truth, the commitment endures and deepens. One basic reason is that any actor who will work under Mime Troupe conditions—dressing in privies or behind a truck, speaking over the noise of dogs, playgrounds and police sirens—has to be committed. (And in such places as Denver, Colo., and Calgary, Alberta, as well as the city of St. Francis, the police have committed them.)

But the Troupe is also an illustration of what may be a more important principle—that contemporary political theatre must be nonrealistic. As Viet Rock and America Hurrah are recent forms of surrealism, the Mime Troupe's commedias are a reawakening of pre-realism. The conditions of outdoor playing almost demand commedia—loud voices, typed characters, exaggerated gestures and easily followed plots (even if ornately complicated). But the reason these old commedia methods work so well is that their dramatic grossness corresponds remarkably to the actual grossness of Vietnam America: its fat malproportioned wealth, its hypocrisy and cant, its mummified code of values.

But the beautiful thing about the Mime Troupe, unlike more ephemeral kinds of nonrealistic satire, is that these classical gestures and situations are not only so peculiarly representational but also so earthy, powerful and clear. Compared to the recent spate of satirical reviews, which are sometimes described as modernized commedia or "our form of it," the Mime Troupe plays are fresher and bolder. The smartly dressed review audiences want wisecracks which will hold their attention only while the lights are out and they sip a $1.50 Scotch. To the park audiences—parents and kids and the dropouts and rejects who have always been the inhabitants of city parks in America—Pantalone, Scaramouche and the lovely busty maidens mean a great deal more than the new night-club wit. A sophisticated theatregoer will see these stereotypes as remote and historical, while a park-goer simply recognizes the types—the cheating businessman, the loan shark, and wronged and angry girls. And the basis of such a recognition is the growing knowledge—of enormous political potential—that we are, and are surrounded by, types, of which the commedia ones are a good, popularly usable index. Commedia can thus flow into our public consciousness as an improved way of seeing.

In the future, however, Mime Troupe commedias might have to discard certain other residual traces of foreign times and places. My criticism of these two productions—at least at the shows I saw—is that there are still minor difficulties in following plots and in knowing, at some moments, when and to what degree some actors are in character and when not. With another kind of theatre such troubles could be fatal. They aren't here because the Mime Troupe uses so many forms of hilarity and because the troubles are a consequence of riches, not deficiencies. The Troupe also demands its freedom to experiment, to keep trying new improvisations for each new audience. What might be done, for example, with the great gap between American hippy life and all the ancient fusses about dowries and inviting suitors to dinner? There is surely a lot of comedy to be made from such disjunctions, though requiring considerable economy to succeed without sacrificing other things. Commedia could be stronger if it were selectively further domesticated, as the Troupe did earlier with its Modern Minstrel Show: Civil Rights in a Cracker Barrel. Aren't there other formulaic characters and plots which would be more easily followed? One of the Troupe's former members, Luis Valdez, has found some by starting a grape pickers' theatre in Delano, El Teatro Campesino, which uses stock characters like the broker, the boss, the striker and the scab.

Let there be no doubt, though, that the Mime Troupe is on its way—and also on its way east this October for another tour of college and university theatres and shows at places on the underground circuit like the Firehouse Theater in Minneapolis. Above-ground San Francisco now distrusts this guerrilla troupe to the extent that neither of the two remaining daily papers has reviewed this summer's plays. I suspect there are a lot of people among the city's Dottores, Capitanos and Scaramouches who will be very glad to have it leave town for a while—which, of course, is the Old West's kind of low-down, dirty honor.

OCTOBER: DEAD STEER

"Bloated" the herdsman ascertains, and phones
the man who'll buy and render what he can.
Toward the beast stiff as a wineskin, tank-shaped,
over chewed-down grass the herd drifts in a cloud.

At last, five daylight hours since day lit—
the first among them reaches their fellow, smells him or nudges. Two others follow.
Then a dozen. They have nothing to say.

Behind them a gleaner chews the pale cornfield—hurried back and forth, its diesel roar heard never by Sidney Spenser Lodge
Jonson Milton in their Arcadies.

The crowd takes turns noiselessly to look,
real curiosity, detached and brief.
When he brings a wagonload of feed they shake their grass-stained knees and raise one voice following the herdsman where he drives, their brother left in the empty place.

Back and forth the yellow reaper runs spitting out waste, more and more field left bare.

Fed, they go on making the same bad paths, same vast immodesties, sexual blunders, doomed tries and battles: none enthusiastic.
Lick each other and, with cow hearts, keep close.

The man with the truck comes and takes away the solitude that moaned, then chilly lay like bare field, where the reaper finishing—swollen with the corn—turns off its sound.

Challenge the Draft Calls

say:

No More Men for Vietnam

More and more young Americans are saying "No" to the draft and "No" to the Vietnam war. Thousands face jail, court martial or exile because they refuse to participate in an immoral, illegal and unjust war which proceeds without the clear consent of the American people.

These courageous young men are acting for all Americans who oppose the war, but who feel powerless to stop it. For, when a government acts without consent and all petitions to reverse its action fail, then refusal to carry out unauthorized governmental orders is the fundamental obligation of citizens in a democracy.

saintly sadism

New York City
Dear Sirs: "Pornography and Violence" [The Nation, Aug. 14] was most interesting. As I read of Pamela Hansford Johnson's equation of violent crime and "obscenity," I recalled an experience I recently had at the home of a friend. I was examining the titles of books on his bookshelves, and noticed a collection of beautifully bound antique hagiographies.

In my naiveté, I mentioned that I didn't know he was so religious. . . . He laughed, and told me he made extra money xeroxing reproductions of pages from those volumes, and photostating paintings and etchings of the death agonies of various martyrs. . . . He proceeded to show me dozens of old prints, depicting various martyrs in the most exquisite agonies, with blood, swords, arrows, gore, gouged-out eyes, and the like.

This brought home rather pointedly that one man's pornography may be another man's art—or even religion. It also indicates that tendencies toward gore and violence are often developed through other sources than those usually damned by the reformers.

Dear Sirs: Richard J. Walton's "Memorandum to John Daly" [The Nation, Aug. 28] is well taken. We need editors who are willing and able to expose America for what it is. Only through enough such critical commentary will we ever be in a position to move this country in the right direction, and hopefully make an America that we can truthfully be proud of.

Peter Adams

rat preserver

Palo Alto, Calif.
Dear Sirs: The rats have their friends in the House of Representatives. That august body recently rejected a bill giving $40 million over three years to city programs fighting rats. Among the friends of the rodents was one Joel T. Broyhill (R., Va.), who reportedly said that the "'rat' smart thing" for the House to do was to vote down "this rat bill 'rat' now."

How can the Congressman joke about such a bill and then have the nerve to condemn righteously the citizens of the ghetto gouging grocery store or slum tenement—rat infested, no doubt. Oppose the bill? Perhaps—on some ground such as the possible developing of a welfare boondoggle. The result of this opposition would be, however, a refusal to protect "the poor children of America," as the President put it.

These children are the chief victims from rat bites, which in many cases are fatal and in most cause lasting and severe injury. Congress routinely votes funds to protect cattle and crops from rodents. Why can't it do as much for children? Certainly, statistics of rat bites and of rat damage (totaling some $900 million a year) amply demonstrate the need for the bill. So do riots which have raged in American cities.

But joke about such a bill? Outrageous—and enough to make poor Tom Jefferson turn over with shame in his Monticello grave. One hopes that the House will reconsider as the President has requested.

As for Virginia's Congressman Broyhill—sic semper stupidity.

What Development Decade?

In 1961, President Kennedy announced the "Development Decade" with almost as much fanfare as the trip to the moon. By "development" he meant foreign aid that would start poor countries, if not on the road to affluence at least away from the road to starvation. Helped by the United States, which generates more than half of the new capital of the world, the underdeveloped countries would learn to help themselves. Mr. Kennedy's idea was that each of the advanced nations would contribute 1 per cent of its income to those lagging in the technological race, or not yet in the running. It was a humane and statesmanlike goal—and it is going downhill so fast that soon it will be only a token effort.

The figures tell the story. In 1949, the commitment for foreign aid totaled $7.2 billion. On the basis of 1 per cent of gross national product it would still be at that level, or somewhat higher. Instead, the Johnson Administration asked for $3.4 billion, which the Senate cut to $2.6 billion. The House was supposed to narrow the gap, and it did, but not by much. The House approved $2.8 billion, and there is no assurance that the line will be held at that figure.

What happened? Of course Vietnam, with its tidy little war budget of maybe $30 billion (who knows actually what it is, much less what it will be?) accounts for Congressional reluctance to spend on anything else. But Vietnam is not alone to blame. The foreign-aid program has been contaminated from the outset by strategic considerations. The primary aim has been to fight the cold war with what used to be called "dollar diplomacy," and the needs of aspiring nations have been a secondary consideration. This obliquity ate away the moral core of the program, and deprived it of the public support which it might have gained. Foreign aid, it has been said, has no constituency, which is only another way of saying that the American people, aside from some "America First" sentiment, know a phony program when they see it.

An aid program that might have worked would have been one which

(1) was not guided by military considerations;
(2) was free of cold-war motivations—"keeping them on our side," etc.;
(3) was likely to get through to the people; if it was only going to make the rich richer there would be no aid;
(4) was not to be used to prop up right-wing dictatorships because Washington was nervous about a possible left-wing uprising.

These specifications are a description of what foreign aid, as it actually developed, is not. And so, as The New York Times put it editorially, "the aid authorization for 1968 will be a disaster—a disaster for hungry peoples and struggling new nations; an even greater disaster for the stature, the good faith and humanitarianism of the United States."

To make things worse, the House passed an amendment offered by "the incredible" H. R. Gross of Iowa, as the Times refers to him—but he had the votes. Invoking "our boys in Vietnam," Gross called for retaliatory action against nations which are giving aid to North Vietnam. One effect of the amendment would be to withdraw "most favored nation" treatment from Poland unless the Poles halt shipments to North Vietnam. Actually, the nondiscriminatory treatment of Poland has redounded to the advantage of the United States in trade and settlement by Poland of American claims, but what does that mean to Gross and other Congressmen with his motivations?

JUN 8

Partly through right-wing politicking and partly through its own defects, foreign aid is in grievous trouble. A switch of only five votes in the House would have torpedoed it altogether. It will be extremely difficult to get Congress to do what it should have done long ago in the field of foreign aid. Now it must compete with the war in Vietnam and the slum programs, and of course with the perennial pork-barrel preoccupations of Congressmen. The only hope, in this fiscal year and the next, is that the wretched American adventure in Vietnam can be ended, and some of the funds can be allocated to a genuine development program based on proven and workable plans and techniques, in a disinterested fashion, dissociated from the cold war. That is a large order, but the experience of the years since President Kennedy made his proposal shows that nothing less will serve.

The Case of Greece

Some of the U.S. policies which have helped to eviscerate foreign aid border on the grotesque. King Constantine of Greece and Queen Marie came to this country as stealthily as reigning monarchs can, their purpose being to get President Johnson to order full resumption of arms shipments. Senator Symington, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Subcommittee that has jurisdiction over U.S. relations with that part of the world, advanced the threadbare rationale for supporting military dictatorships. We don't like such regimes, the formula runs, but we must never forget our cold-war interests, therefore we must keep a foot in the door while urging them to be a little less vicious. If we really suspended military aid to the Greek military regime, Senator Symington said anxiously, there would be no need for us to keep a military mission there, and our influence with the Greek generals and colonels would disappear. Let not U.S. policy be "set in concrete," he urged. All this has been heard time and again before, but to the Symingtons and the Rusks and the one and only Lyndon B. Johnson it is still persuasive. The time to have used our influence was in April, when the generals staged their coup, but at that juncture our statesmen were indeed set in concrete.

As part of the current softening up process, Americans of Greek background have been invited to Greece and subjected to lavish hospitality in an effort to put a good face on the dictatorship when Their Majesties came to beg for more arms. Rep. John Brademas (D., Ind.) and Rep. Peter N. Kyros (D., Me.) were among those so honored. The food and libations were excellent; even so, Mr. Brademas was not swept off his feet. He feels it would be wise to maintain the suspension of arms deliveries, at least for the time being.

Sen. Joseph S. Clark called the turn on all this in a speech (August 21) in which he pointed out that prior to the coup he had filed a report based on a visit to Greece, in which he concluded that military aid should be terminated, since the need for it no longer existed. If this was true before the seizure of power, the only reason for resuming deliveries now would be to placate the generals and make it easier for them to continue intimidating the Greek people. As Senator Clark shrewdly pointed out, the policy of watchful waiting, with a reserved but indulgent attitude toward the dictators, always gives way sooner or later to the policy of business as usual, and that is what is happening now. Since World War II we have given billions to Greece—$1.5 billion in military aid alone—and to what end?

The trains may be running on time in Greece, as they were said to run in Fascist Italy, but Mussolini was a tower of intellect compared with the Greek generals. Their notion of reviving the Greek economy is to build a luxury cemetery in Athens. Their idea of government is to ban mini-skirts and beatnik haircuts, and performance of plays by those well-known Bolsheviks, Euripides and Aeschylus. One of their recent enactments is a ludicrously detailed regulation on the display of the flag; a household that fails to fly the colors faces arrest unless it can produce a certificate to the effect that the stores are sold out. Cabinet ministers of previous regimes, however conservative, are being jailed in considerable numbers; some 2,400 political prisoners are detained on the island of Yigura alone. The repression is as stringent as any seen in modern times.

The one thing that can be said for it is that it is frank, possibly because the ministers lack the wit to dissemble. Said Colonel Papadapoulos of the Prime Minister's office, known as Papa Doc because of his addiction to medical metaphors: "We are dealing with a patient on the operating table; unless he is tied down he cannot have the operation that will save him from death." Anyone who takes exception to the comparison does so at his peril.

The King came quietly, but from the spirited Melinda Mercouri he and his entourage got the reception they deserved. Stripped of her citizenship in absentia, Miss Mercouri told off Colonel Pattakos, a member of the junta: "I was born a Greek and will die a Greek. Pattakos was born a Fascist and will die a Fascist." She could not deliver her message to the King when he appeared at the UN, but she asked him whether he was "with the Mickey Mouse colonels or with the Greek people?" The King's conduct leaves no doubt on that score.

The sad truth is that the Greek people are not our main concern, if we think of them at all. As Sen. Stephen Young put it: "If some ragtag group in Greece, involving some alleged Communists, had taken over by force, as did the Fascist-minded generals and colonels, our State Department officials would have immediately bestirred themselves and either intervened or threatened to do so, and would have had our Sixth Fleet nearby to take action if necessary." The Senator added: "Sooner or later the people throw out dictatorships. Our State Department would do well to keep this in mind instead of instantly recognizing dictators who overthrow constitutional governments."

It is sound advice, but what is more likely is that arms shipments to Greece will be resumed. And so, with the distinction between military and economic aid already blurred, foreign aid in any form will receive another blow.

The Case of Iran

Besides Their Greek Majesties, we have been honored by the presence of the Shah of Iran, His Imperial Majesty Mohammad Reza Shah Pahlavi, Shahanshah (King of Kings). The arrival of this visitor is as predictable as the World's Series, but rather more one-sided. So far, the Shah has taken us for $1.75 billion in economic and military grants and loans: specifically, last year the gifts stood at $1.2 billion and the amount owed on loans at $380 million, with some miscellaneous items too small to count ($170 million).

When he is in this country, the Shah is the most affable of commoners. Listening to his descriptions of "this king business" (which, he avows, has given him nothing but "headaches") one can hardly help feeling sorrow for him. It comes as something of a shock to learn via the news weeklies that the Shah has accumulated a personal fortune of over $200 million, presumably by nickels and dimes saved from the $250,000 expense account donated by his grateful subjects. Aided, no doubt, by wise investments.

The only time the Shah deviates from democratic simplicity is in his bath. "Ordinary sumptuosity," we are told, is not for the Shah. M. De Lacour, the famous Parisian tub artist, was hard put to it, but he finally succeeded in designing a satisfactory vessel for His Majesty's ablutions. The walls are of crystal, the illuminated bottom gives the bath water (he uses water) prismatic colors, the tap, fixed on a panel of marble, is concealed in a gilded bronze dolphin with ruby eyes. The Paris Herald Tribune of June 28 has supplied the information about this marvel of modern plumbing, combined with artistry commanded by a few fortunate medieval monarchs.

However, the Shah, while self-indulgent in this small matter, is a man on whom the burdens of state weigh heavily. On this last visit to Washington he had a special mission—to obtain delivery of a second squadron of the latest U.S. 16F-4D Phantom Jets, $40 million net. It seems we have been a little tardy because of the circumstance that we are fighting a small but difficult war in Vietnam. But, although the situation on such deluxe aircraft is tight, the Shah will get what he wants. He is "our friend" in the Middle East, a "stabilizing influence" and all that.

We will also give him some help in the line of water resources. He is said to have done wonders with dams and reclamation projects. It is strange, what with all his good works and democratic ways, that he is universally detested by Iranian students abroad. By some odd perversity, they demonstrate against him and do not behave at all like loyal subjects.

Although Uncle Sam is the Shah's leading benefactor, it must not be supposed that His Majesty relies on us alone. There was a time when he did, but no longer. He now has a fine deal with the USSR, the background of which was explained by Majid Tehranian ("Iran: Politics of Anti-Americanism," The Nation, October 24, 1966). The Shah will supply the Soviets with $15 billion in natural gas over a fifteen-year period, with the Soviets putting up the cash for the pipe line. The Soviets will also build a $200 million steel mill at Isfahan, and supply the Shah with $100 million in "unsophisticated" military hardware. Washington is worried about this, a bit, but since there has been no substitution of weapons systems and we expect to continue supplying the sophisticated stuff, everything is expected to come out all right. He is "our man"; at least we have a piece of him, and he has a piece of us, a bigger one in fact. By all indications he will never want, either for crystal bathtubs or supersonic jets.

Problem Behind the Problem

Society, like other natural bodies, survives by compensation: when federal leaders lose their senses, nonfederal leaders react with extra balance. Recently President Johnson sent a tough memorandum to the Senate Labor Committee demanding that members kill a proposed $3 billion emergency job program, partly as an economy move and partly out of pique because the proposal hadn't come from the White House. On the very day that the press discovered the existence of this memorandum, about 1,000 labor, financial, church and municipal leaders were meeting in Washington as the "Urban Coalition" to develop a program that they hoped would result in at least a million jobs and in other ways minister to the ghetto poor.

Any group is impressive that includes David Rockefeller, Henry Ford, George Meany and Walter Reuther, all pulling in the same direction. There were some complaints from Negro militants—who weren't invited—that the group was made up almost totally of establishmentarian fatcats. But as a matter of fact, labor-management-finance-church fatcats are the only ones with the leverage for emergency action. Hurrah (for once) for the fatcats.

But the requisite cheer can only be followed by pessimism. In the first place, not even the Rockefellers and the Fords can, independent of the federal government, raise the kind of money that the salvation of the slums requires. They can make a "beginning," perhaps; but the poor have already been tossed about too much by fitful beginnings. The attack must have a budget gigantic enough to support an end as well as a beginning.

Only the federal government can supply such a budget, along with what is just as rare: the machinery for spending it. It must be a budget expansive enough to accept waste as a normal characteristic of emergencies. A certain amount of waste, if it supports flexibility, may even be beneficial; but private industry would be terribly upset at the thought. "Some may feel it unseemly to mention cost and profit when urgent human needs are involved," Ford told the gathering defensively. "The profit motive is a powerful force. It must be maintained and it can be used effectively to help solve the urban crises." However justified this attitude may be from his position, it might better be saved for those who hit the beaches in the second assault wave, or better yet the third. "Business cannot hire more people than it needs," he said, "or hire people who are not qualified to do useful work, or hire people for more than their work is worth." That is sensible talk for a normal situation, but the whole point of the Urban Coalition was supposed to be that this isn't a normal situation.

Since a Washington-size budget is the key, and since the President and several members of his Cabinet immediately made clear that they have no intention of asking for more money until the costs of Vietnam are taken care of, not one member of the Urban Coalition's steering committee can be credited with really having put into words the problem behind the problem. That is, not one mentioned ending the war. Mayor John Lindsay of New York said, "If our defense commitment . . . is blocking a vigorous effort to end those agonies [in the slums], the commitment should be reassessed." It may be a bit dodgy to refer to Vietnam as a "defense commitment," but nobody else at the conference came so close to speaking the unspeakable.

And it was only Lindsay, too, who spoke of "establishing regular communication with the Administration, the Congress, governors and state legislators"—a group he obviously considered to be as much out of touch with normal society as are the slum dwellers. Only Lindsay seemed willing to suggest that Congress' reaction to the riots so far has verged on "vengeance" and "retribution." (His words.)

Only Lindsay sounded as if he had ever really come face to face with the creatures of the ghetto; and it must have been unpleasant for some of his colleagues to be reminded that the people they were meeting to help are indeed "dirty, illiterate, alcoholic, indifferent, and antagonistic." And only Lindsay was forward enough to suggest that the social rot is not the result of a temporary error in an otherwise faultless system, but that the system itself is in fact deficient. "Simply stated, the system which has worked so well for most of our citizens," he said, "is failing the poor." That, at least, did take real courage to acknowledge.

HUAC Under Siege

Twenty-five thousand dollars a year for doing nothing is nice work if you can get it, and five members of the Subversive Activities Control Board have been getting it for some years. The appointment of Simon McHugh, husband of a former LBJ secretary, has focused attention once again on this "no-work" agency and the "non-achievement" record of HUAC as well. The only legislative product of HUAC's tawdry twenty-nine-year record is the Internal Security (McCarran) Act, which set up the SACB. But the Supreme Court in effect rendered the act inoperative by holding that the registration provisions violate the Fifth Amendment guarantee against self-incrimination. And since the Court has also ruled

THE CULTURAL COLD WAR

CHRISTOPHER LASCH

Mr. Lasch is in the Department of History, Northwestern University. He is the author of The American Liberals and the Russian Revolution; The New Radicalism in America, 1889-1963: The Intellectual as a Social Type. The article which follows will be included in Towards a New Past: Dissenting Essays in American History, edited by Barton Bernstein, to be published next spring by Pantheon Books.

Political activists in the sixties regard talk with suspicion—not without reason, since much of what is said publicly consists of lies. "May the Baby Jesus open your mind and shut your mouth." You drop out of society, or you try to revolutionize it; what you don't do is try to criticize it: American society is assumed to be impervious to criticism.

If American institutions, American politics and American foreign policy had been exposed to sustained criticism over a long period of time, it might be necessary to conclude that criticism had had no effect. But sustained criticism has barely begun, and it is too early to say that it has made no impression. It is true that the critics have not put an end to the war in Vietnam; but what did they expect? Public discussion for years had taken for granted that "Communist aggression" had to be resisted, even at the risk of nuclear war. It had taken for granted that "freedom" was engaged in a global struggle against Communist slavery, a struggle from which moral men could not hold themselves aloof. Intellectuals, who might have objected to these formulations of the issue, far from objecting to them, helped to give them general currency. Are we to conclude from this experience that thought has no effect on history? On the contrary, it has a radical and immediate effect. It is well known that an interpretation of history, shared by a whole generation, becomes a historical fact in its own right. In the fifties, an interpretation of history that defined the cold war as a struggle for cultural freedom deeply influenced events that followed.

Our situation today derives in part from the bankruptcy of social and political thought over the last five or six decades, and more specifically it derives from the bankruptcy of social and political thought during the fifties. American intellectuals, on a scale that is only now beginning to be understood, lent themselves in that time to purposes having nothing to do with the values they professed—purposes, indeed, that were diametrically opposed to them. This defection of the intellectuals goes a long way toward explaining the poverty of public discussion today.

Press and Academy

There are two kinds of intellectuals in the United States, journalists and academicians. The journalist, strictly conceived, is engaged in an imaginative act: he keeps a journal of contemporary events. Most daily journalism is now mass produced and has become, with honorable exceptions, nothing more than a job. Journalism in the strict sense survives for the most part in periodicals, politico-literary reviews addressed to a limited readership but capable, nevertheless, of exercising a good deal of influence over the ways in which issues are formulated.

The academician is nowadays a specialist almost by definition, incapable of addressing himself to public questions except as an expert, in which capacity his services are eagerly sought by government. (Those who are unwilling to become experts either do not address themselves to public questions at all or become part-time journalists.) The university is so deeply enmeshed with government that the wonder is not that it has furnished so little criticism of official attitudes but that it has furnished any criticism at all. If the university has emerged as a focus of protest, that is not so much because some teachers (particularly in the arts and humanities) still retain a critical perspective, as because the same universities which function so well as branches of industry and government have proved incacapable, by reason of their heavy investment in "research" and their bureaucratized structure, of providing a human environment for their students. The students' dissatisfaction with their own conditions spills over into politics; they see a connection, for instance, between the multiversity and the technological war in Vietnam. Student protest, in turn, may waken a belated response in some of their teachers.

The other group of intellectuals—the journalists writing for magazines of opinion—live in an environment that has no built-in institutional links with national power; none at least, that are immediately obvious. It was from this quarter, in the fifties, that criticism of the cold war and its effects might have been expected. The defection of the literary intellectuals is not something which the condition of their working lives would have led one to expect; it is thus harder to account for than the defection of the academicians. In order to understand it, one must reconstruct in some detail the events of the early fifties, the period during which the anti-Communist mentality came to dominate the intellectual community; and there is no better way of getting into the pathology of that decade than by investigating the activities of the Congress for Cultural Freedom and its affiliate, the American Committee for Cultural Freedom. Both as symptom and as source, the campaign for "cultural freedom" revealed the degree to which the values held by intellectuals had become indistinguishable from the interests of the modern state—interests which intellectuals now served even while they maintained the illusion of detachment.

From the beginning the Congress for Cultural Freedom had a quasi-official character, even to outward appearances. It was organized in 1950 by Michael Josselson, formerly an officer in the Office of Strategic Services, and Melvin J. Lasky, who had earlier served in the American Information Services and as editor of Der Monat, a magazine sponsored by the United States High Commission in Germany. The decision to hold the first meeting of the Congress in West Berlin, an outpost of Western power in Communist East Europe and one of the principal foci and symbols of the cold war, fitted very well the official American policy of making Berlin a showcase of "freedom." The United Press reported in advance that "the five-day meeting will challenge the alleged freedoms of Soviet-dominated Eastern Europe and attempt to unmask the Soviet Union's and Soviet-sponsored 'peace' demonstrations as purely political maneuvers." H. R. Trevor-Roper, one of the British delegates, noted that "a political tone was set and maintained throughout the congress." Nobody would have objected to a political demonstration, he observed, if it had been avowed as such. The question was whether "it would have obtained all its sponsors or all its delegates if it had been correctly advertised."

Politics of Freedom

The sponsors of the meeting included Eleanor Roosevelt, Upton Sinclair, the philosophers G. A. Borgese and A. J. Ayer, Walter Reuther, the French writer Suzanne Labin and Dr. Hans Thirring, a Viennese atomic scientist. Delegates attended from twenty-one countries, but the most conspicuous among them were militant anti-Communists (some of them also ex-Communists) from the European continent and from the United States: Arthur Koestler, Franz Borkenau, Lasky, Sidney Hook, James Burnham, James T. Farrell, Arthur Schlesinger, Jr. A number of the themes that emerged from their speeches would become polemical staples in the following decade. One was the end of ideology, the assertion that conventional political distinctions had become irrelevant in the face of the need for a united front against Bolshevism. Arthur Koestler announced that "the words 'Socialism' and 'Capitalism,' 'Left' and 'Right' have today become virtually empty of meaning." Sidney Hook looked forward "to the era when references to 'Right,' 'Left,' and 'Center' will vanish from common usage as meaningless." Franz Borkenau made the same point and went on to explain the deeper sense in which ideology could be said to have died.* "We are living," he said, in "the last phase of an ebbing revolutionary epoch" in which "the absurdity of the belief in perfect and logical social constructions" had been exposed for all to see. For more than a century utopian "extremes"—visions of total freedom competing with visions of total security—had "increasingly turned the history of the occident into a tragic bedlam." But having observed at first hand the devastating effects of utopianism, particularly in Russia, reasonable men had at last learned the importance of a more modest and pragmatic view of politics.

At the same time, the pragmatists who met at Berlin announced that in the present crisis a moral man could not remain aloof from the struggle of competing ideologies. Robert Montgomery, the American film actor, declared that "no artist who has the right to bear that title can be neutral in the battles of our time." Koestler said: "Man stands at a crossroads which only leaves the choice of this way or that." At such moments "the difference between the very clever and the simple in mind narrows almost to the vanishing point"; and only the "professional disease" of the intellectual, his fascination with logical subtleties and his "estrangement from reality," keep him from seeing the need to choose between slavery and freedom.

An attack on liberal intellectualism, and on liberalism in general, ran through a number of speeches. Borkenau argued that totalitarianism grew dialectically out of liberalism. "The liberal utopia of absolute individual freedom found its counterpart in the Socialist utopia of complete individual security." With liberalism in decline, intellectuals looking for "a ready-made doctrine of salvation and a prefabricated paradise" turned in the twenties and thirties to communism and "permitted themselves to be led by the nose through Russia without noticing anything of the reality." During the Second World War—which Borkenau called "a second edition of the Popular Front"—even experienced politicians allowed themselves to be deceived by Stalin's professions of good faith. "Thus in the course of a quarter century communism ran a course which brought it in contact with every stratum of society, from extreme revolutionaries to ultra-conservatives." But this very pervasiveness, by another turn of Borkenau's dialectic, meant that "the entire body of occidental society has received an increasingly strong protective inoculation against communism. Every new wave of Communist expansion led to a deepening of the anti-Communist current: from the ineffective opposition of small groups to the rise of an intellectual countercurrent, and finally to the struggle in the arena of world politics."

The attack on liberalism, together with the curious argument that exposure to communism was the only effective form of "inoculation" against it, points to another feature of the anti-Communist mentality as revealed at Berlin: a strong undercurrent of ex-communism, which led Trevor-Roper to describe the whole conference as "an alliance between . . . the ex-Communists among the delegates . . . and the German nationalists in the audience." Borkenau, Koestler, Burnham, Hook, Lasky and Farrell had all been Communists during the thirties, and it requires no special powers of discernment to see that their attack on communism in the fifties expressed itself in formulations that were themselves derived from the cruder sort of Marxist cant. Borkenau's defense of "freedom," for instance, rested not on a concern for institutional safeguards of free thought, let alone for the independence of critical thought from national power, but rather on an assertion of man's capacity to transcend the "narrow materialism" posited, according to Borkenau, by liberalism and socialism alike. The defense of freedom merged imperceptibly with a dogmatic attack on historical determin-

*References to Borkenau in the following discussion are based on a translation of his prepared address by G. L. Arnold which appeared in The Nineteenth Century for November, 1950. Borkenau also delivered an extemporaneous speech which was described by Trevor-Roper in the Manchester Guardian Weekly (July 20, 1950) as follows: "Pouring out his German sentences with hysterical speed and gestures, he screamed that he was a convert from communism and proud of it; that past guilt must be atoned for; that the ex-Communists alone understood communism and the means of resisting it; that communism could only mean perpetual war and civil war; and that it must be destroyed at once by uncompromising frontal attack. And yet, terrible though it was, this fanatical speech was less frightening than the hysterical German applause which greeted it. It was different from any other applause at that congress. It was an echo of Hitler's Nuremberg."

Arnold charged that Trevor-Roper's account created "misleading impressions." "No one would have guessed from Mr. Trevor-Roper's report . . . that one of the calmest and weightiest contributions was made by Dr. Borkenau—in writing." In dealing with this latter speech, therefore, we are dealing with what passed for calm and weighty political analysis in 1950.

ism. It is significant that Borkenau still regarded Leninism as a "great achievement"; not, however, because Lenin had contributed to the materialist interpretation of society but because Lenin rejected Marx's "fatalism" and converted socialism "into the free act of a determined, ruthless and opportunist elite." Elitism was one of the things that attracted intellectuals to Leninism in the first place (more than to orthodox Marxism); and even after they had dissociated themselves from its materialist content, they clung to the congenial view of intellectuals as the vanguard of history and to the crude and simplified dialectic (of which Borkenau's speech is an excellent example, and James Burnham's The Managerial Revolution another) which passed for Marxism in left-wing circles of the thirties.

These things not only demonstrate the amazing persistence and tenacity of the Bolshevik habit of mind even among those who now rejected whatever was radical and liberating in Bolshevism; they also suggest the way in which a certain type of anti-Communist intellectual continued to speak from a point of view "alienated" from bourgeois liberalism. Anti-communism, for such men as Koestler and Borkenau, represented a new stage in their running polemic against bourgeois sentimentality and weakness, bourgeois "utopianism" and bourgeois materialism. In attributing "twenty years of treason" to an alliance between liberals and Communists, the anti-Communist intellectuals put forth their own version of the right-wing ideology that was gaining adherents, in a popular and still cruder form, in all the countries of the West, particularly in Germany and the United States. In the fifties, this high-level McCarthyism (as we shall see) sometimes served as a defense of McCarthyism proper. More often it was associated with official efforts to pre-empt a modified McCarthyism while denouncing McCarthy as a demagogue. In both capacities it contributed measurably to the cold war.

First Aid for Britain

The Berlin meetings, meanwhile, broke up in a spirit of rancor which must have alarmed those who had hoped for a "united front" against Bolshevism. A resolution excluding totalitarian sympathizers "from the Republic of the Spirit" was withdrawn ("Professor Hook and Mr. Burnham," according to Trevor-Roper, "protesting to the end"). The opposition came largely from the English and Scandinavian delegates, a significant fact for two reasons. In the first place, it showed how closely the division of opinion among intellectuals coincided with the distribution of power in the world. In the second place, the reluctance of the British delegates to join a rhetorical crusade against communism seems to have suggested to the officers of the Congress for Cultural Freedom that British intellectuals needed to be approached more energetically than before, if they were not to lapse completely into the heresy of neutralism.

The founding of Encounter magazine in 1953, with Stephen Spender and Irving Kristol at its head—after 1958, Spender and Lasky—was the official answer to the "anti-Americanism," as it was now called, which disfigured the English cultural scene. The editors of Encounter addressed themselves with zeal to its destruction.

The new magazine lost no time in establishing its point of view and its characteristic tone of ultra-sophistication. The very first issue contained a spirited polemic on the Rosenberg case by Leslie Fiedler, whose uncanny instinct for cultural fashions, combined with a gift for racy language ("Come Back to the Raft Ag'in, Huck Honey"), made him a suitable spokesman for cultural freedom in the fifties. Fiedler had already, in "Hiss, Chambers, and the Age of Innocence," exhorted intellectuals to accept their common guilt in the crimes of Alger Hiss. With an equal disregard for the disputed facts of the case, he now went on to berate sentimentalists who still believed the Rosenbergs to be innocent. "As far as I am concerned, the legal guilt of the Rosenbergs was clearly established at their trial." From the fact of their guilt, Fiedler spun an intricate web of theory intended to show, once again, what a pervasive and deplorable influence Stalinism had exercised, for twenty years, over the life of the mind in America. Years later it turned out that the central document which had been used to convict the Rosenbergs was a crude forgery.

Even while proclaiming the "end of innocence," Fiedler was performing feats of gullibility that rivaled and even excelled the ones he attacked. Again and again, the professional cold warriors were taken in by just such "evidence" as that which convicted the Rosenbergs—evidence brought forward to prove a Communist conspiracy in the United States and a Communist conspiracy to take over the world; or on the other hand, to prove that, whereas Soviet intellectuals lived under bureaucratic control, American intellectuals arrived at their judgments quite independently of official interference. In the latter context, "innocence," the end of which Fiedler somewhat prematurely celebrated, could hardly go further than that of certain editors of Encounter, in the matter of the magazine's financing.

For a group of intellectuals who prided themselves on their realism, skepticism and detachment (qualities they regularly displayed in cogent analyses of the deplorable state of affairs in Russia), the editors of Encounter and their contributors showed a surprisingly unshakable faith in the good intentions of the American Government. It was inconceivable to them that American officials were not somehow immune to the temptations of great power. The defense of "cultural freedom" was wholly entwined, in their minds, with the defense of the "free world" against communism. Criticism of the men who presided over the free world—even mild criticism—tended automatically to exclude itself from their minds as a subject for serious discussion. These men might make occasional mistakes; but there could be no question of their devotion to freedom.

"Encounter," wrote Denis Brogan (a frequent contributor) in 1963, "has been the organ of protest against the trahison des clercs." Julian Benda's point, in the book from which Brogan took this phrase, was that intellectuals should serve truth, not power. Encounter's claim to be the defender of intellectual values in a world dominated by ideology rested, therefore, on its vigorous criticism of all influences tending to undermine critical thought, whether they emanated from the Soviet Union or from the United States. This is indeed the claim that the editors and friends of Encounter have made. As we shall see, the cold-war liberals have not hesitated to criticize American popular culture or popular politics, but the question is whether they have criticized the American Government or any other aspect of the officially sanctioned order. And the fact is that Encounter, like other journals sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom (except perhaps for Censorship, which recently expired), consistently approved the broad lines and even the details of American policy, until the war in Vietnam shattered the cold-war coalition and introduced a new phase of American politics.

Writers in Encounter denounced the Soviet intervention in Hungary without drawing the same conclusions about the Bay of Pigs. The magazine published Theodore Draper's diatribes against Castro, which laid a theoretical basis for American intervention by depicting Castro as a Soviet puppet and a menace to the Western Hemisphere. Writers in Encounter had little if anything to say about the American coup in Guatemala, the CIA's intervention in Iran, its role in the creation of Diem, or the American support of Trujillo; but these same writers regarded Communist "colonialism" with horror. The plight of the Communist satellites wrung their hearts; that of South Korea and South Vietnam left them unmoved. They denounced racism in the Soviet Union while ignoring it in South Africa and the United States until it was no longer possible to ignore it, at which time (1963) Encounter published an issue on the "Negro Crisis," the general tone of which was quite consistent with the optimism then being purveyed by the Kennedy administration.

In 1958, Dwight Macdonald submitted an article to Encounter—"America! America!"—in which he wondered whether the intellectuals' rush to rediscover their native land (one of the obsessive concerns of the fifties, at almost every level of cultural life) had not produced a somewhat uncritical acquiesence in the American imperium. A magazine devoted to the defense of intellectual freedom might have welcomed a piece of criticism on so timely a subject, all the more timely inasmuch as some of the more prominent of the rediscoverers of America (Leslie Fiedler, for example) had also written for Encounter. Instead, the editors asked Macdonald to publish his article elsewhere. In the correspondence that followed, according to Macdonald, "the note sounded more than once . . . [was] that publication of my article might embarrass the Congress in its relations with the American foundations which support it." When the incident became public, Nicholas Nabokov, secretary general of the Congress, pointed in triumph to the fact that Macdonald's article had eventually appeared in Tempo Presente, an Italian periodical sponsored by the Congress. That proved, he said, that the Paris headquarters of the Congress did not dictate editorial policy to the magazines it supported. But the question was not whether the Paris office dictated to the editors; the question was whether the editors took it upon themselves to avoid displeasing the sponsors, whoever they Harry Moss (based on a chart in Newsweek) were, standing behind the Congress for Cultural Freedom. The reference to "American foundations," in their correspondence with Macdonald, seemed to suggest that the editors exercised a degree of self-censorship, partly conscious and partly unconscious, that made any other form of censorship unnecessary. It was possible that they had so completely assimilated the official point of view that they were no longer aware of the way in which their writings had come to serve as rationalizations of American world power.

Mission to India

The Congress for Cultural Freedom, growing directly out of the postwar power struggle in Europe, centered most of its attention on Europe, as did American foreign policy in the fifties, but it did not neglect the rest of the world. In 1951 it sponsored a large conference in India, attended by such luminaries as Denis de Rougemont, W. H. Auden, Stephen Spender, Ignazio Silone, Louis Fischer, Norman Thomas and, of course, James Burnham, without whom, in those early days, no gathering of the Congress was complete. The Times correspondent understated the case when he wrote that "many of the delegates are said to be former Communists, who have become critics." He noted further: "The meeting has been described as an answer to the 'World Peace Conference' supported by the Soviet Union." (The Berlin conference of the year before, it will be recalled, was also conceived as a response to Soviet "peace propaganda." Its immediate stimulus was a series of peace congresses in East Germany.)

The delegates meeting in India hoped to bring home to the nonaligned nations the immorality of neutralism. Transferred to a non-Western setting, however, the reiteration of this theme, which had gone down so well with the Berliners, led to an "unexpected undertone of dissatisfaction," according to the Times. When Denis de Rougemont "compared the present Indian neutrality with that of the lamb that is neutral between the wolf and the shepherd," one of the Indian delegates drew from the fable a moral quite different from the one intended. He pointed out that the shepherd, having saved the lamb from the wolf, "shears the lamb and possibly eats it." Many Indians boycotted the Congress because it had been "branded widely as a U.S. propaganda device." The Indian Government took pains to withhold official sanction from the meeting, and insisted that it be held, not as intended in the capital, New Delhi, but in Bombay.

It seemed at times that the Indians did not want to be free. Robert Trumbull, a correspondent of the Times, tried to reassure his readers about their "peculiar" point of view. The Indian speakers weren't really neutralists, they were only "manifesting the common Indian oratorial tendency to stray from the real point of the issue in hand." A dispassionate observer might have concluded that they understood the point all too well.

The Congress, having in any case suffered a rebuff, made no more direct attacks on neutralism in the Third World. In 1958 it held a conference on the problems of developing nations, but the tone of this meeting differed noticeably from the one in Bombay. (It was on the second of these occasions, incidentally, that Richard Rovere wrote the memorable description of the Congress for Cultural Freedom as "a worthy organization, anti-Communist and generally libertarian in outlook and associated with no government.") The conference, meeting on the isle of Rhodes, produced no notable results. Probably it was not expected to have any. Already the global struggle for cultural freedom seemed to have entered a new phase, in which the crudely propagandist flavor of the Berlin and Bombay meetings had given way to a new worldliness, a new "sophistication"—about neutralism, for example—that heralded the coming of the New Frontier. A new official style was emerging, faithfully reflected in the Congress for Cultural Freedom—urbane, cool and bureaucratic. The old slogans had become passe (even as the old policies continued). The union of intellect and power deceptively presented itself as an apparent liberalization of official attitudes, an apparent relaxation of American anti-communism. McCarthyism was dead and civilized conversation in great demand. The Congress for Cultural Freedom no longer proselytized; to everyone's delight, it sponsored conversation—bounded, of course, by the limits of rational discourse, the agreed-upon end of ideology, but with no other visible strings attached. The Congress flew people to Rhodes (a pleasant place to find oneself in the middle of an American winter) and encouraged them to participate in a highly civilized, nonideological discussion of economic development—a gratifying experience for everybody concerned, all the more so since it made so few demands on the participants. Expansive and tolerant, the Congress asked only that intellectuals avail themselves of the increasing opportunities for travel and enlightenment that the defense of freedom made possible.

Home Front Rancors

Shortly after the founding of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, its more active members set up subsidiaries in various countries. The American Committee for Cultural Freedom was founded in 1951 by Burnham, Farrell, Schlesinger, Hook and others, to hold annual forums on such topics as "The Ex-Communist: His Role in a Democracy" or "Anti-Americanism in Europe"; to "counteract the influence of mendacious Communist propaganda" (for instance, "the Communist assertion that the Rosenbergs were victimized innocents"); to defend academic freedom; and in general "to resist the lengthening shadow of thought-control." The Committee had a limited though illustrious membership, never exceeding 600, and it subsisted on grants from the Congress and on public contributions. It repeatedly made public appeals for money, even announcing, in 1957, that it was going out of business for lack of funds. It survived; but ever since that time it has been semi-moribund, for reasons that will become clearer in a moment.

Sidney Hook was the first chairman of the ACCF. He was succeeded in 1952 by George S. Counts of Teachers College, Columbia, who was followed in 1954 by Robert Gorham Davis of Smith. James T. Farrell, who took Davis' place in the same year, resigned in 1956 after a quarrel with other members of the Committee. Traveling in the Third World, he had come to the conclusion that foreign aid was a waste of money and that the Indians, for instance, believed that their best policy was "to flirt with Communists, insult us and perhaps get more money out of us." In a letter written from Turkey and published in the Chicago Tribune, Farrell insisted that American aid should be given only on condition that the recipients join the United States in "a truly honest partnership in freedom"; otherwise Americans "should retire to our own shores" and "go it alone."

Diana Trilling, chairman of the administrative committee of the American Committee for Cultural Freedom, attacked Farrell's letter on the ground that it "sullied his long record as a champion of understanding among the free peoples of the world." Anyone expressing such opinions, she said, was "not suited" for the chairmanship of the ACCF. Farrell, in resigning, said that "his travels had convinced him that he and other members had been 'wrong' in earlier struggles against Paris office policies." His statement, incidentally, suggests that the Paris office sometimes tried to enforce its own views on subsidiary organizations, in spite of its disclaimers. It also shows—what should already be apparent—that the Congress in its early period took a very hard line on neutralism.

Farrell's resignation, along with other events, signaled the breakdown of the coalition on which the American Committee was based, a coalition of moderate liberals and reactionaries (both groups including a large number of ex-Communists) held together by their mutual obsession with the Communist conspiracy. James Burnham had already resigned in 1954. Earlier Burnham had resigned as a member of the advisory board of Partisan Review (which since 1959 has been sponsored by the Committee) in a dispute with the editors over McCarthyism. Burnham approved of McCarthy's actions and held that the attack upon him was a "diversionary" issue created by Communists. William Phillips and Philip Rahv, adapting a favorite slogan of the cold war to their own purposes, announced that there was no room on Partisan Review for "neutralism" about McCarthy.

Originally, the ACCF took quite literally the assertion, advanced by Koestler and others at Berlin, that the Communist issue overrode conventional distinctions between Left and Right. Right wingers like Burnham, Farrell, Ralph de Toledano, John Chamberlain, John Dos Passos, and even Whittaker Chambers consorted with Schlesinger, Hook, Irving Kristol, Daniel Bell and other liberals. In the early fifties, this uneasy alliance worked because the liberals generally took positions that conceded a good deal of ground to the Right, if they were not indistinguishable from those of the Right. But the end of the Korean War and the censure of McCarthy in 1954 created a slightly less oppressive air in which the right-wing rhetoric of the early fifties seemed increasingly inappropriate to political realities. Now that McCarthy was dead as a political force, the liberals courageously attacked him, thereby driving the Right out of the Committee for Cultural Freedom.

The ACCF and its parent, the Congress for Cultural Freedom, had taken shape in a period of the cold war when official anti-communism had not clearly distinguished itself, rhetorically, from the anti-communism of the Right. In a later period official liberalism, having taken over essential features of the rightist world view, belatedly dissociated itself from the cruder and blatantly reactionary type of anti-communism, and now pursued the same anti-Communist policies in the name of anti-imperialism and progressive change. Once again, the Kennedy administration contributed decisively to the change of style, placing more emphasis on "counterinsurgency" than on military alliances, advocating an "Alliance for Progress," de-emphasizing military aid in favor of "development," refraining from attacks on neutralism, and presenting itself as the champion of democratic revolution in the undeveloped world.

The practical result of the change was a partial detente, with communism in Europe and a decidedly more aggressive policy in the rest of the world (made possible by that detente), of which the most notable products were the Bay of Pigs, the Dominican intervention and the war in Vietnam. The particular brand of anti-communism that flourished in the fifties grew out of the postwar power struggles in Europe and out of traumas of 20th-century history—fascism, Stalinism, the crisis of liberal democracy—all of which had concerned Europe, not Asia. The anti-communism of the sixties focused on the Third World and demanded another kind of rhetoric.

Heresy or Conspiracy

During its active years, however, the ACCF represented a coalition of liberals and reactionaries who shared a conspiratorial view of communism and who agreed, moreover, that the Communist conspiracy had spread through practically every level of American society. (It is the adherence of liberals to these dogmas that shows how much they had conceded to the right-wing view of history.) Sidney Hook's "Heresy, Yes—Conspiracy, No!," published in The New York Times Magazine in 1950-51 and distributed as a pamphlet by the ACCF, set forth the orthodox position and tried to distinguish it (not very successfully) from that of the Right, as well as from "ritualistic liberalism." Heresy—the open expression of dissenting opinions—had to be distinguished, according to Hook, from secret movements seeking to attain their ends "not by normal political or educational processes but by playing outside the rules of the game." This distinction did not lead Hook to conclude that communism, insofar as it was a heresy as opposed to a conspiracy, was entitled to constitutional protection. On the contrary, he argued that communism was a conspiracy by its very nature—a point he sought to establish by quotations from Lenin and Stalin which purportedly revealed a grand design for world conquest. Since they were members of an international conspiracy—servants of a foreign power—Communists could not expect to enjoy the same liberties enjoyed by other Americans.

The American Committee's official position on academic freedom started from the same premise. "A member of the Communist Party has transgressed the canons of academic responsibility, has engaged his intellect to servility, and is therefore professionally disqualified from performing his functions as scholar and teacher." The committee on academic freedom (Counts, Hook, Arthur O. Lovejoy and Paul R. Hays) characteristically went on to argue that the matter of Communists should be left "in the hands of the colleges, and their faculties." "There is no justification for a Congressional committee to concern itself with the question." Academic freedom meant self-determination for the academic community. The full implications of this position will be explored in due time.

"Ritualistic liberals," according to Hook, not only failed to distinguish between heresy and conspiracy, they helped to "weaken the moral case of Western democracy against Communist totalitarianism" by deploring witch hunts. Hook, like many liberals in the ACCF, essentially endorsed James Burnham's contention that this issue was a Communist diversion, conjured up to divide the forces of anti-communism. Talk of witch hunts, he argued, gave the unfortunate impression that America was "on the verge of fascism."

He conceded that some demagogues—he tactfully refrained from naming them—sought to discredit unpopular reforms by unfairly labeling them Communist. But the important point was that these activities were not the official policy of "our government," they were the actions of "cultural vigilantes." Ignorant people saw progressive education, for example, or the federal withholding tax, as evidence of Communist subversion—an absurdity which suggested to Hook, not the inherent absurdity of the anti-Communist ideology but the absurdity of untutored individuals concerning themselves with matters best left to experts. "A community has a right to decide whether it wishes to support a medical system or a school system. But it would be absurd to try to settle, by the pressures of the market place, what medical theories should guide medical practice or what educational theories should guide educational practice." Likewise it was absurd to argue that a withholding tax on wages was "a sign of a police state." "There may be relevant arguments against any general or specific form of tax withholding, but they are of a technical economic nature and have absolutely nothing to do with a police state."

Once again, the student of these events is struck by the way in which ex-Communists seem always to have retained the worst of Marx and Lenin and to have discarded the best. The elitism which once glorified intellectuals as a revolutionary avant-garde now glorifies them as experts and social technicians. On the other hand, Marx's insistence that political issues be seen in their social context—his insistence, for example, that questions of taxation are not "technical" questions but political questions the solutions to which reflect the type of social organization in which they arise—this social determinism, which makes Marx's ideas potentially so useful as a method of social analysis, has been sloughed off by Hook without a qualm. These reflections lead one to the conclusion, once more, that intellectuals were more attracted to Marxism in the first place as an elitist and anti-democratic ideology than as a means of analysis which provided not answers but the beginnings of a critical theory of society.

Hook's whole line of argument, with its glorification of experts and its attack on amateurs, reflected one of the dominant values of the modern intellectual—his acute sense of himself as a professional with a vested interest in technical solutions to political problems. Leave education to the educators and taxation to the tax lawyers. Hook's attack on "cultural vigilantism" paralleled the academic interpretation of McCarthyism as a form of Populism and a form of anti-intellectualism, except that it did not even go so far as to condemn McCarthyism itself; instead, it focused attention on peripheral issues like progressive education and the withholding tax.

Some liberals, in fact, specifically defended McCarthy. Irving Kristol, in his notorious article in the March, 1952 issue of Commentary, admitted that McCarthy was a "vulgar demagogue," but added: "There is one thing that the American people know about Senator McCarthy; he, like them, is unequivocally anti-Communist. About the spokesmen for American liberalism, they feel they know no such thing." This article has been cited many times to show how scandalously the anti-Communist Left allied itself with the Right. Kristol's article was a scandal, but it was no more a scandal than the apparently more moderate position which condemned unauthorized anti-communism while endorsing the official variety. By defining the issue as "cultural vigilantism," the anti-Communist intellectuals lent themselves to the dominant drive of the modern state—not only to eliminate the private use of violence (vigilantism) but to discredit all criticism which does not come from officially recognized experts ("cultural vigilantism"). The attack on vigilantism played directly into the state's hands. The government had a positive interest in suppressing McCarthy, not because of any solicitude for civil liberties but because McCarthy's unauthorized anti-communism competed with and disrupted official anti-Communist activities like the Voice of America. This point was made again and again during the Army-McCarthy hearings. (Indeed the fact that it was the Army that emerged as McCarthy's most powerful antagonist is itself suggestive.) The same point dominated the propaganda of the ACCF: unofficial anti-communism actually weakened the nation in its struggle with communism. "Government agencies," said Hook, "find their work hampered by the private fevers of cultural vigilantism which have arisen like a rash from the anti-Communist mood." "Constant vigilance," he added, "does not require private citizens to usurp the functions of agencies entrusted with the task of detection and exposure."

In effect—though they would have denied it—the intellectuals of the ACCF defined cultural freedom as whatever best served the interests of the United States Government. Vigilantism was bad because it competed with the experts; also because it blackened the image of the United States abroad. When James Wechsler was dropped from a television program, The New Leader (a magazine which consistently took the same positions as the ACCF) wrote: "This lends substance to the Communist charge that America is hysteria-ridden." After McCarthy's attack on the Voice of America, even Sidney Hook criticized McCarthy because of "the incalculable harm he is doing to the reputation of the United States abroad." The ACCF officially condemned McCarthy's investigation of the Voice of America. "The net effect, at this crucial moment, has been to frustrate the very possibility of the United States embarking on a program of psychological warfare against world communism." A few months later, the ACCF announced the appointment of Sol Stein as its executive director. Stein had been a writer and political affairs analyst for the Voice of America. He was succeeded in 1956 by Norman Jacobs, chief political commentator of the Voice of America and head of its Central Radio Features Branch from 1948 to 1955.

The 'Sincerity' Test

While avoiding a principled attack on McCarthyism, the ACCF kept up a running fire on "anti-anti-communism." (It was characteristic of the period that issues so often presented themselves in this sterile form and that positions were formulated not with regard to the substance of a question but with regard to an attitude or "posture" which it was deemed desirable to hold.) In January, 1953, the ACCF handed down a directive setting out the grounds on which it was permissible to involve oneself in the Rosenberg case. "[The] pre-eminent fact of the Rosenbergs' guilt must be openly acknowledged before any appeal for clemency can be regarded as having been made in good faith. Those who allow the Communists to make use of their names in such a way as to permit any doubt to arise about the Rosenbergs' guilt are doing a grave disservice to the cause of justice—and of mercy, too."

In 1954, the Emergency Civil Liberties Committee sponsored a conference at Princeton, at which Albert Einstein, along with Corliss Lamont, I. F. Stone, Dirk Struik, and others, urged intellectuals not to cooperate with "witch-hunting" Congressional committees. Sol Stein immediately announced that the ACCF opposed any "exploitation" of academic freedom and civil liberties "by persons who are at this late date still sympathetic to the cause of the Soviet Union." Following its usual practice, the ACCF proceeded to lay down a standard to which any "sincere" criticism of American life, even of McCarthyism, had to conform. "The test of any group's sincerity is whether it is opposed to threats of freedom anywhere in the world and whether it is concerned about the gross suppression of civil liberties and academic freedom behind the Iron Curtain. The Emergency Civil Liberties Committee has not met that test." The validity of criticism, in other words, depended not so much on its substance as on its adherence to a prescribed ritual of dissent—a ritual, one can see, which had a special significance for ex-Communists because it required the critic first of all to purge himself by denouncing the crimes of Stalinism, but which invariably served to blunt criticism of the United States.

On another occasion, the ACCF tried to plant with the New York World-Telegram and Sun a story, already circulated by The New Leader, that a certain liberal journalist was a "Soviet espionage agent." Sol Stein called the city desk with what he described as a "Junior Alger Hiss" story. The reporter who took the call asked whether the proper place to determine the truth of these charges was not a court of law. Stein replied, in this reporter's words, that "libel suits were a Communist trick to destroy opposition by forcing it to bear the expense of trial." The reporter then asked whether the ACCF was "upholding the right of people to call anyone a Communist without being subject to libel suits." Stein said: "You misunderstand the context of the times. Many reckless charges are being made today. But when the charges are documented, the Committee believes you have the right to say someone is following the Communist line without being brought into court." The reporter asked if Stein had any proof that the journalist in question was a Soviet spy. Stein said no, "but we have mountains of material that show he consistently follows the Soviet line."

When they took positions of which the ACCF disapproved the "ritualistic liberals" were Communist tools. When they took positions critical of the Soviet Union, the ACCF denied their right to take them. Arthur Miller in 1956 wrote a statement condemning political interference with art in the Soviet Union. The ACCF did not congratulate him; it asked why he had not taken the same position in 1949. The Committee also noted that Miller, in any case, had made an unforgivable mistake: he had criticized political interference with art not only in the Soviet Union but in the United States, thereby implying that the two situations were comparable. American incidents, the Committee declared, were "episodic violations of the tradition of political and cultural freedom in the United States," whereas "the official government policy" of the USSR was to "impose a 'party line' in all fields of art, culture and science, and enforcing such a line with sanctions ranging from imprisonment to exile to loss of job." Having dutifully rapped Miller's knuckles, the ACCF then went on to make use of his statement by challenging the Soviet Government to circulate it in Russia.

Where the Chips Fell

In 1955 a New York Times editorial praised the ACCF for playing a vital role in "the struggle for the loyalty of the world's intellectuals"—in itself a curious way of describing the defense of cultural freedom. The Times went on to make the same claim that was so frequently made by the Committee itself: "The group's authority to speak for freedom against Communist slavery has been enhanced by its courageous fight against those threatening our own civil liberties from the Right." We have already noted that the Committee's quarrel with the Right, even though it finally led to the departure of the right-wing members of the Committee, was far from "courageous." Even when it found itself confronted with cultural vigilantism in its most obvious forms, the Committee stopped short of an unambiguous defense of intellectual freedom. In 1955, for instance, Muhlenberg College canceled a Charlie Chaplin film festival under pressure from a local post of the American Legion. The ACCF protested that "while it is perfectly clear that Chaplin tends to be pro-Soviet and anti-American in his political attitudes, there is no reason why we should not enjoy his excellent movies, which have nothing to do with Communist totalitarianism." This statement left the disturbing implication that if Chaplin's films could be regarded as political, the ban would have been justified. The assertion that art had nothing to do with politics was the poorest possible ground on which to defend cultural freedom.

But whatever the nature of the ACCF's critique of vigilantism, a better test of its "authority to speak for freedom" would have been its willingness to criticize official activities in the United States—the real parallel to Soviet repression. (In the Soviet Union, attacks on vigilantism are doubtless not only not proscribed but encouraged. It is attacks on Soviet officials that are not permitted.) It is worth examining, therefore, the few occasions on which the ACCF expressed even the slightest disapproval of American policy.

In March, 1955, the Committee criticized a post office ban on Pravda and Izvestia as "unreasonable and ineffective in dealing with the Communist conspiracy." A year later the Committee deplored the Treasury Department's raid on the office of The Daily Worker. "However much we abominate The Daily Worker . . . we must protest even this much interference with the democratic right to publish freely." The ACCF criticized the Agriculture Department's dismissal of Wolf Ladejinsky and the Atomic Energy Commission's persecution of Oppenheimer, in both cases arguing that the victims had established themselves in recent years as impeccably anti-Communist. On one occasion the ACCF attacked the U.S. Information Agency because it had canceled an art show in response to charges that four of the artists represented were subversive. Diana Trilling insisted that "actions of this kind hold us up to derision abroad." She went on to question the judgment of government officials "who mix politics and art to the detriment of both."

On the other hand, when 360 citizens petitioned the Supreme Court to repeal the 1950 Internal Security Act (which created the Subversive Activities Control Board), James T. Farrell issued a statement for the ACCF calling the petitions "naive," accusing them of a "whitewash" of the Communist Party, and declaring that if freedom were left in their hands "it would have no future."

The infrequency of complaints against American officials, together with the triviality of the issues that called them forth—as contrasted with the issues against which others protested out of their "naivete"—show that the anti-Communist liberals cannot claim to have defended cultural freedom in the United States with the same consistency and vigor with which they defended it in Russia. In the first place, they concerned themselves with the actions of vigilantes at a time when the gravest threat to freedom came from the state. In the second place, even the attack on vigilantism was halfhearted; it was only when McCarthyism moved against the Voice of America that the ACCF criticized him at all, and most of the criticism came after McCarthy had already been censured by the Senate. Claiming to be the vanguard of the struggle for cultural freedom, the anti-Communist intellectuals in reality brought up the rear.

Finally, they based their positions (such positions as they took) on grounds that had nothing to do with cultural freedom. They condemned vigilantism on the grounds that it embarrassed the United States abroad and interfered with the government's efforts to root out the Communist conspiracy at home. They criticized interference with art not because they thought that the best art inevitably subverts conventions (including political ones) and is valuable for that very reason but because they believed, on the contrary, that art and politics should be "divorced."* They defended academic freedom for non-Communists only, and even for non-Communists they defended it on the ground that educators, as experts in a complicated technique, ought to be left alone to manage their own affairs.

In all of this, the cold-war intellectuals revealed themselves as the servants of bureaucratic power; and it was not altogether surprising, years later, to find that the relation of intellectuals to power was even closer than it had seemed at the time.

The Professional and the State

As a group, intellectuals had achieved a semi-official status which assigned them professional responsibility for the machinery of education and for cultural affairs in general. Within this sphere—within the schools, the universities, the theatre, the concert hall and the politico-literary magazines—they had achieved both autonomy and affluence, as the social value of their services became apparent to the government, to corporations and to the foundations.

*The popularity of the "new criticism," with its insistence that a work of art can be understood without any reference to the author's life, was symptomatic of the cultural climate of the fifties.

Professional intellectuals had become indispensable to society and to the state (in ways which neither the intellectuals nor even the state always perceived), partly because of the increasing importance of education—especially the need for trained experts—and partly because the cold war seemed to demand that the United States compete with communism in the cultural sphere as well as in every other. The modern state, among other things, is an engine of propaganda, alternately manufacturing crises and claiming to be the only instrument which can effectively deal with them. This propaganda, in order to be successful, demands the cooperation of writers, teachers and artists not as paid propagandists or state-censored time servers but as "free" intellectuals capable of policing their own jurisdictions and of enforcing acceptable standards of responsibility within the various intellectual professions.

A system like this presupposes two things: a high degree of professional consciousness among intellectuals, and general economic affluence which frees the patrons of intellectual life from the need to account for the money they spend on culture. Once these conditions exist, as they have existed in the United States for some time, intellectuals can be trusted to censor themselves, and crude "political" influence over intellectual life comes to seem passe. In the Soviet Union, on the other hand, intellectuals are insufficiently professionalized to be able effectively to resist political control. As one would expect in a developing society, a strong commitment to applied knowledge mitigates against the development of "pure" standards which is one of the chief prerequisites of professionalization.

It can be demonstrated that in the 19th century United States professionalization of intellectual activities went hand in hand with the acceptance of pure research as a legitimate enterprise, first among intellectuals themselves and then among their patrons. Only when they win acceptance for pure research do intellectuals establish themselves as masters in their own house, free from the nagging public scrutiny that naively expects to see the value of intellectual activity measured in immediate practical applications. This battle having been won, the achievement of "academic freedom" is comparatively easy, since academic freedom presents itself (as we have seen) not as a defense of the necessarily subversive character of good intellectual work but as a prerequisite for pure research. Moreover, the more intellectual purity identifies itself with "value-free" investigations, the more it empties itself of political content and the easier it is for public officials to tolerate it. The "scientific" spirit, spreading from the natural sciences to social studies, tends to drain the latter of their critical potential while at the same time making them ideal instruments of bureaucratic control.

The high status enjoyed by American intellectuals depends on their having convinced their backers in government and industry that "basic research" produces better results in the long run than mindless empiricism. But in order for intellectuals to win this battle it was necessary not only to convince themselves of these things but to overcome the narrowly utilitarian approach to knowledge that usually prevails among the patrons of learning. The advancement of pure learning on a large scale demands that the sponsors of learning be willing to spend large sums of money without hope of immediate return. In advanced capitalism, this requirement happily coincides with the capitalists' need to engage in conspicuous expenditure; hence the dominant role played by "captains of industry" in the professionalization of higher education (with the results described by Veblen in The Higher Learning in America).

At a still later stage of development, the same role is played by the foundations and directly by government, both of which need to engage in a form of expenditure (not necessarily conspicuous in all its details) that shares with the conspicuous expenditure of the capitalist a marked indifference to results. Modern bureaucracies are money-spending agencies. The more money a bureaucracy can spend, the larger the budget it can claim. Since the bureaucracy is more interested in its own aggrandizement than in doing a job, the bureaucrat is restrained in his expenditure only by the need to account to some superior and ultimately, perhaps, to the public; but in complicated bureaucracies it is hard for anyone to account for the money, particularly since a state of continual emergency can be invoked to justify secrecy in all the important operations of government. This state of perfect nonaccountability, which is the goal toward which bureaucracies ceaselessly strive, works to the indirect advantage of pure research and of the professionalized intellectuals.

In Soviet Russia, a comparatively undeveloped economy cannot sustain the luxury of unaccounted expenditure, and the bureaucracy is still infected, therefore, by a penny-pinching mentality that begrudges expenditures unless they can be justified in utilitarian terms. This attitude, together with the lack of professional consciousness among intellectuals themselves (many of whom share the belief that knowledge is valuable not for itself but for the social and political uses to which it can be put), is the source of the political interference with knowledge that is so widely deplored in the West. It is obvious that the critical spirit cannot thrive under these conditions. Even art is judged in narrowly utilitarian terms and subjected to autocratic regulation by ignorant bureaucrats.

What needs to be emphasized, however, is that the triumph of academic freedom in the United States, under the special conditions which have brought it about, does not necessarily lead to intellectual independence and critical thinking. It is a serious mistake to confuse academic freedom with cultural freedom. American intellectuals are not subject to political control, but the very conditions which have brought about this result have undermined their capacity for independent thought. The American press is free, but it censors itself. The university is free, but it has purged itself of ideas. The literary intellectuals are free, but they use their freedom to propagandize for the state.

The freedom of American intellectuals as a professional class blinds them to their un-freedom. It leads them to confuse the political interests of intellectuals as an official minority with the progress of intellect. Their freedom from overt political control (particularly from "vigilantes") blinds them to the way in which the "knowledge industry" has been incorporated into the state and the military-industrial complex. Since the state exerts so little censorship over the cultural enterprises it subsidizes—since on the contrary it supports basic research, congresses for cultural freedom, and various liberal organizations—intellectuals do not see that these activities serve the interests of the state, not the interests of intellect. All they can see is the absence of external censorship; that and that alone proves to their satisfaction that Soviet intellectuals are slaves and American intellectuals free men. Meanwhile, their own self-censorship makes them eligible for the official recognition and support that sustain the illusion that the American Government, unlike the Soviet Government, greatly values the life of the mind. The circle of illusion is thus complete; and even the revelation that the campaign for "cultural freedom" was itself the creation and tool of the state has not yet torn away the veil.

The Intellectual Front

That there is no necessary contradiction between the interests of organized intellectuals and the interests of American world power, that the intellectual community can be trusted to police itself and should be left free from annoying pressures from outside, that dissenting opinion within the framework of agreement on cold-war fundamentals not only should be tolerated but can be turned to effective propaganda use abroad—all these things were apparent, in the early fifties, to the more enlightened members of the governmental bureaucracy; but they were far from being universally acknowledged even in the bureaucracy, much less in Congress or in the country as a whole. "Back in the early 1950s," says Thomas W. Braden, the man who supervised the cultural activities of the CIA, " . . . the idea that Congress would have approved many of our projects was about as likely as the John Birch Society's approving Medicare." There was resistance to these projects in the CIA itself. To a man of Braden's background and inclinations, the idea of supporting liberal and Socialist "fronts" grew naturally out of the logic of the cold war. During the Second World War, Braden served with the OSS—next to the Communist movement itself, the most fruitful source, it would appear, of postwar anti-communism (the same people often having served in both). After joining the CIA in 1950, Braden served as a member of the California State Board of Education. He was a new type of bureaucrat, equally at home in government and in academic circles; but when in 1950 he proposed that "the CIA ought to take on the Russians by penetrating a battery of international fronts," his more conventional colleagues made the quaint objection that "this is just another one of those goddamned proposals for getting into everybody's hair." Allan Dulles intervened to save the project after it had been voted down by the division chiefs. "Thus began the first centralized effort to combat Communist fronts."

Before they had finished, the directors of the CIA had infiltrated the National Student Association, the Institute of International Labor Research, the American Newspaper Guild, the American Friends of the Middle East, the National Council of Churches and many other worthy organizations. "We . . . placed one agent in a Europe-based organization of intellectuals called the Congress for Cultural Freedom," Braden notes. This "agent" was Michael Josselson, who was born in Russia in 1908, educated in Germany, represented American department stores in Paris in the mid-thirties, came to the United States just before the war, and was naturalized in 1941. During the war Josselson, like Braden, served in the OSS. Afterwards he was sent to Berlin as an officer for cultural affairs in Patton's army. There he met Melvin J. Lasky. In 1947 he and Lasky led a walkout of anti-Communists from a cultural meeting in the Russian sector of Berlin. When they organized the Congress for Cultural Freedom in 1950, Josselson became its executive director—a position he still holds, in spite of the exposure of his connection with the CIA.

"Another agent became an editor of Encounter." The usefulness of these agents, Braden comments, was that they "could not only propose anti-Communist programs to the official leaders of the organizations but they could also suggest ways and means to solve the inevitable budgetary problems. Why not see if the needed money could be obtained from 'American foundations' "? Note that he does not describe the role of the CIA as having been restricted to financing these fronts; its agents were also to promote "anti-Communist programs." When it became public that the Congress for Cultural Freedom had been financed for sixteen years by the CIA, the editors of Encounter made a great point of the fact that the Congress had never dictated policy to the magazine; but the whole question takes on a different color in light of Braden's disclosure that one of the editors of Encounter—it is not clear whether he refers to Lasky or Kristol—had worked for the CIA. Under these circumstances, it was unnecessary for the Congress to dictate policy to Encounter; nor would the other editors, ignorant of these connections, have been aware of any direct intervention by the CIA.

On April 27, 1966, The New York Times, in a long article on the CIA, reported that the CIA had supported the Congress for Cultural Freedom and other organizations through a system of dummy foundations, and that "Encounter magazine . . . was for a long time—though it is not now—one of the indirect beneficiaries of CIA funds." (Rumors to this effect had circulated for years.) The editors of Encounter—Stephen Spender, Lasky and Irving Kristol—wrote an extremely disingenuous letter to the Times in which they tried to refute the assertion without denying it outright. They asserted—what was a half-truth at best—that the Congress' funds "were derived from various recognized foundations—all of them (from such institutions as the Ford and Rockefeller Foundations to the smaller ones) publicly listed in the official directories." What was not publicly listed was the fact that some of these "smaller ones" received money from the CIA for the express purpose of supporting the Congress for Cultural Freedom. Thus between 1961 and 1966, the CIA through some of its phony foundations (in this case the Tower Fund, the Borden Trust, the Beacon Fund, the Price Fund, the Heights Fund and the Monroe Fund) gave $430,700 to the Hoblitzelle Foundation, a philanthropical enterprise established by the Dallas millionaire Karl Hoblitzelle, and the Hoblitzelle Foundation obligingly passed along these funds to the Congress for Cultural Freedom. Needless to say, no hint of these transactions was in the Lasky-Spender-Kristol letter to the Times.

Privately, Lasky went much further and declared categorically that Encounter had never received funds from the CIA. (Later he admitted that he had been "insufficiently frank" with his colleagues and friends.) In public, however, the magazine's defense was conducted in language of deliberate ambiguity. Another letter to the Times, signed by John K. Galbraith, George Kennan, Robert Oppenheimer and Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., completely avoided the question of Encounter's financing and argued merely that the magazine's editorial independence proved that it had never been "used" by the CIA. One must ask why these men felt it necessary to make such a guarded statement; and why, since they had to state their position so cautiously, they felt it necessary to make any statement at all. The matter is even more puzzling in view of Galbraith's statement in the New York World Journal Tribune (March 13, 1967) that "some years ago," while attending a meeting of the Congress in Berlin (he probably refers to a conference held there in 1960), he had been told by a "knowledgeable friend" that the Congress for Cultural Freedom might be receiving support from the CIA. Galbraith says that he "subjected its treasurer to interrogation and found that the poor fellow had been trained in ambiguity but not dissemblance." "I was disturbed," he says, "and I don't think I would have attended any more meetings" if his entrance into government service had not ended his participation. In an interview with Ivan Yates of the London Observer (May 14, 1967), Galbraith says that he "made a mental note to attend no more meetings of the Congress." Yates asked "how in that case he could possibly have signed the letter to The New York Times." He replied that at the time, he had 'very strong suspicions' that the CIA had been financing the Congress. 'I was writing really with reference to Encounter, but you could easily persuade me that the letter was much too fulsome.' "

Whereas Lasky believes that he was "insufficiently frank," Galbraith allows that he may have been "too fulsome." His urbanity is imperturbable.

The letter was "fulsome" indeed. Moreover, it specifically dealt with the Congress for Cultural Freedom, not with Encounter, which it does not even mention by name. The letter states that "examination of the record of the congress, its magazines and its other activities will, we believe, convince the most skeptical that the congress has had no loyalty except an unswerving commitment to cultural freedom. . . . " Yet one of the signers of this statement was sufficiently skeptical to have "made a mental note" not to attend any more meetings of the Congress! And he was assuring the still unsuspecting public of the Congress' unimpeachable independence long after he had privately reached the conclusion that it was probably being supported by the CIA.

We have heard a great deal about the "credibility gap" that is supposed to have been created by the Johnson Administration; but what about the credibility of our most eminent intellectuals? As a further indication of the values that prevail among them, when the Encounter affair finally became public, Galbraith's principal concern was that a valuable public enterprise was in danger of being discredited. The whole wretched business seemed inescapably to point to the conclusion that cultural freedom had been consistently confused with American propaganda, and that "cultural freedom," as defined by its leading defenders, was—to put it bluntly—a hoax. Yet at precisely the moment when the dimensions of the hoax were fully revealed, Galbraith joined the Congress' board of directors; and "I intend," he says, "to put some extra effort into its activities. I think this is the right course and I would urge similar effort on behalf of other afflicted but reformed organizations."

What should a "free thinker" do, asks the Sunday Times of London, "when he finds out that his free thought has been subsidized by a ruthlessly aggressive intelligence agency as part of the international cold war?" According to the curious values that prevail in American society, he should make a redoubled effort to salvage the reputation of organizations that have been compromised, it would seem, beyond redemption. Far from "reforming" themselves—even assuming that this was possible—Encounter and the Congress for Cultural Freedom have vindicated the very men who led them into disaster. At their meeting in Paris last May, officials of the Congress voted to keep Josselson in his post. Lasky's resignation was likewise rejected by the management of Encounter.

Ever since The New York Times asserted that Encounter had been subsidized by the CIA, the Congress and its defenders have tried to brazen out the crisis by intimidating their critics—the same tactics that worked so well in the days of the cold war. Arthur Schlesinger leaped into the breach by attacking one of Encounter's principal critics, Conor Cruise O'Brien. Following the Times's initial disclosures, O'Brien delivered a lecture at New York University, subsequently published in Book Week, in which he referred to the Times story and went on to observe that "the beauty of the [CIA-Encounter] operation . . . was that writers of the first rank, who had no interest at all in serving the power structure, were induced to do so unwittingly," while "the writing specifically required by the power structure" could be done by writers of lesser ability, men skilled in public relations and "who were, as the Belgians used to say about Moise Tshombe, comprehensifs, that is, they could take a hint." In reply, Schlesinger at first dodged the question of Encounter's relations with the CIA by attacking O'Brien's "apparent inability to conceive any reason for opposition to communism except bribery by the CIA." When pressed, he said that "so long as I have been a member of the Encounter Trust, Encounter has not been the beneficiary, direct or indirect, of CIA funds." (The subsidies to Encounter, it is now known, ran from 1953 to 1964, although the Congress' connection with the CIA, according to Galbraith, continued until 1966.) Moreover, Schlesinger said, Spender, Lasky and Kristol had revealed "the past sources of Encounter's support" and documented "its editorial and political independence." They had, of course, done nothing of the kind. The magazine's editorial independence was not to be taken on the editors' word, and the question of its financing was an issue they had studiously avoided. Why did Schlesinger go out of his way to endorse their evasions? Presumably he knew as much about Encounter's relations with the CIA as Galbraith—probably a good deal more. How was cultural freedom served by lending oneself to a deliberate deception?

In its issue of August, 1966, Encounter published a scurrilous attack on O'Brien by "R" (Goronwy Rees). Karl Miller of the New Statesman offered O'Brien space to reply, but when Frank Kermode of Encounter (who has since resigned as editor, saying that he knew nothing of the CIA connection) learned of this, he called Miller and threatened to sue the New Statesman for libel if O'Brien's piece contained any reference to Encounter's relations with the CIA. O'Brien then sued Encounter for libel and won a judgment in Ireland. At this point, Ramparts broke the story of the CIA's infiltration of NSA, bringing a whole series of other disclosures in its wake, including the CIA's connection with the Congress for Cultural Freedom. The editors of Encounter, unable to deny those relations any longer, and threatened with heavy damages, apologized to O'Brien, retracted its aspersions on his integrity (which it now admitted were "without justification"), and agreed to pay his legal expenses.

Instruments of Policy

Throughout this controversy, the editors of Encounter have repeatedly pointed to their editorial independence, first in order to deny (by implication) any connection with the CIA, and then when it was impossible any longer to deny that, in order to prove that the CIA, although supporting the magazine, had not tried to dictate its editorial policy—or in Josselson's words, that the money had "never, never" been used "for propaganda and intelligence purposes." Spender, Kristol and Lasky, in their letter to the Times, claimed that "we are our own masters and are part of nobody's propaganda." The letter signed by Galbraith and Schlesinger declared that Encounter maintained "no loyalty except an unswerving commitment to cultural freedom" and that it had "freely criticized actions and policies of all nations, including the United States." These statements, however, need to be set against Thomas Braden's account of the rules that guided the International Organization of the CIA: "Use legitimate, existing organizations; disguise the extent of American interest; protect the integrity of the organization by not requiring it to support every aspect of official American policy."

These rules do more than shed light on the nature and extent of Encounter's editorial freedom. By publishing them at a time when they must surely embarrass the writers concerned, Braden reveals the extent of his contempt for the CIA's kept intellectuals. Whatever the intellectuals may have thought of the relation, the CIA regarded them exactly as the Communist Party regarded its fronts in the thirties and forties—as instruments of its own purpose. Most of the beneficiaries of the CIA have been understandably slow to see this point; it is hard to admit that one has been used and that one's sense of freedom and power is an illusion. Norman Thomas, for instance, admits that he should have known where the money for his Institute of International Labor Relations was coming from, but (like Galbraith, like Thomas Braden himself) what he chiefly regrets is that a worth-while work has had to come prematurely to an end. The Kaplan Fund, Thomas insists, "never interfered in any way"—which merely means that he was never aware of its interference. He does not see that he was being used, as Stephen Spender puts it in his own case, "for quite different purposes" than the ones he thought he was advancing. He thought he was working for democratic reform in Latin America, whereas the CIA valued him as a showpiece, an anti-Communist who happened to be a Socialist.

Spender has had the wit to recognize the situation (retrospectively) for what it was. "In reality," he writes, the intellectuals employed by the CIA without their knowledge were "being used for concealed government propaganda." Spender admits that this arrangement made a "mockery" of intellectual freedom. Michael Wood, formerly of the National Students Association, has written even more poignantly of his relations with the world of power. "Those of us who worked for NSA during 1965-66, experienced an unusual sense of personal liberation. While actively involved in many of the insurgent campus and political movements of the day, we were also able to move freely through the highest echelons of established power." These experiences, Wood says, "gave us a heady feeling and a sense of power beyond our years." But "to learn that it had been bought with so terrible a compromise made me realize how impotent we really were."

Sham Pluralism

What conclusions can be drawn from the history of the cultural cold war? Some of them should be obvious. Thanks to the revelations of the CIA's secret subsidies, it is no longer very novel or startling to say that American officials have committed themselves to fighting fire with fire, and that this strategy is self-defeating because the means corrupt the end. "In our attempts to fight unscrupulous opponents," asks Arthur J. Moore in Christianity and Crisis, "have we ended up debauching ourselves?" The history of the cold war makes it clear that the question can only be answered with an emphatic affirmative.

These events, if people consider them seriously and try to confront their implications without flinching, will lead many Americans to question (perhaps for the first time) the cant about American "pluralism," the "open society," etc. Andrew Kopkind puts it very well: "The illusion of dissent was maintained: the CIA supported Socialist cold warriors, Fascist cold warriors, black and white cold warriors. . . . But it was a sham pluralism, and it was utterly corrupting." A society which tolerates an illusory dissent is in much greater danger, in some respects, than a society in which uniformity is ruthlessly imposed.

For twenty years Americans have been told that their country is an open society and that Communist peoples live in slavery. Now it appears that the very men who were most active in spreading this gospel were themselves the servants ("witty" in some cases, unsuspecting in others) of the secret police. The whole show—the youth congresses, the cultural congresses, the trips abroad, the great glamorous display of American freedom and American civilization and the American standard of living—was all arranged behind the scenes by men who believed, with Thomas Braden, that "the cold war was and is a war, fought with ideas instead of bombs." Men who have never been able to conceive of ideas as anything but instruments of national power were the sponsors of "cultural freedom."

The revelations about the intellectuals and the CIA should also make it easier to understand a point about the relation of intellectuals to power that has been widely misunderstood. In associating themselves with the war-making and propaganda machinery of the state in the hope of influencing it, intellectuals deprive themselves of the real influence they could have as men who refuse to judge the validity of ideas by the requirements of national power or any other entrenched interest. Time after time in this century it has been shown that the dream of influencing the war machine is a delusion. Instead the war machine corrupts the intellectuals. The war machine cannot be influenced by the advice of well-meaning intellectuals in the inner councils of government; it can only be resisted. The way to resist it is simply to refuse to put oneself at its service. That does not mean playing at revolution; it does not mean putting on blackface and adopting the speech of the ghetto; it does not mean turning on, tuning in and dropping out; it does not even mean engaging in desperate acts of conscience which show one's willingness to take risks and to undergo physical danger. Masked as a higher selflessness, these acts become self-serving, having as their object not truth or even social change but the promotion of the individual's self-esteem. Moreover they betray, at a deeper level, the same loss of faith which drives others into the service of the men in power—a haunting suspicion that history belongs to men of action and that men of ideas are powerless in a world that has no use for philosophy.

It is precisely this belief that has enabled the same men in one lifetime to serve both the Communist Party and the CIA in the delusion that they were helping to make history—only to find, in both cases, that all they had made was a lie. But these defeats—the revelation that the man of action, revolutionist or bureaucrat, scorns the philosopher whom he is able to use—have not led the philosopher to conclude that he should not allow himself to be used; they merely reinforce his self-contempt and make him the ready victim of a new political cause.

The despair of intellect is closely related to the despair of democracy. In our time intellectuals are fascinated by conspiracy and intrigue, even as they celebrate the "free market place of ideas" (itself an expression that already betrays a tendency to regard ideas as commodities). They long to be on the inside of things; they want to share the secrets ordinary people are not permitted to hear. The attractions of power and the satisfactions of inside-dopesterism are stronger, in our society, than the pull of any particular position.

In the last twenty years, the elitism of intellectuals has expressed itself as a celebration of American life, and this fact makes it hard to see the continuity between the thirties and forties, on the one hand, and the fifties and sixties on the other. The hyper-Americanism of the latter period seems to be a reaction against the anti-Americanism of the depression years. Both of these phenomena, however, spring from the same source, the intellectuals' disenchantment with democracy and their alienation from intellect itself. Intellectuals associate themselves with the American war machine not so much because it represents America as because it represents action, power and conspiracy; and the identification is even easier because the war machine is itself "alienated" from the people it claims to defend. The defense intellectuals, "cool" and "arrogant," pursue their obscure calculations in a little world bounded by the walls of the Pentagon, sealed off from the reality outside which does not always respond to their formulas and which therefore has to be ignored in arriving at correct solutions to the "problems" of government. At Langley, Va., the CIA turns its back on America and busies itself with its empire abroad; but this empire, which the CIA tries to police, has no relation to the real lives of the people of the world—it is a fantasy of the CIA, in which conspiracy and counter-conspiracy, freedom and Communist slavery, the forces of light and the forces of darkness, are locked in timeless combat. The concrete embodiments of these abstractions have long since ceased to matter. The processes of government have been intellectualized. Albert D. Biderman, the prophet of "social accounting," speaks for the dominant ethos: "With the growth of the complexity of society, immediate experience with its events plays an increasingly smaller role as a source of information and basis of judgment in contrast to symbolically mediated information about these events. . . . Numerical indexes of phenomena are peculiarly fitted to these needs."*

Washington belongs to the "future-planners," men who believe that "social accounting" will solve social "problems." Government is a "think tank," an ivory tower, a community of scholars. A member of the RAND Corporation speaks of its "academic freedom" which "allows you to think about what you want to." A civil servant praises the democratic tolerance, the respect for ideas, that prevails in the Defense Department. Herman Kahn, jolly and avuncular, encourages "intellectual diversity"; on his staff at Hudson Institute, a center of learning largely devoted to the science of systematic destruction, he retains a dedicated pacifist who doubtless thinks that he is slowly converting the Hudson Institute to universal brotherhood.

Never before have the ruling classes been so solicitous of cultural freedom; but since this freedom no longer has anything to do with "immediate experience and its events," it exists in a decontaminated, valueless void.

that committees cannot conduct investigations unless they have a valid legislative purpose, HUAC has been desperately trying to find one. In the last Congress, it reported out three bills, none of which was adopted.

Now HUAC is making another try it hopes will be aided by the political fallout from the McHugh-SACB explosion. On May 25, the committee's chairman introduced H. R. 10390 which would restore the McCarran Act to life by providing that the Attorney General, not SACB, should register those persons found, by SACB, to belong to one or another of the various "Communist" groups. During the hearings (August 15-18), spokesmen for the committee frankly conceded that the purpose of the amendment was "to get around the Supreme Court rulings." The Senate Internal Security Subcommittee has reported to the full Judiciary Committee a similar bill (S. 2171) which has now been reported out to the Senate.

What are the chances of one of these bills passing? The silence from the Justice Department has been deafening. It is worth noting that the Judiciary Committee did not ask the Justice Department for its opinion. The HUAC measure received favorable testimony from a former FBI assistant director (but not from the FBI itself), a former president of the American Bar Association (but not from the ABA itself), and from Judge Michael Musmanno of the Pennsylvania Supreme Court, among others, in a transparent effort to create the impression that bar, bench and bureau were behind it. The HUAC measure contains a provision (not found in the Senate bill)) which would forbid the courts from interfering by injunction, declaratory judgment or otherwise while proceedings were pending before SACB. At the present time, SACB cannot proceed with the only case now pending before it—involving the W. E. B. DuBois Clubs—until a three-judge court has disposed of a constitutional challenge to the proceedings.

If H.R. 10390 fails, what other mischief can HUAC engage in by way of justifying the $350,000 appropriation it received for 1967? It has promised public hearings on the recent ghetto riots. But in which of the riot-torn cities could HUAC hold hearings that would not be a provocation to further rioting? What Congress should do, of course, is to enact Senator Proxmire's bill (S. 2146) which would abolish SACB, and then it should abolish HUAC.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

The Anti-Communist Empire

ABUSE OF POWER. By Theodore Draper. The Viking Press. 244 pp. $4.95. Paper $1.25.

PAX AMERICANA. By Ronald Steel. The Viking Press. 371 pp. $6.95.

TOM J. FARER

Mr. Farer is an assistant professor of law at Columbia University and was formerly special assistant to the general counsel, United States Department of Defense.

For the past several years, Theodore Draper and Ronald Steel have been two of the most trenchant critics of American foreign policy. Now each has stitched together his shorter pieces and placed them, with some elaboration, between hard covers. For regular readers of liberal periodicals there is, then, nothing very new here except the package. That package, however, will apparently succeed in carrying the "message" beyond the cloistered confines of Greenwich Village and Central Park West to the solid burghers of Greenwich. (Pax Americana has already received a favorable reference in the editorial columns of The Wall Street Journal.) But the most interesting feature of these two books is the actual difference in their messages, a difference which, I fear, will be overlooked in the drum roll of acclaim that any reasonably thoughtful attack on American policy currently evokes.

Draper and Steel do agree that Vietnam is a part of the pattern of American policy. To Draper it is one of increasing reliance on economic and especially military, as opposed to political, "methods of persuasion."

> This pattern of American policy has come about as a result of one political failure and frustration after another. A weaker power might have suffered them in silence or in angry self-recrimination. But the United States is too rich and powerful to take a political setback without seeking some other way to impose its will.

At best, Draper's diagnosis constitutes a highly restricted, purely tactical indictment of American foreign policy and contrasts sharply with Mr. Steel whose thesis is that the United States has become an imperialistic power, that we have—in President de Gaulle's words—"yielded . . . to that taste for intervention in which the instinct for domination (cloaks) itself."

The difference can be stated more precisely. Draper is an obsessive anti-Communist. Like many of his generation's emotional refugees, he still seems a little shellshocked from the fratricidal struggle with that segment of the Left which three decades ago served as a deluded fifth column for Russian power. For him labels are still meaningful, I suppose, and the label "Communist" apparently makes him twitch with hostility. Since the proclaimed objective of the United States is to suppress the Communists in every corner of the globe except Europe, Draper is hardly the man to challenge the relevance of that overriding objective to our real national interests. He does not appear to pass the first test: he does not flatly oppose the objective.

While meticulously avoiding any general statement of American national interest, Draper drops some suggestive hints. For instance, he asserts that the partition of Vietnam under the Geneva Agreements was an "undeniable reverse to the Western powers." As a practical matter, this assumes that the interests of the West would have been better served if France or some other Western state had continued to exercise hegemony over Indo-China. But why? In order to have a base on the Chinese borders? Or because we are in some mystical sense diminished by the fact that the rulers of a scrap of land label themselves Communists? Or for some more esoteric reason known only to Draper? (It must be fairly esoteric, since Draper ridicules every one of the myriad reasons cited at one time or another by successive administrations.) If, as many believe, China is the real problem in Asia, a fair case can surely be made for the proposition that a strong buffer against Chinese expansion in Southeast Asia would be a unified, independent Vietnam, and even that gentleman-troglodyte who managed Far Eastern policy for President Eisenhower, Walter Robertson, was prepared to concede that Ho Chi Minh and his associates were the only people capable of carving such a state out of the rotting hulk of the French empire.

Apparently, this pragmatic approach to national interest doesn't wholly appeal to Draper. "I, for one," he says, "would far prefer to see an Asian democratic reformer or even an honest civilian, rather than the most 'independent' Communist, in power in South and North Vietnam." His use of the conjunctive is significant, since all of us would prefer to see "democratic" reformers not merely in Vietnam but everywhere else in the world, just as we would prefer to witness universal peace, affluence and respect for motherhood. But just what type of fellow is this "honest" civilian character who is not a democratic reformer? Is he democratic but not a reformer? If so, he is unlikely to institute those reforms which Draper believes have always been prerequisite to "victory" in South Vietnam. Or is he a reformer who is not a democrat and doesn't steal? If so, he sounds like Ho without the Communist label. Since Draper puts a few nails of his own into the coffin of the monolithic-Red-threat theory, why then should he care whether the authoritarian reformer calls himself a Communist? A skunk by any other name should still stink.

It is difficult not to feel compassion for Draper. As an American, his conscience is in shreds over what we are doing to the people and the country of Vietnam. As a man with intellectual integrity, he is revolted by the mocking duplicity of our government. Spurred by these emotions he has written a devastating brief on American policy in Vietnam. The tortuous thread of official explanation is diligently pursued from mouth to mouth, from year to year. Each knot of inconsistency is carefully unraveled before our eyes. A man from another planet reading the painstakingly assembled evidence might conceivably conclude from this book that the managers of American foreign policy were either cretins or liars.

But after all this preliminary effort, what has been accomplished other than autotherapy? I assume that the author's interest was not to contribute a formula for extrication, since none is offered, though there are mini-hints that we should arrange the formation of a neutralist, civilian government prepared to negotiate peace with the NLF. The real intent of Abuse of Power is to treat Vietnam as a case study, a political parable, that will serve to inform future policy. "Whatever one may think about getting out," Draper writes, "there is still the larger and deeper crisis of how we got into it and how we got into the Cuban and Dominican military interventions" (to which he adverts in his opening chapter). Well, then, how did we?

It is a little strange that this master's eloquent prose should turn suddenly turbid when applied to the critical question. Yet there is no denying the frustrating opacity of Draper's answer. It is either uselessly abstract—reliance on military power — or disconcertingly superficial: the consistent error is political ineptitude manifested by our identification with men who lack popular support (Batista in Cuba, Cabral in the Dominican Republic and Diem in Vietnam). Instead, one is compelled to deduce, we should have backed "democratic reformers." Who and where were they? We are never told. As a historian who claims to be concerned with the underlying causes of traumatic events Draper displays a strongly limited curiosity. He never asks why we end up bound to men of the Batista ilk.

For an answer to that more profound question, we must turn to Steel who states almost bluntly that America has become an anti-revolutionary power supporting the status quo everywhere because of an "obsessive fear of Communism." At least that is what he says half of the time. Draper's description of Dean Rusk—consistency is not his hobgoblin—might, perhaps a little uncharitably, also be applied to Steel, since in one breath he claims that "what American postwar intervention boils down to in practice is not intervention against injustice or poverty for its own sake, but intervention against Communism," while in the next he claims that our real problem is not morbid fear but excessive idealism: "(The) desire to translate American ideals into a universal political system lies at the core of the current crisis in American diplomacy."

One suspects that whereas Draper's obsession is communism, Steel's is credibility. He wants to be loved in Darien, and he is an alert enough fellow to know that the ordained cachet of "responsible criticism" is the attribution of noble motives to American policy. At least this is a not implausible explantation for Steel's sporadic, slightly plaintive remonstratives among which the following is not uncharacteristic:

> If America, like Metternich's Austro-Hungarian empire, has become an anti-revolutionary power, it is not from a desire to enforce her will upon other nations, but from an obsessive fear of Communism, a fear which induces the belief that all revolutions are Communist-inspired and directed against the United States.

I doubt that any nation has ever sought to impose its will for no reason at all. Is fear of other states a morally superior motive to greed or prestige? The answer, I suppose, is that while the moral significance of fear may be debatable, its practical significance is evident: if the neurotic aspects of that motive are undraped, America, to paraphrase Foggy Bottom's favorite rhetorician, may stop doing what its leaders know it is doing.

The principal source of America's counterrevolutionary reflex is five decades of alarm over the Communist menace. Men of many political persuasions have rung the tocsin, not least among them a body of now slightly aging figures long identified with liberal causes. With a variety of motives, one supposes, these men have engaged in Philippics against communism—not merely Russian or Chinese tyranny—which have rivaled the effusions of the late Senator from Wisconsin. Through their identification with American liberalism they have lent an aura of humanity and intellectual respectability to ideological passions which have a more natural base in the barbarous Right.

By seeming to believe that communism defines a single, definite and universally evil program for the conduct of human affairs, Draper reveals some emotional link with (in Jason Epstein's slashing phrase) that superration on the Right of New York's intellectual community which today provides the most sophisticated rationalizations for the

SPRING 1967

The agitations of April in the sky
call down to you, while earth quivers underfoot as if the Eighth Avenue express burrowed all the way to Vermont; and the rain soaking the fish-scale snow, the bloom of emerging beer cans down the road lead you toward and into spring, another spring. You can think of nothing that is not rotten, nor see anything not hideous, as the sprung wicker chair scarred with ice and lichen wrenches its way in hysterical inaction across the yard.
You laugh, calculating the nostalgia of people fifty years from now. Your mind wrenches across the world, in the slush and mud of your gross citizenship, tearing the dirty shimmer of blossom from every bough in your shame for fake. Leaking shreds of protoplasm, down on one leg, you strain in the mire of blood,
the hysteria of inaction, you drag yourself like a tugged water-weed, slimy and cold . . .

Everything you make is taken from you,
is repainted and displayed in the national exposition, every word is stripped from you in the national tirade, every gesture is absorbed in the national arm, whatever you are disposed to think is already explained in the national advertisement, and your being, if you let yourself be,
is rung up, ping-ping, on the national cash register.
Your innocence is like cold spit in your mouth, eject it or swallow it—you cannot use it. The water which you have not polluted squeals in your belly. Your insane feet are marching, numbers crawl on your skin like lice. Everywhere the spring lies darkening, a choked baby whose besotted mother will stuff it wailing into the hole of your own despair. April, May—you vomit, and your green sex shrivels like a napalm scab.

HAYDEN CARRUTH

American Empire. There is no doubt that Theodore Draper stands a moral light-year away from men like Irving Kristol, and his massively documented denunciations of the ineffable hypocrisy which has characterized our government's defense of American intervention are hardly calculated to generate an invitation to tea at the White House. Nevertheless, one fears the presence of the debilitating reflex, a Pavlovian fleck of foam on the lips when someone dances by wrapped in a vast, shapeless blanket embroidered with the word "Communist." Those who may think this characterization unfair should take another look at the last paragraph of Draper's acclaimed essay in Commentary on the Dominican invasion:

> A great deal would be gained if the problem were attacked in different terms. Conservatives and liberals might well ponder the words of Professor Russell Kirk in a letter to Robert Welch the founder and master of the John Birch Society:
> "Cry wolf often enough and everyone takes you for an imbecile or a knave, when after all there are wolves in this world."

Did he mean anything other than the proposition that the American invasion was unjustified for the sole reason that the Dominican Communists did not dominate the insurgents? I admire Theodore Draper not only because he has such a passionate regard for the truth but also because his sense of humanity, as well as proportion, overwhelms his ideological repugnance. But that rooted hostility toward an abstraction (which has flesh enough, I am sure, in his own mind) weakens his attack and strengthens the defenses of the apostles of empire. The road to the Vietnamese abattoir is paved by decisions which were largely the product of the society's reflexive antagonism to the incubus of communism.

"We cannot," Draper writes "continue to live wholly in the moment, holding onto every status quo, however rotten and unstable, to maintain the line against Communism at whatever cost." Then what should we do? Find ourselves a democratic reformer? The trouble is that they seem to be rather rare birds or, at least in many countries, keep themselves extraordinarily well hidden. Furthermore, what is to be done while we are trying to find them? Draper obviously believes that the Communist alternative must be accepted at least when the cost both to us and the people we are saving is as great as it is now in Vietnam. Unfortunately, questions of prestige may have become unanswerable by the time our viceroys discover either that there never was a democratic reformer or that the one who had been in the wings was liquidated by our friend, the general, who had been looking after the shop while we were searching for a more appropriate manager.

Arthur Schlesinger has told us of Kennedy's warning to Khrushchev at Vienna that "social changes must take place peacefully and must not involve the prestige or commitments of America." Today we seem to have no more earnest commitment than unremitting opposition to leaders and nations in Asia and Latin America that call themselves Communist. It was consistent with this attitude for President Kennedy to announce after the assassination of Trujillo:

> There are three possibilities in descending order of preference: a decent democratic regime, a continuation of the Trujillo regime or a Castro regime. We ought to aim at the first, but we really can't renounce the second until we are sure that we can avoid the third. [A Thousand Days.]

Can we have much success in obtaining the first if we can never bring ourselves to renounce the second?

Ronald Steel has neither the undeniable elegance nor quite the ironic wit nor the superior command of facts which are Draper's hallmarks. Yet, as an effort to explain why we are in Vietnam today, why we are—in Draper's obfuscating phrase—"politically inept," his book is a superior work. Steel realizes that our ineptitude is not the result of a few boobs in the State Department or some Neanderthal military attaché. The problem is strategic, a profound misapprehension of real national interest. That interest, Steel argues compellingly, is dangerously inconsistent with a campaign to suppress communism as an ideology.

By letting the fresh air of pragmatism into the ideological zoo, Steel has performed a significant service. If only Draper had limited himself to our sins in Vietnam these two books would seem peculiarly complementary: Draper's acute analysis of a single case would lend credibility to Steel's evaluation of the general pattern of American policy, while Steel's conceptual backdrop would heighten Draper's depiction of the madness in Vietnam. As it is, however, this complementarity is only partially achieved. Indeed, after reading both books, one is apt to feel that aspects of the "Abuse of Power" are symptomatic of the national malaise which has led to the "Pax Americana."

The Guru and the Coup

THE FALL OF SUKARNO. By Tarzie Vittachi. Frederick A. Praeger. 191 pp. $4.95.

ALEX JOSEY

Mr. Josey has been a free-lance correspondent in the Far East for the past nineteen years. He is the author of Socialism in Asia and Trade Unions in Malaya.

Shall we ever know the truth? Was the September 30, 1965 affair an Indonesian Communist plot to seize power on the reported death of Sukarno? Or was it a counter-coup, an attempt to prevent the alleged Council of Generals from capturing power from Sukarno, and to replace the NASAKOM government with a right-wing military dictatorship? Mr. Vittachi examines all possibilities with thoroughness, though I soon formed the impression that his own inclination is to fix responsibility for starting the train of events which ultimately led to Sukarno's fall upon the Partai Kommunist Indonesia. On the first page he writes of the "communist-backed coup." Elsewhere he states categorically that D. N. Aidit, leader of the PKI, was planning to make a bid for power in 1965. I knew Aidit for some years, and I find this difficult to believe.

In my many talks in his office, the bust of Stalin crowding the small room, I gathered the impression that Aidit was convinced that time was on the side of the PKI. He would, he said repeatedly, give the army no cause to attack the PKI separately from Sukarno. "The PKI will suffer all insults. They can spit in our faces. We shall not retaliate. We will keep close to Sukarno. He is our best friend." As for Subandrio, Aidit told me in 1964, "he thinks he is using us whereas we are using him. We will wait for the elections and win a third of the seats and, in a NASAKOM government, we will be the most powerful influence."

Aidit's belief, upon which the PKI's policy was based, was that the PKI would eventually assume power, peacefully, by supporting Sukarno's concept of a "truly representative government."

The two dominant forces in Indonesia were the army (the second largest military establishment in Asia), and the Communist Party (also the second largest in Asia). Sukarno thought that he could contain the Communists and control the generals. Aidit also thought he could manipulate the political situation. He had nothing but contempt for the other politicians, and in a partnership with them after the promised elections, with a third of the ministers members of the PKI, Aidit was sure that Indonesia would soon find that it was heading for a Communist regime. (For this line of thought the PKI leadership under Aidit was severely criticized by the new Central Committee, meeting in secret in Central Java on August 17, 1966. In a Politburo statement, "Lessons of Indonesian Events," the PKI said in effect that an armed struggle for power was, and still is, unavoidable.)

Most of the non-Communist generals realized what game Aidit was playing, but the army leadership lacked solidarity, and some Dutch writers still insist that it is highly probable that the coup was in fact an internal army affair, a conflict in which the Air Force sided with the Central Java officers and the PKI leadership took an opportunistic role.

What is certain is that the PKI had decided to put their money on peaceful penetration of state power under the protection of Sukarno, rather than scheme to seize power through force. The PKI never possessed a large supply of weapons. Aidit knew that the army leadership, disunited though it might have been, in the main opposed him, and although he tried to subvert the army, he admitted to me on one occasion that much less than one-third of the soldiers and junior officers were in any way friendly to the PKI. How then can Vittachi say that Aidit was planning to make a bid for power in 1965?

Without comment the author quotes from the 50-page confession which Aidit is supposed to have made to the army before he was shot, and which Asahi Evening News secured from the army as a world scoop. In this document Aidit admits he was the one with the highest responsibility for the coup. "Had it succeeded," he said, "my policy was to establish closer economic relations with Communist China." He said that the coup failed because it was premature, and also because some of the top PKI leaders opposed it. Another reason was the lack of support of "Communist China and international communism on which we had placed hopes."

I have read the confession. It does not read like the Aidit I knew. This may be because of faulty translation: I don't suppose he wrote the original in English. But this document makes him say things I do not believe he could say, except perhaps at the point of a gun. The photographs which illustrated this article in the Japanese newspaper, said to have been taken shortly before Aidit was shot, confirmed my feelings of suspicion. What is also significant is that the army has never put out a statement about Aidit's death, although I could find no one in Jakarta prepared to believe that Aidit still lives.

Tarzie Vittachi deals with the events which led up to the September 30 affair, then goes on to discuss the massacre of half a million Indonesians which followed, and seeks an explanation for this astonishing blood bath. Some Indonesians might have believed they were helping to wipe out an anti-Sukarno PKI, but another contributing factor, a most important one, was that the army had always supported the richer peasants against the PKI's "seven devils of the rural areas" campaign, and the PKI's efforts to enforce land reform. A lot of poor peasants died and a great deal of land was handed back after the abortive coup.

It was President Sukarno's sudden illness during the evening of September 30 that triggered the whole affair. For an hour Sukarno spoke to a large audience in the Jakarta Stadium. Making full use of his celebrated powers of imagination, Sukarno told them that Indonesia was now able to produce its own atomic bomb through the efforts of one of Indonesia's own physicists working entirely on his own. . . . Suddenly his voice faltered. He stopped and left the rostrum, seeming to limp. His aides were heard calling, apparently for the attendant doctors. Dr. Wu, chief of the medical team from Peking hurried to his side. Apparently in a state of collapse, Sukarno was taken to a small room. Within minutes the rumor swept the city that Sukarno was dead. According to Vittachi, Aidit was on the platform. He did not go backstage to see what was happening. He made for the exit and was never seen in public again.

Lieutenant Colonel Untung, commander of Sukarno's bodyguard, Vittachi says, was not on the platform when Sukarno collapsed, but when news reached him that the President was either dead or dying, "he pressed the button," and the September 30 affair got under way. Eight generals were to be kidnapped: six were murdered, two escaped: General Nasution and General Suharto. Vittachi tells in full the story of General Suharto's escape. He was not home when the assassins called. Like most Indonesians, General Suharto, now the Acting President of Indonesia, believes that his dukun, or guru, has prophetic powers. Suharto follows this man's guidance because, says Vittachi, Suharto's dukun says this guidance is given to him by Suharto's guardian angels.

On the day of September 25, Suharto's dukun told General Suharto he should not return to his home before 2 in the morning of October 1. This, as it turned out, was the time the plotters planned to murder Suharto. Suharto's dukun advised him to spend the night hours worshipping God at a place where the sea and the river waters meet. It was long after 2 A.M. when Suharto returned home. He saw jeeps and lorries outside his home and a great deal of unusual activity. So he turned his car around and went to army headquarters. Suharto was, as he said later, very calm, knowing that his spiritual guardians who had saved him from capture and possible murder would send him guidance. He soon made contact with General Nasution, and counteraction against the coup d'état was swiftly taken. The radio station was captured, and the news came through that President Sukarno was at Halim Air Base. What was he doing there?

Vittachi spent nearly a year examining reports and rumors but his book adds little to what has already appeared in print about Sukarno's involvement, or indeed about anything else connected with the plot. We shall probably never know the truth, for it could lie buried beneath contradictions and intrigues. Vittachi comes to the conclusion that there were probably three different plans, or actions, ready and set to go at about the same time: (1) The preparations of the army to counter any attempt by Subandrio and the PKI to make a take-over bid with the military backing of the Air Force in case the President died. This was what Sukarno, Untung and the PKI referred to as the Council of Generals. (2) Colonel Untung's preparations against a possible Army plan to bring down the NASAKOM government during or after Sukarno's lifetime. (3) The plans of the PKI to take power if the President died, with military assistance from the Air Force, and to establish a government probably with Dr. Subandrio as the nominal civilian head.

Whatever action, or combination of actions, brought about the fall of Sukarno and the eclipse of the PKI, Sukarno must still be considered a potential political factor, and the PKI a serious threat. And, as Vittachi reminds us, "in fifteen years time someone will have to reckon with the possibly unavoidable desire for revenge among the two million children" orphaned by the murders which followed the September 30 affair.

Certain Aspects of Death

THE GODMOTHER. By Janice Elliott. Holt, Rinehart & Winston. 223 pp. $4.95.

DIGGING OUT. By Anne Richardson. McGraw Hill Book Co. 181 pp. $4.50.

NORA SAYRE

Miss Sayre is the New York correspondent for the New Statesman.

A Boston atheist of 87 recently remarked with some amusement that dying resembles molting—that she feels like a snake that wants to shed its skin. Having always believed that "God is only the word after gocart in the dictionary," she's startled to find that the self is so eager to be rid of the body, "to be divorced from the organs," and that she does experience a tugging independence of the soul. (She adds: "If someone doesn't believe that the soul and body are connected, just let him be constipated for a day or two.") At any rate, she stresses that approaching death is a fascinating process. And why should it not be, if there is adequate health and an exuberant mind? However, as the anthropologist Geoffrey Gorer has explained, most modern Anglo-Saxons treat death with the prudery which the Victorians reserved for sex—an embarrassing and disgusting phenomenon that few want to acknowledge. But Janice Elliott's The Godmother is a magnificent acknowledgment: here, an old woman's gradual dying appears almost as an achievement. True, her eccentric detachment from the present vexes her relatives and friends; with alternating admiration and resentment, they recall all of the roles which she has played: godmother, aunt, sister, daughter, "virgin spinster," never (but nearly) a wife or mother.

As the emotional scenery shifts, she appears as a comforter, a destroyer, a "love goddess," an invalid, a clairvoyant, a potential murderee, a benign magician, a malignant witch, and finally—in senility—as a child to be protected. Miss Elliott's characters are muted, respectable people who long for violence. They want to shout at and strike one another; for them, the old woman is "an island on whose shores they might be wrecked or saved." Ignoring their furious expectations that she will "bring out the best or the worst" in them, endanger or enlighten them, she relives a visit to Delphi, where the oracle's cave returned only her own voice. Once dead, others realize that she "delivered no message; question the oracle and the dry stone gives back not an explanation but an echo. In the distortion lies the illusion of prophecy." In short, her service was to reveal people to themselves—and often, the acquaintance was repellent.

Miss Elliott's primary concern is the passive and almost arbitrary interaction of people who are far from fond of one another. They're seduced by the belief that others are responsible for their horrors or delights, or that "things just happen," or even that an absent-minded old woman can predestine and guide their experiences. None of them wants to be an engine of control; hence their irritable insistence on making "the godmother" a mythic figure from whom miracles are expected. Thus, she lives and dies personifying other characters' imaginations—as, indeed, some solitaries do. Since she once seemed "immemorial," she is not forgiven for being mortal.

There are several plots sufficient for separate novels here: a drifter murders one old woman because another took too long to die; a chill but resilient divorcee experiments with nonlove; a woman, crimped with jealousy of her sister's lover, tells his wife that she's a cuckold—the wife promptly kills herself, and the complacent informer inherits the suicide's husband and child. But none of these quietly savage themes is really developed. Miss Elliott concentrates on reverberations rather than events, self-deceptions instead of confrontations. All of her characters wear the stripe of madness: the kinds of psychosis that need not prevent prosaic functioning, or even an orderly life. (For these, violence is tempting because it suggests the virtue of self-assertion, of which they're usually incapable.) The novel gives meticulous testimony that almost everyone feels—or is—insane at certain moments. The book's only flaw is an overdependence on E.M. Forster's Marabar caves: although the spelling has been altered from "boum" to "Boom," those infinity-echoes really do belong to him, and are disturbing in a novel that's otherwise unique. Washed throughout by recurring undersea imagery, Miss Elliott's prose also distills a series of frighteningly lucid observations: "there was something almost mad about their dedicated sanity as if balance taken too far breeds its own imbalance." As a study in delusions, The Godmother makes the word "sensitive" a compliment—which it hasn't been for decades.

Perhaps the inhibitions about death and the denial of grief analyzed by Mr. Gorer will be flushed by the newest novelists. In Digging Out, Anne Richardson's admirable first novel, the anguish of the living is detailed, as it wasn't in The Godmother. There is also the honest repulsion instilled by a body jammed with tubes and wires and needles, injected or emptied of liquids, dominated by tainted tissues, retchings and slime. (The decomposition is emphasized by recalling all of the massages, hair treatments, and manicures that failed to embellish the same flesh.)

At Christmas, a girl attends her mother's tardy death; the daughter's identification with her mother is so acute that cancer seems contagious. At moments, she seems to be dying along with the thumb-sucking, drooling invalid, who has been reduced to babbling remarks such as "The grocery-store has a new hat, a new hat!" Here are all of the aspects of death that most families hate to recognize: the irrational guilt that is inevitable when a blood relation dies, the invalid's struggle to live while others hope that she will not, the calm, brisk brutality of doctors ("there will be some vomiting from the gas, and a temporary blindness"), and the fact that all of the dying person's lifelong fears are finally justified—that it's reasonable to be terrified of suffering. There is also the lavish relief when the death is completed. In this novel, none of these feelings is pummeled into the shape of secrecy—as most relatives, hospitals and funeral directors encourage them to be.

The physical agonies of death are magnified because they unfold in an opulent apartment, in a family sustained by a world of doormen, Chinese lacquer and gold leaf, Venetian marble floors, infinite pastries, clocks that play Brahms and heated pools. But this wealth is no more romantic than the chocolate crumbs which one character leaves on the fur rug in her Rolls-Royce. Mrs. Richardson is especially skilled at depicting the paralysis of luxury. The older people fear that someone will snatch their money away, while the younger ones torpidly take plenitude for granted. While it is usually impossible to repine over the problems of the rich, this particular joylessness is devastating: possession rather than pleasure, habit instead of stimulus. Mrs. Richardson is also dexterous at flashbacks: earlier family deaths lurk behind the narrative. But none of the dead relatives were invalids; illness is shown to be far worse than sudden death—as it undoubtedly is.

One wishes that Mrs. Richardson had included more of the past of the dying woman—readers are further committed when they encounter the dawning life of a character whom they already know will die. But the devouring Jewish family is so robustly drawn that it is comprehensible that the girl should resolve—at the graveside—to be free of her "tribe." "The tribe does not take kindly to defection, but now that my mother was going into the ground I could leave them chanting in the temple. . . . I would become the first American in my family. To be an American one must have no root, no family, perhaps a few hastily covered graves along the freeway." Here, perhaps, is a clue to the national dislike of acknowledging death: the remains are hastily—if lushly—buried, so that the living can keep traveling, pretending that nothing ugly has occurred. (Mr. Gorer has observed that the drive against smoking—that is, against death from cancer—almost suggests that death is an immoral act, a personal disgrace.)

Both these fine novels are valid reminders of how many different kinds of death there are, and that certain deaths are far more bearable than others. After all, response to death is tinged with knowing that the dead person did—or didn't—wring what he wanted from life. Also, since our society is a soup of so many religions' remnants, it's sometimes hard to admit that "good" or "bad" deaths are often determined by the body. The bowels can clock the spirit, as any small child knows. However, neither of these novels is depressing, and both have extraordinary privacy. Public or dramatic death—from the assassination to numerous cut-and-splash films—is so nearly conventional that numbness lapses into the desire for caricature or exotica. Today, the topic is most fashionable if it is marinated in fantasy or sadism. But natural death now seems a more intimate—and daring—subject for fiction than any number of sexual cook-outs or assumptions.

THEATRE/ Julius Novick

Stratford, Ont.

I have been saying for several years, in this journal and elsewhere, that the Shakespearean Festival at Stratford has higher standards than any other theatre on this continent; its current season does not tempt me to change my opinion.

Since 1963, when I began coming to Stratford, the festival has had only one notable deficiency: among great numbers of fine, exciting actors, it has lacked a magnetic star performer for the heroic parts. The ensemble has been superb, but certain plays are built to have one or two actors transcend the ensemble, and this has not been happening at Stratford. This season, for the first time in several years, the festival has imported a couple of big-name actors: Alan Bates to play Richard III, and Christopher Plummer (a Canadian, and a member of the company for five seasons between 1956 and 1962) to play Antony. But the transcendence still did not take place; the current season is remarkable more for the amazing consistency of its quality than for any individual outbreaks of brilliance. Of course, the standard at Stratford is so high that what would be acclaimed as brilliance elsewhere tends to be accepted as a matter of course.

This year the festival offers four plays on the famous thrust stage of the Festival Theatre, and two operas and a play on the proscenium stage of the Avon Theatre, in addition to two concert series and miscellaneous exhibitions, workshops and seminars. And this year, as always, my visit to Stratford has helped me to maintain my frequently shaken faith in the possibility that our theatre may still be reinvigorated by its resident professional companies.

The festival's opera company lacks any major-league talents; it concentrates on well-staged and thoroughly rehearsed ensemble productions. This system works well for Mozart's Cosi Fan Tutte, and even better for Benjamin Britten's Albert Herring, a charming comic opera about a mother-ridden lad in an English village who finally breaks out and discovers the world of the senses. Albert Herring is a gentle fertility rite, a celebration of spring and sex and youth. David William's staging makes it a genuine theatrical experience, sweet-natured and cozy but seldom overcute, and Gregory Dempsey is a stalwart Albert.

The play at the Avon is Colours in the Dark by James Reaney, the third original work to be presented at the festival in the fifteen years of its history. Neither of the first two presentations has ever been produced anywhere else; if the same fate befalls Colours in the Dark, it will be not so much a matter of the play's merits or lack of them as of its peculiar suitability to Stratford. Mr. Reaney was born and raised on a farm 3 miles from Stratford, and his play is a sort of collage of memories, anecdotes and poems, based on the author's own life journey, and extending out toward the universe.

It includes a fight between hardwood and softwood trees, played by children, and an old woman who is hanging out, on a kid's jump rope, all the clothes, she says, that she has ever worn. Children shout anti-Catholic and anti-Protestant jingles, a girl tap dances in a superbly horrible pink dress, a man recites an "Ode on the Mammoth Cheese." One section is a "Fantasia on the Street Names of Winnipeg," another is a "Dance of Death in London, Ontario."

The play, if that's what it is, recalls Our Town in its small-town content and affectionate attitude, but is far more discontinuous and explicitly metaphorical, in the modern manner. (I wished for a stronger, clearer through-line.) Reaney's writing is sometimes pretentious ("I curse the discovery of fire! I curse Prometheus!"), and sometimes sentimental, but on the whole Colours in the Dark is not just a promising work but a pleasure right now.

John Hirsch's lively, sure-handed staging features extensive use of projections as background. The acting is simple, grave and good. There are no roles in the customary sense; the performer with the most to do is Douglas Rain, a stubby, curly-haired fellow who has appeared at the festival every season since it was founded. Few actors are so quietly, so unassumingly watchable as Mr. Rain. Even when, as often in this work, he appears to be doing nothing in particular, he somehow catches and holds the attention.

Three of the plays at the Festival Theatre are by Shakespeare; the fourth is a brilliant revival of The Government Inspector. Since it concerns civic corruption and social pretension, there is no question as to the contemporary relevance of Gogol's 1835 satiric farce. Peter Raby, the festival's "dramaturge," has adapted it into speakable and witty English. Michael Langham, the festival's artistic director, has staged it boldly and broadly as a wild, harsh fantasia of greed, chicanery, hypocrisy, cruelty, vanity, self-delusion and other human failings.

William Hutt (another veteran of the festival's first season) is ineffably funny as Khlestakov, the insignificant young clerk who fetches up, dead broke, in a miserable provincial town, and is mistaken by the town's corrupt officials for a government inspector traveling incognito. Hutt's performance is the apotheosis of swish and, under the circumstances, why not? Swish, after all, is an overelaborate assumption of elegance and refinement, and thus seems quite appropriate for a foolish young provincial who has gone to the big city and would love to be considered a man of fashion.

Gogol's play shows a fake butterfly alighting on a dunghill, and Mr. Langham has surrounded his hero with a depthlessly sordid environment, populated by seedy grotesques. In a mordantly funny, wordless scene, Khlestakov is triumphantly led through town, while a red carpet is spread in front of him and quickly rolled up behind so it can be spread in front again, and bedridden patients are slung ruthlessly out of the way so as not to interfere with the great man's inspection of the hospital.

Langham's staging is full of ingenuity, and all the actors play right up to the hilt. Yet the director and the actors never seem to be making the play funny; they seem rather to be bringing out, in masterful fashion, the comedy that was in it all the time.

The Government Inspector was originally staged for a transcontinental tour of Canada last winter, as part of the Centennial celebrations. This summer's first production was Richard III, directed by John Hirsch: an entertaining show that goes with a swing. Alan Bates's movie-star charm is used, not to whitewash Richard but to make his success more plausible; here, for a change, is a Richard from whom somebody might conceivably buy a used car.

Yet this Richard III is not what it once might have been; it commemorates an occasion when the festival's audience failed it. The production was originally planned as the climax of a four-year enterprise: a mounting of Shakespeare's great double tetralogy of history plays, which begins with the downfall of Richard II, and continues, through the carousings and conquests of Henry V and the civil anarchy of the Wars of the Roses, to the restoring of order with the death of Richard III. The three parts of Henry VI, which are among Shakespeare's earliest works, were to be presented in the adaptation John Barton made for the Royal Shakespeare Theatre, which resolves the three plays into two, entitled Henry VI and Edward IV.

Henry VI, as produced at the festival last year under John Hirsch's direction, was a brilliant, luridly powerful evocation of chaos; but the Toronto critics condemned it, and it was sparsely attended. As Jean Gascon, the festival's incoming artistic head, observes (in discussing the difficulty of selling The Government Inspector), "The people . . . are hoping to see the pageantry—the trumpets and the banners and the whole bit. It's very hard to break that pattern, but it must be done."

But M. Gascon also points out: "If you have one play here that doesn't work in a season, it means the whole financial situation is in danger." This year the intention had been to conclude the series with Edward IV and Richard III. The two plays have a very close continuity: some half dozen characters survive from one into the other, including Richard; many events in the later play have roots in the earlier. But in response to what was interpreted as widespread lack of demand, Edward IV was dropped (when, now, will anybody on this continent dare to produce it?), and Richard III was left to stand by itself. This it is well able to do, of course; but we have been denied a rare chance to see it in context.

Perhaps as a result of all this, Mr. Hirsch's thoroughly competent staging seems for most of the evening to have no particular concept behind it. And then in the last act, he goes off in a frenzy of half-cocked innovation. Richard for some reason permits Richmond to kill him. A suicidal Crookback? Why? Richmond, moreover, is in this production not a radiant symbol of justice and order but, in direct contradiction to the text, a snarling tough. After three hours during which there is no indication that Hirsch has any strong feelings about the play one way or another, it suddenly seems as if he has been reading Jan Kott when he should have been reading Richard III.

Edward IV was replaced in the schedule by The Merry Wives of Windsor, Shakespeare's most commercial script —written, presumably, to make a quick buck out of the continued popularity of Sir John Falstaff. Shakespeare wrote several plays that were worse in various ways, but none (except for The Comedy of Errors) more mechanical and less resonant. Merry Wives is not even a particularly good commercial piece; there are jokes in it that would embarrass the author of The Wayward Stork. David William, the director, defends the play sturdily in a program note, but his production proves only that in the proper hands it can be hilarious. (Not that I'm out to knock hilarity.) Tony van Bridge makes a majestic, grandiloquent Falstaff; Zoe Caldwell as Mistress Page is a bouncing bourgeoise with a high opinion of her own dignity; Jean Gascon is the explosive Frenchman ("By gar!"), Dr. Caius; theirs are probably the funniest of many funny performances. Alan Bates as Ford plays this not very showy supporting role with self-denying conscientiousness: he could not have played it better had he been a total unknown.

Merry Wives, as might be expected, is doing very well at the box office, but the big popular hit of the festival is the season's final production, Antony and Cleopatra. This production was the focus of tremendous expectations. It was the only one of Shakespeare's major plays that had never been done at Stratford; it is the last production to be directed by Michael Langham before he retires as the festival's artistic director. (He is headed for La Jolla, Calif., to start a new theatre.) And its leading roles are being played by Christopher Plummer and Zoe Caldwell.

In the event, the production proved somewhat disappointing, for all its merits. Langham's staging cuts and dissolves from scene to scene with cinematic speed, using cinematic techniques. Costumes and props are austere, no mobs of extras are in evidence, yet the atmosphere of a luxurious, decadent court is created. The supporting cast is excellent, with William Hutt as a disgruntled Enobarbus and Kenneth Welsh as a chilly Caesar distinguishing themselves particularly.

Christopher Plummer is an expansive magnanimous, virile Antony; it is easy to understand the loyalty with which his men serve him. But though he plays his scenes of suffering competently, some final dimension, some audacity, some kind of profoundest cutting loose is missing; this Antony is shaken, but not to his innermost depths.

Miss Caldwell's Cleopatra is a little, bouncy red-headed woman—no competition for Elizabeth Taylor, but the converse is also true. Miss Caldwell has her own, kinetic attractions, and her Cleopatra has plenty of exquisite arts with which to hold Antony. She begins as a delightful, dangerous tiger-kitten, throwing all her energies tempestuously into every passing impulse: this is a Cleopatra who both could and would "hop forty paces through the public street." Yet her intelligence shines through her self-indulgence in the form of irony, with which her words quiver and gleam. The way she asks, on hearing of the death of Antony's wife, "Can Fulvia die?" is indescribable.

But Shakespeare's prescription demands "infinite variety," and this Miss Caldwell cannot supply. She does not grow into the splendor of the final scenes. Insinuation becomes her better than grandiloquence. She continues, moreover, to move as if she were about to climb a tree or beat the boys at softball. This is properly one of Cleopatra's modes, not her only one.

And so it seemed to me that this much heralded production runs downhill after an excellent beginning. But perhaps all I am saying is that the play demands great acting, which is not forthcoming on this occasion. And have we ever a right to expect great acting? At any rate, this Antony and Cleopatra is an achievement of which no theatre would need to be ashamed.

I had a talk with Jean Gascon, who takes over at the end of this season as "executive artistic director" (John Hirsch will be "artistic director"), and found him keenly aware of the dangers inherent in the festival's tremendous success. "There is a danger here of stagnation," he says. "It's probably the most important and organized company on the North American continent. But the danger of it is that it could become an institution. People get self-satisfied. . . ." In future seasons he plans to decrease the emphasis on Shakespeare and to widen the repertory. Already he has invited a number of dramatists, both Canadian and foreign, to Stratford, with the hope that they will be tempted to write for the festival. He plans to have the company make films and recordings, "and all sorts of things."

One central aim, which Gascon expects to accomplish within two years, is to make the festival a year-round operation. This will be done by scheduling annual winter seasons in Montreal and in another Canadian city to be announced, and by touring inside and outside Canada. Year-round employment will make it easier to attract and hold actors and staff; year-round operation will provide more time and scope for experiment.

Gascon is full of praise for what has been done at Stratford since its founding, but "if I were told tomorrow that I had to follow that line and stay there, I would just go away. I have to feel that there's development . . . and that will keep me alive as an artist—and the same for everybody here." As Canada's (and North America's) leading theatre comes, for the first time, under Canadian leadership, this kind of thinking is a good augury for the future.

Abril protests

Sao Paulo, Brazil

Dear Sirs: With reference to Ernest Blum's "Brazil's Yankee Network," published in your May 29 issue, we would like to call your attention to the following:

(1) Victor Civita was not—as Mr. Blum reports—born in Italy; (2) Victor Civita was never a "Time-Life employee"; (3) Victor Civita did not emigrate to Brazil in 1951, nor did his brother Cesar emigrate to Argentina in that year. As a matter of fact, Cesar Civita has been in publishing in Buenos Aires for over twenty-five years; (4) in Argentina, Panorama is published by Panorama S.A., a joint Editora Abril S.A.I.C.I.F.Y.A.-Time, Inc. venture, and not—as Mr. Blum confidently suggests—by Editora Abril S.A.I.C.I.F.Y.A.

It is true that our company has been "accused of links with Time-Life." And, in every case, the "evidence" has been of the same sort uncovered by Mr. Blum: fabricated, imagined, inaccurate, malicious, speculative . . . and completely untrue.

As responsible Brazilian publishers, with no connection whatsoever with Time-Life or any other foreign enterprise, we deplore the irresponsible, offensive and libelous statements in Mr. Blum's article, and request that the record be set straight immediately. Gordiano O. Rossi, Director more pornography

New Orleans, La.

Dear Sirs: Irving Younger ["Pornography and Violence," The Nation, Aug. 14] writes: "None would object to curtailing the freedom of the pornographer whose sole motive is profit. . . ."

Mr. Younger is wrong, I object! I agree with Paul Krassner when he wrote, "I think people have the right to have their prurient interest aroused. I also think that a book or whatever should not necessarily have to have what the Court called 'socially redeeming qualities' in order to be given the protection of the First Amendment. In fact, the ability to arouse prurient interest may very well be a 'socially redeeming quality.' "

So far as I know, a cause-and-effect relationship has not been established between pornography and sex crime. So why not pecuniary pornography? If Mr. Younger has any scientific proof that pornography for pornography's sake is harmful, let him trot it out so that we may examine it. If not, it seems to me that he speaks from the sound base of contemporary community prejudice, at least in his statement that ". . . punishment should be the lot of the pecuniary pornographer." Keith A. McKinley

Bothell, Wash.

Dear Sirs: Irving Younger's excellent analysis, as ruthlessly parsimonious as it is, goes too far. He wants pornography "forbidden" when given or sold to persons under 18 not the children of the giver or seller, and also forbidden to be sold or given to anyone unwilling to buy or receive.

Mr. Younger must know that forbidding means passing laws and that means giving power to police. Unfortunately, this does not mean the gentle application of reason but the use of force, with stupidity, brutality and often violence.

I want the police entirely out of my chld-raising responsibilities; and the privacy of the individual is more greatly threatened when police force is requested than when we take our chances. Bernard Poll

The Experts

Like the Three Wise Men who came from the East to bring word to Herod of a Great Happening, Three Election Experts, flanked by the American Ambassador, held their press conference in Saigon and pronounced the Vietnamese elections "reasonably efficient, reasonably free and reasonably honest"—quite on a par with elections in the United States. The press subjected the Three to some sharp questioning, inquiring how, after only four days in a strange land and visits to only a handful of polling places, they had been able to reach this firm conclusion. The spokesman's reply, "you can, I think, develop a certain appreciation of competence," referred, apparently, to the mechanics of the balloting; he disavowed "political philosophical" judgments.

The press did not inquire how the Three had been chosen, or anointed. It is far from The Nation's intention to cast the slightest doubt on the competence and bona fides of these gentlemen but, after all, a man's background does play some part in his thinking and the conclusions he may reach in sizing up a complex situation. The President seems to have added Election Experts as an afterthought; they were not members of the twenty-two man Presidential observer team, some of whom did not shy away from "political philosophical" judgments. The spokesman of the Three was Prof. Richard M. Scammon of the Government Affairs Institute in Washington; his colleagues were Prof. Donald Herzberg, Director of the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers University, and Prof. Howard Penniman of Georgetown University.

By what process of divination did the President select the Big Three from the 16,000 members of the American Political Science Association, which is fairly bursting with experts, including several hundred, one may assume, who are authorities on elections, foreign and domestic? If the President had assistance, as is usual in such matters, who recommended the Three, and what investigation was made of their institutional connections? If, as there is reason to believe, their associations included agencies which were beneficiaries of State Department, Department of Defense or other governmental grants or contracts, might it not have been better public relations to have given this information to the press? Such information could hardly be regarded as irrelevant, since, however investigators circumscribe their investigations, philosophical and political factors do have a way of getting into the picture.

Mr. Scammon's Government Affairs Institute, for example, is said to have received sizable grants from the Departments of State and Defense—something around $286,000. Mr. Penniman was on the staff of the CIA (1948-49), then served as Deputy Chief of the External Research Staff, State Department, when Dr. Evron M. Kirkpatrick was Chief, and succeeded the latter as Chief (1953-55). Dr. Kirkpatrick is an Executive Director of the American Political Science Association, of which Max M. Kampelman is Treasurer and General Counsel. Dr. Kirkpatrick doubles as Executive Director of Operations and Policy Research, Inc., of Washington, D.C., of which Mr. Kampelman has been Vice President. And Operations and Policy Research, as Robert Sherrill pointed out in The Nation (February 27, "The Professors and the CIA") received grants in 1963, 1964 and 1965 from the CIA, via various "conduit" foundations.

The Nation is advised that Government Affairs Institute owns the real estate in which the American Political Science Association has its headquarters. We are further advised that Scammon, Penniman and Herzberg have all done work for Operations and Policy Research. Sherrill pointed out that Kirkpatrick is a close friend of Vice President Humphrey; Kampelman is another good friend of the Vice President. Of course Mr. Humphrey has many friends, including the editor of The Nation, and he knows many experts in many fields, but was it good politics to send on a mission where at least the appearance of objectivity is important men with these connections?

Yet when one considers the situation in broad perspective, isn't it all of a piece? The elections in South Vietnam were originally conceived as a public relations gimmick to counteract the Buddhist demonstrations which at their peak, threatened to topple the government. The scheme was to impart an appearance of legitimacy to the South Vietnamese government, and to convince doubtful Americans that we were indeed defending a freedom-loving people against Communist aggression. The VIP mission, with its add-on of Election Experts, was a part of this massive public relations effort. In Vietnam, at least, no one was fooled. The Wall Street Journal (September 6) interviewed a senior Vietnamese general who called the dispatch of observers "ridiculous." The general noted that the observers never got far from their Vietnamese government guides. "If the election were not fair," the general asked, "how would they find out?" Scammon, Penniman and Herzberg can put their heads together on that one.

What Next?

Unfortunately for Mr. Johnson—unfortunately also for the people of the United States and the people of both Vietnams—public relations stunts do not solve the problems of peace and war. With the echoes of this particular Washington cum Madison Avenue operation dying away, what is Mr. Johnson's next move? For move he must: the 1968 U.S. election campaign is less than a year away.

The election in Vietnam could afford Mr. Johnson temporary shelter, as he views this black squall rapidly approaching. Having won the Vietnamese election, he could without loss of face order a halt in the bombing of North Vietnam. Not just a pause with a time limit, for that would be an ultimatum and the North Vietnamese have already shown how they deal with such stop-and-go maneuvers. If the North Vietnamese did not respond to a halt without conditions, Mr. Johnson's second option would be to take the case to the United Nations.

It is in fact already there and requires no new initiative. The Nation pointed this out editorially ("Call It Up!" July 3) and sentiment is now building up in the Senate for reviving the dormant 1966 U.S. resolution in the Security Council, calling for a conference to draw upon the Geneva Accords of 1954 and 1962 for establishing peace in Southeast Asia. If the appeal is renewed, France or the Soviet Union may exercise the veto, but what of it? The issue will then go to the General Assembly, where there would be an opportunity for diplomatic give and take. It is hard to see how matters could be any worse than they are now.

Senator Morse is probably right when he suggests that bilateral negotiations can lead to a truce but not to a settlement. For a settlement, a larger frame is needed. Dumping issues on the UN is standard operating procedure which has worked on occasion in the past. It could work in this case, at least to the extent of getting the situation off dead center.

Such a maneuver holds out some promise at this juncture because all parties are in trouble. Hanoi is hurting, as the Pentagon gleefully points out, and if it decides to wait out the '68 election it is assuming some real risks. On the American, or Johnsonian, side, the margins of escalation are getting very thin. The Stennis Committee hearings are only one of a group of storm warnings. The disintegration of Mr. Johnson's so-called consensus is another, and the further it disintegrates the more pressing the need for action on his part. If he waits too long, he will lose what initiative he has left. The hawks are not waiting; he will be in their claws completely if he takes another escalatory step—or if he does nothing.

The Military Voice

It is now perfectly clear that a serious schism exists in the ranks of the Johnson Administration between the Joint Chiefs and the military generally on one side, and the other war-makers—the "crisis managers" as John McDermott calls them—on the other. This is not a clean-cut military versus civilian issue. Some of the generals, in this hassle, are young, strong-minded civilians in the Department of Defense; it is a truism that one can be a militarist without wearing a uniform. The importance of the issue is rather that the military voice, whatever its source, is becoming more strident, and Mr. Johnson's internal troubles are increasing proportionately.

These conflicts rage behind closed doors and the public—the segment that is interested—hears only muffled echoes of what is going on. What does emerge is confusing, precisely because there is no sharp conflict of principle as there was, for instance, in the early days of the cold war between Henry Wallace and James F. Byrnes. Now all alike are trying to win a war that, on any grounds of political decency and American moral leadership, should never have been started. They disagree only on the means of perpetrating international crime with maximum effectiveness.

Nevertheless, degrees of temerity in such a situation have some barometric significance: the tougher the talk from people in high places, the more menacing the future appears. Another important phase is that the coalition between the Administration hawks (including those in uniform) and the Congressional hawks becomes tighter and therefore more threatening. The generals do not become as emphatic and venturesome before a Congressional committee unless they feel the tide is running their way. Their usual stance is one of caution, but no one was cautious before the Stennis Committee. The phraseology was different, but the conclusions were the same as those of an apoplectic militarist like Mendel Rivers—and more effective because of the appearance of sober restraint.

Where does this leave Secretary McNamara? The President's attempt to paper over the differences between the Joint Chiefs and McNamara on the effectiveness of bombing North Vietnam was a palpable failure. It left the impression that the differences are more deep-seated, and that what is left of the consensus cannot be kept intact very much longer. By next spring, if not before, McNamara's authority may be so impaired that he can no longer exercise his office with an acceptable degree of effectiveness. In the press conference at which President Johnson announced his latest capitulation to the generals, the most significant remark—and one which has gone largely unnoticed by the daily press—virtually sidetracked McNamara. The Joint Chiefs, said Johnson, "are available to come to the President any time they choose without coming through the Secretary of Defense. They have been requested to do that any time they want to."

If McNamara really believes that bombing the North has little value in curbing Hanoi's help to the Vietcong, how can he justify the cost in pilots and aircraft? On the ground that having started, it is hard to stop? Or that it is important to keep an appearance of unity before the public and the services, so that morale will not sag? As a man of principle (he still has a tenuous claim on that status) McNamara should force a bombing pause of indefinite duration on the Administration or, if that is beyond his power, he should resign and speak his mind freely.

The chances are that he will not do anything so drastic. And therein lies the national weakness beneath the overwhelming military strength. If a McNamara cannot hew to the line in a matter of such importance, what can be expected of the ordinary, half-informed, powerless citizen? And if nothing is to be expected of the sovereign people but a supine submission to whatever atrocity is next on the list, how long can the country remain a democracy in fact as well as in name?

An Entertainment Culture

San Francisco

Yes, California has done it again! Shirley Temple is going to run for Congress, and there is very little chance that she won't win. California has given the political world something new—the politician as entertainer—and it must keep up the good work. George Murphy danced, as all Senators should, and Ronald Reagan sold soap and saved chimps, as all Governors should. And now Shirley Temple Black, America's sweetheart (of a few decades ago) will be a Congresswoman. Can you imagine anyone over 40 not voting for her? It would be indecent, perhaps even un-American.

She is another citizen-politician who has "got the call" to serve her fellow man. Enough of this housewifery business for Mrs. Black; her children are old enough to fend for themselves now. Her job is to go to Washington, D.C., and save the country she once charmed.

There are a number of significant aspects to her candidacy and the success of her two predecessors, Murphy and Reagan. The rise of television has made charisma very important. If you are photogenic, project sincerity, and can remember what your public relations people tell you, you too can be a politician. And the less experience you have, the better, since politics is seen here as "dirty." Reagan campaigned as an amateur and an innocent, and with a bit of backlash won by a million votes.

Now Shirley Temple will no doubt make true the Biblical injunction ". . . a little child shall lead them." When people vote for her it will be on the basis of their memory of her in the films, when she was a cute kid; she's not much to look at now. The last point, which explains this business of movie stars going into politics, is that Americans seem to insist, now, that their political leaders be entertaining. It's more than a television image and charisma—you have to be able to amuse somehow, either by singing or dancing or fighting Indians or making records.

We seem to be moving in the direction of being an entertainment culture: lawyers entertain (and become heroes of television programs), professors entertain, doctors entertain; everybody has to be capable of entertaining, somehow. Those who insist upon total entertainment can move to Disneyland, of course. But the state seems to be moving in that direction itself, so if one is patient he will find Disneyland coming to him. What is going on in California is very amusing—but it isn't very funny.

ARTHUR BERGER

Is Bormann in Argentina?

For fourteen months Argentina has been without her National Congress, and all political parties have been banned. The mustached President Juan Carlos Ongania, who closed the satirical magazine Tia Vincenta a year ago for running a cover cartoon depicting him as a walrus, has just signed into law a long-delayed "anti-Communist" measure which defines a Communist as "one who carries out activities that are proved to be undoubtedly motivated by Communist ideology." The law puts a branch of the intelligence service in charge of deciding who should be charged with being a Communist and provides that "activities prior to the present law must be taken into account."

All Argentines must now carry a paasspört or cedula which has to be presented in purchasing a railroad ticket or in registering at a hotel. A few months back, another law was enacted which provides that youngsters of both sexes on reaching age 14 may be conscripted, if the national interest requires, and put to work in any part of the country for a period of one to three years—a brilliant solution of the vexing problem of student power.

Recently a scheduled production of Harold Pinter's The Homecoming was banned, on the recommendation of the Honorary Commission for the Moral Classification of Theater Spectacles—the third major work to be banned in Buenos Aires in the last three weeks. Among films banned recently is Loves of a Blonde, the prize-winning Czech film. Concern has been expressed in Buenos Aires, reports Barnard L. Collier in a dispatch to The New York Times, that the recent legislation will be used to "intimidate or destroy those that the Argentine regime considers a threat to its power." Martin Bormann, the missing Nazi, may not be hiding in Argentina, but there his spirit marches on.

The Chicago Jewish Forum

Chicago

Little magazines come and go so rapidly and generally have so little substance that neither their arrival nor departure merit public attention. But now and then a magazine of small circulation establishes a lasting place for itself by reason of its quality or longevity or through filling a definite need. The Chicago Jewish Forum is such a magazine. It has now completed twenty-five years of continuous publication under the aegis of one man, Benjamin Weintroub, who has been its editor, publisher, and man of all tasks. We hope that it will enjoy many more years of useful existence under Mr. Weintroub's devoted direction.

Sonic Boom Tests

With the Concord scheduled for its initial test flight not many months hence, the British Government has belatedly taken some official cognizance of an annoying yet inevitable fact: The British-French supersonic plane will create a sonic boom whenever it flies at or above the speed of sound.

Since there are people in the world who do not like to be subjected to shock waves, thunderous noises, or other painful assaults upon the senses, someone in the government decided that it might be prudent to determine the British tolerance for annoyances of this sort. Arrangements were made for the RAF to create some sonic booms in the vicinity of London. The British public was not told when to expect a boom on every occasion. The results, predictably, were inconclusive. They simply indicated that many people did not like the booms.

The fact of the matter is that the tests—like those conducted in the United States—were unscientific in the extreme. They did not take into account the fact that the sound and shock of the sonic boom varies with atmospheric conditions in a manner not fully understood. Nor could they purport to simulate the boom that will be created by the Concord, since the tests were made with much smaller planes. The intensity of the boom increases with the size of the plane.

But the most glaring omission in all the sonic boom tests is that they do not take into account the real effects of the sonic boom on people. The first major U.S. tests, conducted in Oklahoma City, produced data concerning the number of windows broken, the amount of plaster shattered, and the number of claims filed for property damage. The most recent U.S. tests, in the Mojave Desert, tabulated certain property damage statistics plus the stated opinions of the local residents—most of whom are dependent upon the Air Force Base for a living.

But none of the tests has as yet measured any of the important effects upon people. We do not know how much time will be required to return to sleep after having been rudely awakened by a sonic boom. We know virtually nothing about their effects on the nervous systems of normal people—much less people suffering from hypertension. Not even the most rudimentary physiological tests have been made to determine the effects on heart beat, perspiration, adrenalin flow, or ability to concentrate. We do not even know what effect the boom may have on laboratory animals.

But what we do know about the boom is disturbing. There is sufficient cause for alarm that some truly scientific sonic boom tests should be undertaken—this time by biochemists, physicians and other scientifically trained people who are competent to judge the effect on human beings.

Although the FAA has spent thousands of dollars on boom tests designed to show how much property damage the boom may cause, those tests provide small clue concerning the human damage that may ensue. To date our government has not even undertaken simple physiological tests that could provide important data—tests similar to those presently required before any company can market a lipstick, an insecticide, or a household paint.

Meat Inspection: The New Jungle

NICK KOTZ

Mr. Kotz is a Washington correspondent for the Des Moines Register and the Minneapolis Tribune. He has been credited by Sen. Walter Mondale with first having called attention to the inadequacies of existing meat inspection legislation.

Washington

Does the American citizen have an inherent right to safe, government-inspected meat, even when traveling through a state that does not provide meat inspection? Aled P. Davies, genial and skilled chief lobbyist for the American Meat Institute, nonchalantly denies it.

When Rep. Thomas Foley (D., Wash.) peppered him in mid-July with questions about how the traveler can be assured the hamburger he buys is made of safe, federally inspected meat, Davies replied casually that he might variously demand federally inspected meat, ask to see the meat package, determine the meat's condition by smelling it, or—if he is really nervous—carry his own meat with him.

Lounging easily in the witness chair before a House Agriculture Livestock Subcommittee, which usually follows the advice of his industry, Davies said he was not nervous. He expressed complete confidence in the wholesomeness of American meat, whether federally inspected, state inspected, or not inspected at all.

The hearing was called to consider legislation to modernize a 1906 federal meat inspection law which has not been significantly changed since Upton Sinclair provoked it with The Jungle, which deals inadequately with conditions in a fast-changing meat industry and which leaves 15 per cent of American meat slaughtering and 25 per cent of meat processing exempt from federal inspection. But since the sessions were sparsely attended and largely ignored by the press, the vast majority of Americans were not privy to Davies' view that visitors to a state are no more entitled to special meat protection than to special hunting laws. State laws differ on many issues, he said.

Meat produced for interstate commerce must be federally inspected, but 8.7 billion pounds (enough to feed 30 million people) are sold annually intrastate without federal inspection. It is doubtful that many consumers know that only twenty-five states require inspection of both slaughtering and processing and that even these states usually have insufficient trained personnel to enforce their laws.

Congressman Foley, a subcommittee member, is aware of these facts and their unappetizing significance. The 38-year-old sophomore Representative perked up when Davies said of state inspection systems: "We believe that generally speaking they have provided the kind of consumer protection that the people living in those states have thought necessary and have been willing to pay for."

Foley, who is urging that federal inspection be extended to cover virtually all meat sold in the United States, does not for a minute share Davies' confidence in the public satisfaction. He believes that most housewives feel secure at the market only because they falsely assume that all meat has undergone rigid federal inspection.

Davies is vice president of the American Meat Institute, which represents the largest meat packers. The hostility he expressed toward the need for any new legislation was echoed by representatives of the Independent Meat Packers Association, Western Meat Packers Association, the National Renderers Association, and the National Association of State Departments of Agriculture (NASDA).

One week later, however, most of the major trade associations and NASDA had altered drastically their position and switched their lobbying tactics. Suddenly, most of the meat lobbyists openly or privately began to back a Johnson Administration bill that would strengthen federal enforcement and would provide up to 50 per cent of federal funds to states willing to approximate federal inspection standards. The bill, however, would not expand federal inspection to any more plants.

The meat industry and NASDA now want the bill approved quickly and quietly, their new objective being to head off tougher legislation proposed by Foley and Rep. Neal Smith (D., Ia.). Foley and Smith propose not only to close loopholes in the present law but to bring large intrastate packers under federal inspection, so that 97 per cent of the nation's meat supply would be federally inspected.

The two Congressmen can see no legal logic to limiting federal meat inspection by a 1906 interpretation which restricts the term "interstate commerce" to actual sales across state lines, since most federal laws regulating industry have long assumed jurisdiction over firms having sufficient volume of business "to affect interstate commerce." The federal minimum wage law applies to businesses grossing $250,000 or more a year, and that is the figure the sponsors of the new bill adopt.

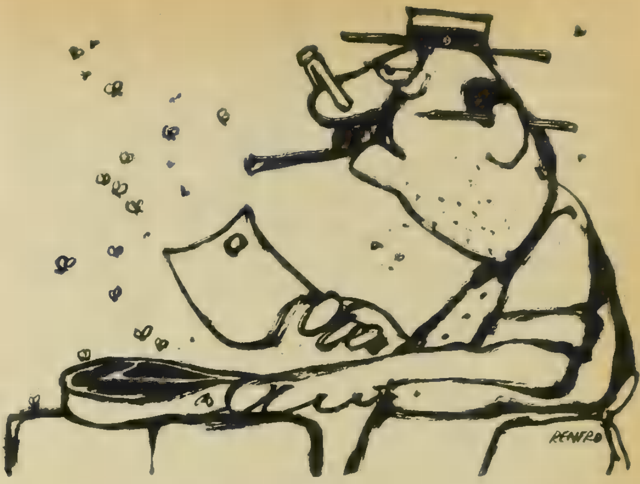
The worst fears of NASDA and the meat industry in the last five years have suddenly become a reality. A few newspapers and consumer critic Ralph Nader have begun to reveal the stomach-turning details of a Department of Agriculture investigation showing conditions in non-federally inspected plants throughout the country. The survey, made in 1962, revealed unbelievably foul sanitary conditions, the use of diseased animals, adulteration of meat products, and labeling practices which mislead consumers as to the contents of luncheon meats, wieners and sausage. It also showed most state and local inspection systems to be completely inadequate, either because of limited laws, insufficient appropriations, unskilled inspectors or lax enforcement.

The report was never released or legislation pushed because the department was transfixed in a Hamlet-like conflict between its responsibility to consumers and its responsibility to promote meat sales. But now the unsavory details are getting about, and the meat industry and cooperative Congressmen want the Administration bill adopted quickly before public alarm and disgust provide pressure for the Smith-Foley bill.

Following a cozy private conference between the industry and leaders of the Agriculture committee, the subcommittee and full committee have quickly approved the Administration bill. The Smith-Foley substitute plan was defeated by overwhelming votes in both the subcommittee and full committee. The committee does not plan to print the report of the 1962 USDA investigation or of a new survey made in July of this year, a survey that confirms the 1962 findings of filth, adulteration, deceptive labeling and farcical state inspection. Most committee members agreed that the USDA studies should be withheld in order to protect the legitimate industry.

But Smith and Foley, joined by a small but growing band of new supporters, are now armed with the reports and are unafraid to use them as they carry their fight to the House floor. Furthermore, Sen. Walter Mondale (D., Minn.), shocked by news accounts of abuses, is now pushing an even stronger bill in the Senate. Adopting concepts from the Administration's earlier 1965 bill, Mondale would make all meat subject to federal inspection but would permit states to inspect intrastate meat when the Secretary of Agriculture finds that they have established adequate systems to guarantee federal standards.

The Administration backed away from the 1965 bill only because NASDA and the meat industry had successfully blocked the legislation from even receiving a hearing in the 89th Congress. Now Smith has asked President Johnson to reassert the Administration's support for stronger legislation.



The most recent USDA survey is not pleasant reading, but it makes vivid the conditions which the proposed legislation is designed to correct. Least surprising were reports from the eight states (Alabama, Alaska, Colorado, Delaware, Maryland, Minnesota, New Hampshire and South Dakota) which provide no state inspection. Among the conditions reported by experienced USDA meat inspectors:

- At a New Hampshire plant: "All rooms were dirty, caked with blood, grease and filth. Men with dirty clothing were boning dirty meat on dirty tables."
- At a Colorado plant: "The band saw had not been cleaned for several days and the bone dust in the bottom of the saw was filled with maggots. I noticed rat droppings and tracks on boxes and wrapping paper in sawdust on the floor."
- At an Alabama plant: "The cooler contained a dressed hog with a sore on the side which had not been trimmed and several hogs with excess hair."

The federal inspectors found similar conditions at plants in many of the thirteen states which provide voluntary meat inspection; that is, meat packers may have state inspection if they request it. These states are Arizona, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, Montana, Nebraska, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island and Texas.

- At a Pennsylvania plant: "Ninety per cent of beef quarters showed evidence of bruises, sores, etc. General sanitation of the entire establishment was very poor."
- At a Texas plant: "Meat drums were very dirty, contaminated with rust and the insides showed a very poor job of washing."
- At an Oklahoma plant: "This company slaughters and processes a full line of sausage and smoked meat products in a building which isn't fit to be a dog food plant. Sewage water was backing up in one room. A dead mouse was lying in the corner of one cooler."
- At a Nebraska plant that advertises "sausage products with that old-world taste," the inspector noted a curing vat "in which corrosion was from one-fourth to one-half inch thick."

Most disturbing, perhaps, were field notes from the twenty-five states which theoretically require inspection. Although industry officials testified that California has the best state meat inspection system, the USDA investigator noted that "canned meat product is produced without any semblance of inspection on the part of California state meat inspection." Of one canning plant in the Los Angeles area, the inspector said: "The operation is located in a building that is falling apart. It is infested with flies, cockroaches and rodents. The whole place smells bad. There is no semblance of sanitation."

- Of general practices in many Wisconsin processing plants: "Ham loaf rarely includes ham; pork trimmings and veal with appropriate amounts of cereal would be more likely."
- At a Florida plant: "In viewing the trimmings being dumped into the chopper chute, we noted a little trash, such as paper drinking cups, in the raw product."
- At the largest non-federally inspected plant in Indiana: "The equipment was contaminated and rusty. Rack trucks used in the transportation of meat were covered with fat and heavily contaminated grease."

The 1967 report does little to support the NASDA and meat industry argument that states are rapidly improving their inspecting systems. Neither does a reading of U.S. Public Health Service statistics which show 20,040 reported cases of salmonellaosis, an intestinal disease which can be transmitted by meat products, in 1966. Public Health Service officials say that probably only 1 per cent of instances of this disease are actually reported.

Meat industry spokesmen also contend that the inspection problem is gradually taking care of itself as an increasing number of plants come under federal inspection. The American Meat Institute stressed that the number of federally inspected plants has doubled since 1950 and that meat under federal inspection has risen by 5 per cent. But the institute did not point out that total meat production has increased by 50 per cent during this period, and that the actual amount of non-federally inspected slaughter has actually risen from 4.2 billion pounds in 1950 to 4.9 billion in 1966.

Various opponents of expanded federal inspection have their own particular reasons for disliking it. The state agriculture department officials do not want the federal government to take over part of their domain, particularly with the clear implication that they are not doing their job. Many independent meat packers know that they would be unable to meet rigid federal requirements, especially those for plant construction. Some conservative Congressmen, state officials and meat firm executives simply are opposed in principle to any expansion of federal government into state activities.

One would suppose, however, that the giant firms would favor complete federal inspection, since more than 90 per cent of their production is already federally inspected. Yet interviews with officials of the eight largest meat packing firms reveal that only one—Oscar Mayer and Co.—favors expanded federal inspection. It is perhaps not coincidence that Mayer is one of the very few national firms which does all of its slaughtering and processing under federal inspection.

Publicly, officials of the largest firms say only that they fear Congress will not appropriate adequate funds to maintain an expanded federal system. They also express fear that dual federal standards will develop, less rigid standards being applied to smaller companies. USDA officials estimate it would cost $30 million annually to provide expanded inspection as proposed by Foley and Smith. Smith points out that the expense amounts to less than one-tenth of a cent per pound of meat and would be a small price to pay for the safety inherent in rigid federal meat inspection.

In these inspection procedures, federal inspectors scrutinize meat continuously in the production process, beginning with inspection before slaughter, followed by examination of organs of the slaughtered animal, and continuing through whatever processing may be involved. Last year, federal inspectors examined more than 25 billion pounds of meat and condemned 250 million pounds because of disease, spoilation or adulteration.

Several witnesses before the livestock subcommittee have suggested that a more vital concern for some of the largest firms is to avoid federal inspection of their relatively few branch processing plants which sell entirely within a state. Arnold Mayer, legislative representative for the Amalgamated Meat Cutters and Butcher Workmen of North America (AFL-CIO), testified:

"Live cattle which obviously cannot pass inspection is sent to uninspected plants. This is done not only by the small number of get-rich-quick operators but also by some highly respectable firms. The very competitive situation in the industry currently leaves them no alternative. Their competition does it. They must do it."

An official of one of the largest firms admitted privately that his company could not compete effectively in sales of luncheon meats in several important markets if the company's branch plants had to meet federal requirements for sausage and wiener ingredients.

The Agriculture Department has deleted the names of plants inspected in its new investigation, but the 1962 survey reported improper conditions in a number of non-federally inspected branch plants operated by several large national firms.

Swift & Co., the nation's largest packing firm, was criticized for conditions in several of its branch plants. A spokesman for Swift said that 97 per cent of the firm's slaughtering and 90 per cent of its processing is carried out under federal inspection. The company reportedly sells about 4 billion pounds of meat annually. Of the eight national firms interviewed, only Swift declined to reveal how many plants it operates without federal inspection.

Rodney Leonard, Deputy Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, told the subcommittee that modern technology—in addition to providing a wide variety of better and handier meat products—has made it easier for unscrupulous operators to mask the true condition of meat. He referred to the use of high-speed equipment, the prevalence of frozen meat (which must be defrosted for effective inspection), fast curing processes, artificial smoking, coloring agents, "and other additives which are potentially deceptive and dangerous to one's health when their use is not regulated."

Leonard acknowledged that the federal inspection system is struggling to keep up with such technological innovations, and believed that few, if any, state inspection systems have sufficient competent personnel to inspect complicated, modern processing plants.

Most supporters of expanded federal inspection readily admit that even the present Administration bill would be a step in the right direction. Most important, it would give the Agriculture Department authority to keep so-called inedible meat out of human food supplies. At present, USDA has virtually no power to check on the activities of renderers, dog and cat food manufacturers, and other handlers of inedible meat that sometimes gets slipped illegally into products which are intended for human consumption.

Labor union official Mayer and other supporters of expanded federal inspection doubt, however, that state meat inspection will be greatly improved by the offer of federal funds and technical assistance. Referring to this provision in the Administration bill, Mayer said: "It would leave the situation almost the way it is now. It is an effort to buy the states into enacting meat inspection laws. But there is no requirement for the states to do so. Nor are there any real sanctions to assure that the legislation and its enforcement is effective."

The proposal of legislation has at least led to some changes in the meat buying habits of a number of secretaries on Capitol Hill. Girls in the offices of Congressmen dealing with the legislation confess they are for the first time examining processed meat packages to make sure that they contain the federal stamp of approval. It is denoted by a circle with the wording "U.S. inspected and passed by the Department of Agriculture." Federally approved raw meat bears the purple stamp, "USDA inspected." If consumers generally would insist on the federal stamp, they might get the legislation they deserve.

VIETNAM

The Generals Sing an Old Song

PHILIPPE DEVILLERS

Mr. Devillers, director of Southeast Asia Studies at the Fondation Nationale des Sciences Politiques in Paris, is the author of Histoire du Vietnam de 1940 à 1952 and other works.

Paris

On January 28, North Vietnam's Foreign Minister Nguyen Duy Trinh (long known as a pro-Chinese hard-liner) declared in an interview that if the U.S. really wanted talks, it must unconditionally end its bombing of the DRV and "other warlike acts against it." This was the first time that North Vietnam had offered access to talks with no mention of "points" or "principles." Hanoi, also Moscow, gave unusual prominence to this interview and there was no doubt in Europe that it was a signal as important as Ho Chi Minh's November, 1953, interview with the Swedish daily Expressen, which started the process that culminated eight months later in the Geneva Agreements.

Washington heard the signal, but did not respond. As William Bundy, one of the architects of U.S. policy in Vietnam, put it a few weeks later, the Administration did not believe the signal was serious because it was public. (This reasoning, incidentally, would seem to cast a dubious light on the so widely publicized U.S. peace offensives.) In actual fact, the signal was hotly discussed by the American strategists. In February, Hanoi was informed through neutral channels that an "intense struggle" was going on within the White House between those who wished to reply and those who said that the interview proved Hanoi was losing the war, and that "by August" the American position in Vietnam would be improved to the point where Hanoi would be forced to accept American conditions. On hearing this, a North Vietnamese representative said: "Once again the Americans are mistaken and badly informed. By August the situation will be worse for them." It was clear at the time he spoke that Hanoi had received from its allies (and especially from the Russians) pledges of modern weapons and other new equipment, and that a good part of it was already in Vietnam.

August is just over, and everyone can decide for himself who was right and who was wrong. The White House in February spurned what was probably the best chance it ever had to get negotiation promptly started. It waved aside the Kosygin-Wilson plan, resumed the bombing after the Tet truce, and once more escalated the war.

The least that can be said is that the results have not measured up to expectations. Though a series of "major victories" and local successes have been announced, the fact is that the war has assumed a new aspect which seems to have taken some experts by surprise. The U.S. Air Force can still strike heavy blows on the communications system of North Vietnam (bridges, roads, railways tracks and yards), on the power plants, oil parks, hospitals, schools (called barracks) and airfields; but it meets increasing resistance from enemy flak, and—more important—has been unable to prevent the forces of both the DRV and the NLF from lifting the intensity of the ground struggle to new heights.

Since April, the fighting has concentrated more and more heavily in the area close to the 17th Parallel, the Demilitarized Zone and the area of the South Vietnamese First Army Corps. There, in a very difficult country of jungle-covered hills and ridges, something like positional warfare has developed, and the Marines have had to face an enemy extremely skilled in jungle warfare and now provided with new Russian guns, rockets and missiles. Isolated posts, hill bunkers, have been repeatedly assaulted and are held only at heavy cost, air support being difficult. General Westmoreland has been forced to move into this area units that were already engaged in the South.

The outcome of these hard battles has led Hanoi to believe that the NLF is now trained and equipped to wage the people's war in the South without reliance upon the North's manpower. It should be added that north of Danang the NLF has the advantage of support from the population of central Vietnam which, as a result of General Ky's cruel repression of the Buddhists last year, now actively or secretly supports the Front. Hatred of the Marines has reached new levels in this region.

In the north, as well as in the center and south, North Vietnamese and the NLF are fighting harder than ever, and American casualties are running at the highest rates of the war. Despite optimistic reports, "pacification" is a failure and is likely to remain so. At the time of Secretary McNamara's trip, it was suggested that South Vietnamese combat teams be attached as auxiliaries or hostages to the American units, to help in the "pacification." This was what the French did in the 1890s and more recently, from 1949 to 1952 when, faced with the reluctance of Paris to send reinforcements, the High Command in Indo-China decided to "jaunier" (make yellow) its units.

"Pacification," writes The New York Times on May 17, "requires saturation of the area with well-trained allied troops" and among army officers "there is virtual unanimity that despite the aid of about 55,000 South Korean, Australian and New Zealand troops, and more than 700,000 South Vietnamese military and paramilitary forces, there are not enough men to go around." The U.S. military insists that the troops it is getting cannot produce "the results the President wants" and that at the present rate of Northern infiltration and American "progress" on the battlefield, the war could go on for years. Probably Au Truong Thanh (who endeavored to run as a peace candidate in the recent elections) was right when he told American correspondents on July 4 that there could be no military victory over the Communists in Vietnam "unless you are prepared to completely destroy the country. And because of the international situation you cannot do that. . . ."

However, military victory is what the generals want. And because, despite the huge machine set in motion for that purpose, victory is still not in sight, they are becoming exasperated. Continuously, repeatedly, they urge the President to escalate—to send more troops, to suppress criticism. Five divisions (about 150,000 men with the supporting units) are thought necessary. General Westmoreland has let it be known that he needs these troops to retain the initiative in South Vietnam. Headquarters in Saigon has stressed the continuous infiltration and build-up of the enemy (and Joseph Alsop cites among Northern divisions recently infiltrated, the 325th which he identified in August, 1965, as already fighting in central Vietnam!). Stalemate is denied. The enemy is said to be hurting badly, the war is being slowly but steadily won, the United States must just keep the pressure on, or still better step it up. The war is "a contest of wills," it becomes increasingly a "war of attrition," and the Americans must show the "Commies" that they cannot hope to see the day when the United States gives up. It is an old song, only too well known on this side of the Atlantic. It was heard from German generals in Russia; it was heard later in Indo-China and in Algeria.

Reacting to increased criticism of the air attack on North Vietnam, military advisers have told the White House that should it choose to decrease the bombing, the army "will require still more soldiers in the South to handle the concomitant increase in enemy combat capability" resulting from stepped-up infiltration.

Washington still shows some reluctance to give in to the generals. In July, Mr. McNamara was "doubtful of U.S. intelligence reports of North Vietnam troop build-ups in the South" over the last three months. It seems thus that the Administration is onto some of the tricks used in the "decision-making" process. (In 1950, MacArthur's Tokyo headquarters described an "enormous" invasion of Chinese volunteers into Korea, hoping thus to persuade President Truman of the necessity to drop A-bombs on Manchuria or China.)

Nevertheless, General Westmoreland got 45,000 men and President Johnson decided to escalate the air war, and probably the ground war too. He has thus chosen to yield again to the temptation of a military victory, bringing upon Vietnam still more bombs, napalm, defoliants and other chemical poisons, forced removals of villagers, destructions of "structures," etc.—all in the hope that some day Hanoi will "come to the conference table."

The tragedy is that, by taking this path, the Administration is moving toward an ever-increasing Americanization of the war, and therefore probably toward rising casualties. The capacity of the supporters of the war to delude themselves on this point seems unlimited. They still talk of letting "the South Vietnamese fight for themselves," and comment on "the progress of the South Vietnamese army." Reliable reports from both Vietnamese and neutral sources indicate, however, that if a year ago there still was a chance to rebuild the army, the chance has now gone forever. As an "aggressive force," the South Vietnamese army is virtually nonexistent. Outraged by the way the Americans treat them and speak of them, revolted by orders to destroy villages of their own people on behalf of dubious leaders, angered—or tempted—by corruption that spreads on every level, soldiers and N.C.O.s now just try to get by. Even so, many die in defensive or even "offensive" operations. Figures (from The New York Times) are instructive: In 1964, there were 73,319 desertions from an army of 434,006; in 1965, 113,462 desertions from 531,086; in 1966, 116,406 from 597,977. New measures have been taken this year and spokesmen say there will be no more than 60,000 deserters. They forgot to add that the game has changed. Soldiers now desert within the army, shifting from one battalion to another, and collecting an enlistment premium with each switch.

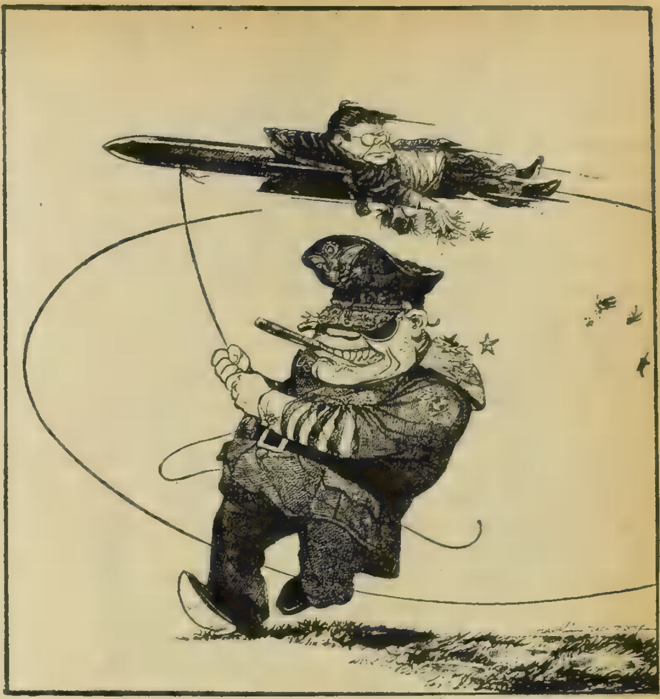
Not infrequently, officers will report 600 or 700 men on the roll, whereas they may have only 400 or 450. They pocket the extra pay and sell the extra equipment and food—sometimes to "traders" acting on behalf of the NLF. On an increasing scale, persons widely believed to be on the "government" side (and being paid by that side) are in fact working for the Front, are keeping it informed of everything the Americans say and plan. General Ky's police does its best to ferret out these agents. The feared chief of police, Gen. Nguyen Ngoc Loan, has gone so far as to work again with Le Kim Tuyen, former chief of the secret police under Diem, who kept excellent files. But terror and fear of assassination work against such efforts. And as the non-Communists and Buddhists in Saigon say: "If the South Vietnamese army cannot win on the battlefield, it is because they do not defend anything worth defending."

The Asian allies are wavering. The Thais and the South Koreans have recently become more aware of the dangers of the game. Guerrilla activity in Thailand has risen to the level that South Vietnam was experiencing in 1960-61, just before the United States began its major commitment, and Bangkok now seems unwilling to participate in a war so widely condemned, to risk a worsening of its relations with so many governments. The Philippines, facing a resurgent Huk activity, has also grown cautious. Korea too faces internal difficulties, and sees no clear interest in an armed intervention into Vietnamese affairs. Thus, from now on, the Americans must wage the Vietnamese War in greater and greater isolation. And, as the Stockholm conference on Vietnam showed this summer, the war is increasingly seen by African, Latin American and Asian countries as a colonial war of unprecedented scale.

This point of view has far-reaching consequences. First, it focuses upon the United States (and upon the United States almost exclusively, since any other belligerents are now identified with the American interest), the ingrained emotions common to former colonies, protectorates or dependencies of European powers. It should be pointed out, however—as Walt W. Rostow patiently explained to me in May, 1965—that the attitudes of the new governments have not much changed and Washington, therefore, sees no need to worry about the opinions of their peoples.

Second, the growing isolation forces farsighted governments of older nations to adjust their policies. They may not want to criticize Washington, but realistically they must remain in sympathy with the new generations of Africa, Asia and Latin America. If only to prevent Peking or Havana from exploiting the opportunities, they must dissociate themselves from President Johnson's policies. It is now a commonplace that the war in Vietnam paralyzes the development of peaceful coexistence between Washington and Moscow. Pressure for "counter-escalation" is therefore increasing in various parts of the world, and as anger deepens, a trend toward advocating force gains momentum.

Has World War III, then, already begun? The explosive colonial character of the war in Vietnam is generating new assessments and decisions. By March of 1966, General de Gaulle, because he had learned the lesson of 1949-54 and did not want the Fifth Republic to be associated with U.S. colonial policies (as the United States had previously been associated with the French Fourth Republic in Indo-China), moved France out of NATO and adopted a policy of active neutrality in the conflict developing between the Anglo-Americans and the Third World. Now, in the last twelve months, international conferences and gatherings have linked the Vietnamese War with the Latin American revolutionary movement and the struggle for black power within the United States. From all information available here, it is difficult not to conclude that the tensions created by the war in Vietnam have begun to boomerang in hitherto relatively stable regions of the globe.



Franklin, Toronto Star

Secretary General U Thant, on May 11, expressed his fear that these tensions were leading into a new World War; but some groups in Europe go so far as to accept the idea that World War III started in February, 1965, when the United States attacked North Vietnam. Since then, according to this view, the war has been slowly but steadily moving forward—"a protracted war," some Chinese papers have called it, "of twenty, thirty or even fifty years" waged, mostly, by harassment and guerrillas, by all the colored peoples against the Anglo-Americans. Psychological mobilization is going on and there can be no doubt that in this context, the recent Middle East war has created in the Arab world emotions which echo those of the Vietnamese War.

One can thus understand why on July 10, in Stockholm, Gunnar Myrdal stressed the "increasing world-wide political and moral isolation of America," and regretted that it "is not realized by the broad strata of the American people . . . . What they do not learn from their newspapers or anybody else is the solid opposition to the American war policy in Vietnam among the peoples on all continents. I consider this a serious fault of the American press and other news media which otherwise are free. To them demonstrations and flag burnings are news, but apparently not the much more important trends of public opinion abroad. . . . The result is that the Americans are left unaware of their increasing moral and political isolation."

It does seem, however, that an appreciable section of American public opinion now finds the time ripe for a reassessment of the Vietnamese question. Whatever the rights or wrongs of the past, the present task is to define America's long-term interest, to decide how well it is served by waging the war in Vietnam to the finish, and to assess the desirability of alternative policies.

That alternatives exist The New York Times showed admirably on May 24: "The alternatives of the Vietnam war have become as clear as they ever have been: either a military victory or negotiation. Since January, the one and only possible route towards negotiations has been a cessation of the bombing of North Vietnam. The attempt might fail, but could anyone claim that present policies are succeeding. . . ? The American policy of fighting a 'limited war' means simply prolonging the agonies of wounds, deaths and destructions. When the relatively small risks of an unconditional pause in the bombing of North Vietnam are weighed against the enormous risks of a much greater and wider war, the choice seems easy. . . ."

As early as February, Kosygin endorsed Nguyen Duy Trinh's proposal, and interpreted it as meaning that should the United States unconditionally stop the bombing of North Vietnam, it would be possible to explore avenues toward a political solution of the Vietnamese problem. In February, also, after the resumption of bombing, Nhan Dan, official Hanoi daily, interpreted the Trinh interview as a clear offer to negotiate. In an interview with Jeune Afrique (April 16), Prime Minister Pham Van Dong said that if the Americans were wise enough to understand that the first step is up to them, the Vietnamese would show that they knew how to be generous. On May 8, in Stockholm, Col. Ha Van Lau said that his government continued sympathetic toward finding a settlement of the war, but that it could never negotiate until the United States ended its bombing of North Vietnam. At the end of May, Pham Van Dong, in an interview with a pro-Chinese Australian Communist paper, said the offer to discuss a settlement if the United States permanently and unconditionally stopped bombing his country "still had full value," and at the same time, Foreign Minister Nguyen Duy Trinh reiterated in an interview with the Japanese Kyodo agency Hanoi's "expressed willingness to work out a political solution, including negotiations," adding, however, that "the United States should indicate its good faith with actions." In July, during the World Conference on Vietnam, delegates from the DRV again repeated that if the bombardments were to cease for good, there could be talks. In June, Eastern European sources had hinted strongly that if the Americans would stop the bombing, negotiations could start immediately and Mr. Kosygin is said to have confirmed this to President Johnson at Glassboro. But the President again tragically missed his opportunity. He is said to have been persuaded by his advisers that the United States was strong enough to humiliate Moscow in the face of the Third World, a folly that merely reinforces the propaganda coming out of Peking, Havana and Paris.

As matters now stand, the Administration still prefers to wait for the enemy to surrender. In his July 19 speech, Secretary Rusk once again ruled out any cessation of the bombing of North Vietnam until Hanoi gave some indication of what it could do to scale down its "half of the war." "If Hanoi is prepared to abandon its effort to seize South Vietnam by force, there can be peace within hours, but so long as they attempt to seize South Vietnam by force, the struggle will continue, and there will be some tough days ahead."

Except for those naive enough to believe still in the Administration's candid desire for peace, no one can be in doubt as to what that means. The facts have been put clearly by a former Presidential assistant, Richard N. Goodwin, who on May 6 in San Francisco accused the government of wanting complete military victory rather than a negotiated settlement. "We have not made up our mind to accept a negotiated settlement at all. We want a victory." In May, A. Hetherington, reporting for the Manchester Guardian, asked the military in Washington whether they would accept another pause in the bombing to see whether negotiations could be started. The answer he got was, "No, the restocking of ammunition in the South during the Tet truce in February was too great. . . ." The new escalation of bombing is further evidence that, as in Imperial Germany, the general staff (supported by industrial magnates) has the decisive word in councils of the Chief Executive.

The minds of the President's most influential advisers are now apparently set beyond hope of change. Sen. George D. Aiken expressed that view when he admitted last May his conviction "that the present Administration cannot achieve an honorable peace in Vietnam." Gunnar Myrdal said in his closing address to the Stockholm World Conference: "The small group of people around President Johnson who are running this undeclared, large-scale and cruel war on the Asian continent are poisoned by their own rhetoric and their own propaganda, and by their need to defend all the mistakes they have already committed and are committing in an escalating measure . . . . Some time ago I gave up hope of bringing to reason the group in Washington that is now the motor of the war in Vietnam . . . ."

What it comes to, then, is that the citizens of the United States must now decide. Is this war, waged for six years, 8,000 miles away in a small and innocuous country of Asia, the vital issue of the decade for the United States? Is it so important that it must be carried to completion, though that may mean the sacrifice of peace within the United States and even of world peace itself?

The Administration has used many arguments to justify its course, and one after another the arguments have been attacked, often successfully. However, some are still in use, and those are worth discussing.

Is it really a "limited" war, as Washington says, to make it more palatable and to allay fears of world conflict? Spending at the direct rate of $28 billion, and probably at $50 billion if all indirect expenses are included; a death rate of 10,000 a year; wholesale destruction of Vietnam's cities and villages with the (temporary) exception of Hanoi and Haiphong; the seeds of hatred spreading through the continents of Asia, Africa, Latin America—all this scarcely fits the compass of a limited affair. In the glossary of "limited wars," the words "attrition," "obliteration," "removals," "refugees," have probably also a "limited" meaning.

Are America's vital interests really involved? To contain China? China once again suffers civil war and Vietnam for ten centuries has kept independent of China without the slightest help from a foreign power. In any case, as Secretary of State John Foster Dulles said on May 11, 1954, Southeast Asia can be defended without Indo-China. With the Seventh Fleet in the China Sea, with bases in Okinawa, Taiwan, the Philippines and Thailand, the United States has all the air and sea power necessary to dissuade Peking from any dangerous initiative. Fighting a war in the jungles of Vietnam has nothing to do with China's containment.

What exactly is the nature of the "sacred commitments"? In November, 1954, wishing to maintain their consulates in Hanoi, the Department of State and the British Foreign Office asserted that Vietnam, according to the Geneva Agreements, was one country and that they had thus the right to maintain consulates in the North since they had recognized the Saigon government. Reference to the 17th Parallel as a "line" is to be found only in the military agreement signed between the French and Vietminh commands, which has never been countersigned by any foreign power. It thus cannot be a national border. However, Secretary Rusk affirmed on July 6 in Chicago that America would stay in Vietnam "until the right of South Vietnamese people to work out their own future under a government of their own free choice has been secured."

But in truth a people can hardly afford to be "protected" in the way that the United States has protected South Vietnam since 1960. Writing to the Herald Tribune (June 20), W. J. Sulzman, of the North American College, Vatican City, remarked: "The term 'war of attrition' can be more accurately used to describe what the people of South Vietnam, Vietcong and otherwise, have had to endure in the name of defending their freedom, than it can be to describe the overall strategy for victory of the United States and its allies. It can hardly be said that the people of Vietnam have ever enjoyed freedom since the beginning of this horrendous struggle thirty years ago. But now, the situation has worsened to such a degree that 'war of annihilation' would seem to better describe it."

With frustration and exasperation comes rising intolerance. Those who oppose the war are accused of "doing what the hawks in Hanoi most desire": "making our will look weak and strengthening the enemy's proportionately"; "giving aid and comfort to the enemy"; "betraying the boys dying for freedom in Vietnam." Letters to the papers insist that "the best way to break the enemy's will is to convince him that we are certain to fight as long as necessary to insure our goals," and the Detroit Free Press proclaims that "Ho should realize that the U.S. will never fail to support its war in the field as did the French Government in the early 50s." Protestors and demonstrators are described as Red pawns, and the FBI is urged to investigate. Gen. Maxwell Taylor warns against losing the war in Washington while it is being steadily won on the battlefield, and former President Eisenhower scorns the behavior of politicians faced with a war.

But slandering the dissenters is not proving to be a very effective device; it merely calls attention to a split in national opinion that is remarkable in a country at war. In his admirable speech at the University of Connecticut last year, Senator Fulbright drew the line between "the two Americas." The first America still keeps the spirit of freedom and would use power in its service. The second America, essentially money-minded, relies heavily on financial and physical power (military and nonmilitary) to secure new "positions of strength"—and new markets. In its view, Vietnam is a key position in the New "Far West" (as described in Look, May 30), to be held at any cost.

Some intuition into the forces at work within formerly colonized peoples is enjoyed today by a considerable group of American citizens. Better than their chauvinistic counterparts, they understand modern nationalism (even when, by historical circumstances, it is permeated with Marxism), as well as the meaning that Asian and African *people*s (not their Westernized oligarchies) attach to the word "freedom." It is by such insights that the real nature of the Vietnamese War is to be grasped. For more than forty years, the Vietnamese people have been actively struggling to achieve genuine independence, national unity, the eradication of feudal privileges, of corruption, of poverty. This struggle threatens nobody except some small but powerful cliques, and the foreign interests that protect them. Helping the Vietnamese to achieve their national aims is only continuing in the path set by the American and French Revolutions. Helping the cliques is following the example of indirect colonial rule, as practiced by Great Britain and other imperialist states in past centuries. Who today will believe that the cliques can prevail over the awakened peoples?

Senator Aiken is right: "The President predicates peace on the capitulation of the enemy, and that solution seems far in the distance." No solution is in sight, and no vital U.S. interests are involved. Only the amour-propre of a few generals and politicians is at stake, and for this the cost is high.

Washington can still change its course. "Every military strategy must be subject to constant review and reappraisal," wrote the Washington Star on May 24. "It is necessary to watch for the moment where a change of strategy may produce a greater gain at a decreased risk. That moment has arrived. We should say nothing, explain nothing, set no conditions or limitations on our switch of strategy. We should simply stop bombing and see what the enemy does. We will always have the right and the capacity to respond appropriately, no matter what he does. . . ."

The opportunity offered by the North Vietnamese overture of January 28 is still there. The United States can seize it immediately. It has only to dare. After the cessation of bombing, discussions with Hanoi would probably soon begin. To be fruitful, their emphasis should be more on the political than on the military aspects of the problem. And once seated around the conference table, American and North Vietnamese delegates will have to face a problem whose solution is not really theirs to decide (they can only help): how can a genuine democracy and a genuine independence be restored to the area now designated as South Vietnam? This will necessarily require political negotiation with the NLF, which leads the Southern armed insurrection.

It is obviously not easy for the United States to enter into direct talks with the NLF, but Washington this year even missed the opportunity to assist in an honorable start toward peace in the South. Only a free election could provide a popular government capable of dealing effectively with the NLF, Hanoi and the United States. Instead, the military regime in Saigon has been allowed to organize a mockery of Presidential elections, from which such candidates as Duong Van Minh (a liberal general), Au Truong Thanh (a peace candidate,) not to speak of every friend of Nguyen Huu Tho (the NLF leader) or of Thich Tri Quang (the Buddhist nationalist leader) have been barred. It is as though an American Presidential election were to offer Generals Walker and LeMay, running against Governors Wallace and Maddox, with regular Republican and Democratic candidates banned by the John Birch Society and the Ku Klux Klan. That is what President Johnson, in his press conference of August 18 called "decisive progress towards a representative government."

"We cannot but continue to fight until we shall have factual evidence that a peaceful mind at last prevails in the counsels of the White House." That was said by a spokesman for Hanoi in March, 1966. It is now September, 1967, and there is still no indication that the Johnson Administration is prepared to put an end to its intervention in Vietnamese domestic affairs, to abandon its efforts to impose its protectorate upon the South Vietnamese people, to drop its plans to set up, with a handful of local warlords, an American Manchukuo on the shores of the South China Sea.

IT'S GETTING NOISIER . . .

CARL DREHER

When President Johnson proclaims that overloading with noise "is without precedent and poses a serious threat to the health and welfare of mankind," we know in our ears and nerves he is right. When Rep. Theodore R. Kupferman says that noise detracts from the quality of our lives as does a filthy street or a polluted stream and that we have no right to call ourselves civilized unless we do something about it, few will disagree (but fewer still will easily surrender their own right to make noise for profit or pleasure). All abuse of the environment is like that.

Not that noise is entirely a modern affliction—Don Quixote's frightful adventure with the fulling hammers shows it isn't—but in our time it has grown to monstrous proportions. While the noise level has been rising steadily, counter factors, such as distance and physical barriers, have been weakening. And instead of striving to narrow the gap between information on noise control and its application, we have allowed it to widen. Public resentment will eventually reverse this trend, but in the meantime it is each for himself and the devil deafen the hindmost.

A little acquaintance with the physics of sound is necessary both for acoustic self-defense and effective social action against noise. Sound, whether objectionable or otherwise, varies in power over an enormous range. Standing near the tail of a jet airliner with all four engines roaring, a person has his eardrums assaulted with a pressure a thousand trillion (1,000,000,000,000,000) times greater than the minimum sound he can distinguish against a silent background (an approach to which is to be found only in the laboratory). Since acousticians, and engineers dealing with electronic reproduction of sound, have better things to do than write zeroes, they borrowed from the Bell Telephone Laboratories the decibel (db), a unit so useful that it is now coming into vernacular use. It is a tenth of a bel, named, with the final l dropped, after Alexander Graham Bell. An appropriate memorial: before he invented the telephone, Bell was a teacher of the deaf.

Decibels are used in calculations of power, of pressure (the response of the ear is proportional to pressure) and for many other technical purposes but, however applied, a decibel is just a logarithmic ratio. Logarithms afford a rapid means of multiplication by addition and division by subtraction (a slide rule does it mechanically) by means of which the cumbersome number cited above can be written as 10 to the fifteenth power (10^{15}) or, still more conveniently, 150 db. The whole vast range of sound volume is thus compressed into an easily manageable compass.

The accompanying graph shows the db range, from minimal perception of sound by young, normally sensitive ears, which is taken as zero, to the output of a siren that is rumored to be the latest exotic weapon for use in Vietnam. It has been compiled from a number of sources which do not agree precisely and is intended only to give a general idea of the magnitudes involved.

Besides their use in arranging sounds in ascending order of physical strength, decibel ratings help us to assess the subjective magnitude of changes, up or down. While there are important complicating factors, such as pitch, lowering the level of a sound by 2 db will be just about noticeable, a drop of 10 db will be significant, while a reduction of 20 to 30 db will generally eliminate a noise that was previously disturbing. The reason is again logarithmic—a 30 db reduction corresponds to a pressure reduction on the ear of 10^3 (1,000) which is obviously considerable. Conversely, a rise of 10 db may change an unobtrusive noise into an annoying one. In another application, building structures, such as walls and floors, may be rated in db for their ability to cut down noise.

Noise can damage hearing in a number of ways. Blast trauma that ruptures the eardrum or disrupts the chain of small bones that transmit sound within the ear is exceptional, but occupational deafness is common and has assumed great importance in the field of industrial hygiene. It was well established in the 19th century that blacksmiths, boiler makers and other workers in noisy surroundings tended to become hard of hearing earlier in life than other people. With increase in industrial noise and recognition of the principle that employees are entitled to compensation for injury incurred in the course of work, this type of disability has increasingly concerned management and labor. What with the differences of individual tolerance and the difficulties in measuring complex types of noise, quantitative standards are not easy to set up, but the need is as obvious as for speed limits on highways.

Leo L. Beranek, a leading acoustical engineer, observes that men of 30 who have been exposed to a work environment with an average noise level of 90 db for periods as short as ten years, may have hearing as impaired as men in their 60s and 70s who have worked in a quiet environment. The danger limit for most individuals is somewhere between 80 and 85 db. The U.S. Air Force, the largest single employer with an inescapably noisy environment for much of the personnel, has settled on 85 db, in the frequency range important for speech intelligibility, as the level where ear protection is mandatory. Investigation has shown, however, that some degree of hearing loss may occur at levels around 80 db, which is well below many of the levels commonly encountered under all sorts of contemporary conditions.

The existence of these community noise levels means that few people, especially in cities, can escape harmful exposure, and since more and more of us live in cities, or in suburbs which often are just as noisy, the incidence of noise-caused deafness is pretty sure to increase. For the past thirty years the noise level has been increasing at the rate of 1 db a year. In general, noise varies with the power of the source, and some of the increase is attributable to a horsepower race which, unfortunately for our hearing, is not confined to automobile designers (who, unlike some other machine designers, at least make some efforts to reduce noise). The typical self-propelled power mower of fifteen years ago was driven by a 1-horsepower gasoline engine. Now, even "economy" and push models are equipped with 3 or 3½ H.P. engines, and some householders with a total lot area of 1 acre acquire prestige among the neighbors—and help to deafen them—with riding mowers or tractors that may develop as much as 12 H.P. Indoors, where sound is reinforced by reverberation, vacuum cleaners boast of electric motors rated at more than 2 H.P.; less than 1 H.P. is exceptional. In the kitchen, with an exhaust fan, dishwasher and garbage grinder going simultaneously, it is said that the noise level may reach 100 db.

High fidelity music reproduction affords another example. A stereo amplifier for home use will commonly be advertised as producing 120 watts, or 60 watts of audio power per channel. The advantage is supposed to be that momentary peaks will be accommodated without distortion, but since the acoustic output of a 100-man symphony orchestra seldom rises above 10 watts, and modern loud-speakers are quite efficient, it is hard to see what anyone can legitimately do with such power in a living room.

Surface traffic is a major noise producer not only in the cities, where it is taken for granted, but within a band hundreds of yards wide along every express highway. Since intercity expressways extend for hundreds and thousands of miles, acoustically they bring the city to the country on a formidable scale. Every time an interstate highway is extended, we witness not only the destruction of houses in its path but the engulfment by noise of a far greater number of residences whose occupants had previously enjoyed a measure of quiet. There is compensation for property that is condemned for a road, but none for the loss of a peaceful environment.

City subways and rail lines are another source of high-level noise. The San Francisco Bay Area Rapid Transit District, the Montreal subway and a few other urban-suburban railroads have taken pains to reduce noise, but most of the major systems, like that of New York City, seem to be operated on the basis that noise is unimportant. Well-known, perfectly feasible engineering measures to abate noise are regarded as a refinement to which the users of public transportation are not entitled.

Fortunately the exposure of the individual is intermittent, and people vary in susceptibility. This is true also of those exposed to occupational noise: some come through with unimpaired hearing, while others suffer rapid deterioration and should be taken out of this kind of environment before irreversible damage is done. However, there is now convincing evidence that millions of Americans sustain ear damage, usually without knowing it, from a high general noise level. Dr. Samuel Rosen and others have made audiometry measurements on Mabaan tribesmen, who live in an exceptionally quiet desert region in the southeast Sudan. The majority of Americans (men somewhat more than women) suffer severe hearing loss at the higher frequencies in old age, while the Mabaans show the same acuity of hearing at age 75 as the average American at age 25. The elderly American hears speech, but guesses at the meaning. He misses the low-energy fricatives (f, th, ch, etc.) and consonants that are essential for intelligibility. These researches cast doubt on the concept of "normal" loss of hearing, and indicate that those who already have some hearing loss should expose themselves as little as possible to loud noise.

Noise is also charged with causing emotional and physical illness. Dr. Rosen has probed a possible correlation between noise and coronary heart disease, which is as rare among the Mabaans as deafness, but their lives are so different in all respects from those of Westerners that the evidence is only suggestive. Constant interference with sleep is certainly harmful but, again, individual susceptibility varies. The same is true of reaction to low-level noise. Dr. Beranek points out that while some people are able to live happily next to elevated railroads, trucking routes, airplane flight paths and other racket-making sources, at the other extreme there is a group that seem to be disturbed by any noise, however faint, that is not of their own making. Interviews elicited the fact that these people were dissatisfied with other features of their surroundings as well.

Boosting the ambient acoustic field by increases in household motor size, high-speed roads, faster aircraft, etc., is one way in which a mere nuisance may be converted into a menace. Yet noise is by no means the most intractable type of pollution. One saving feature is its local character. Even thunder, an extremely loud noise at close range, dies away at a distance of 12 miles at most. Like other forms of radiation, sound in the open is subject to the inverse square law: double the distance, and the intensity drops to a fourth. The waves also bounce back from barriers and are attenuated as they pass through. But as air and surface vehicles multiply in numbers, speed and power, distance becomes less of a protection; at the same time modern building construction tends to transmit noise, whether from the outside or from room to room, to a greater extent than pre-World War II construction.

There is no question that modern building practices incorporate many improvements, but protection against noise is rarely one of them, despite the fact that from an engineering standpoint it is more readily available than ever before. Efforts have been made to cut down on noise, especially in one- and two-family housing, but the results have been poor. The situation is summed up in a survey in House and Home (December, 1966): "What ever became of the big noise about the Quiet Home?" The story begins: "Few merchandising ideas ever looked more promising than did the Quiet Home in 1963." The second paragraph ends: "What happened? Is the Quiet Home dead and buried?" The post-mortem that follows is thorough, and gives some promise of limited success in the future. It points up an important fact: much of our affliction with noise is due, in more senses than one, to people.

A typical experience is that of a leading Southwest building firm, Fox & Jacobs of Dallas, which centered a major promotion around anti-noise construction. Spending considerable money on research and development aimed at applying existing acoustic knowledge to medium-priced houses, they evolved a sound-conditioning package costing roughly $500 for houses in the $13,000 to $35,000 range. They sold just four Quiet Homes. Other builders had the same experience. N. P. Dodge of Omaha summed it up in 1966: "We were very disappointed with the public's reaction. This thing has no sex appeal whatsoever. People are interested in price; the average buyer—of homes, say, in the $30,000 range—has only a nominal interest in quality."

The National Association of Homebuilders, in cooperation with manufacturers of acoustic materials, has switched the promotion from "Quiet Home" to "Quiet Living" or, more specifically, "Quiet Room," which costs about $200, or somewhat more for zonal quieting. They are also resorting to an indirect or "piggyback" sales appeal involving rooms for specialized functions—a study center, a teen room, a pre-schooler room, a party room, a home gym, an arts-and-crafts room, in the hope that these gags "will be distinctive enough emblems of newness and status to entice prospects." When a prospect shows interest, the salesman points out the indispensability of sound-conditioning if the study center and the home gym, for example, are to coexist.

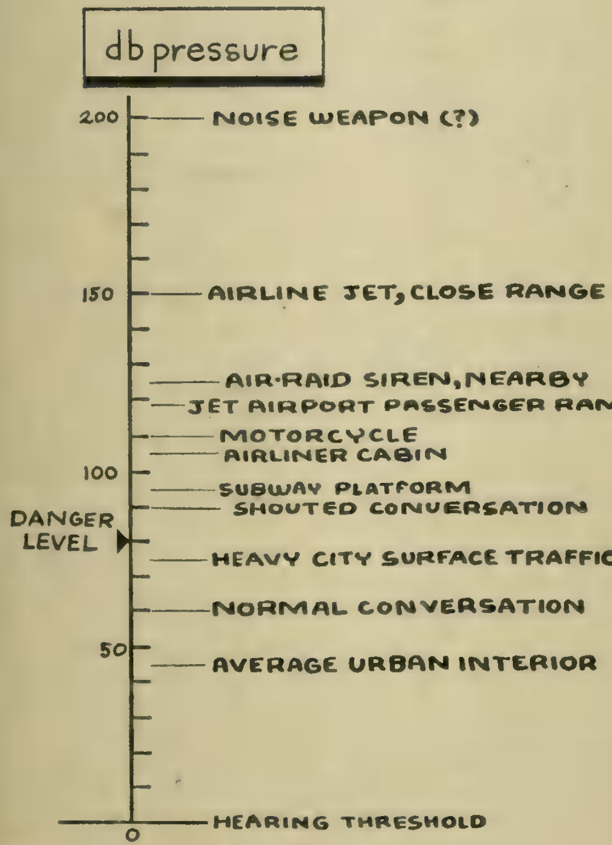
If, to the average home buyer, noise control is a luxury subordinate to bathroom lighting fixtures in gold finish or a double oven in the kitchen, noise in the apartment house may turn out to be a menace to both tenant and landlord—although usually neither realizes it until too late. It is a fact that the cold-water flats of the 19th century were built better, acoustically, than many of the luxury apartments going up today. It was not that the landlords and builders were solicitous for the tenants, but the builders were limited both in their knowledge and their choice of materials. They knew only one way to construct a partition: full-size two-by-four studs to which was nailed wooden lath, and over that an inch or so of plaster. The result was a heavy structure which blocked sound pretty well: unless the neighbor was beating his wife, the chances were the slum tenant would not be too much disturbed.

As for luxury apartments of the twenties, acoustically, and in some other ways, they are today real treasures. One big New York builder estimates that if the typical apartment house of this class were to be duplicated today, the tenants would have to pay rents of about $1,000 per month per room. I think this is exaggerated, but it gives some idea of the deterioration in building standards. The same expert points out that European noise-control standards are higher than ours. As far as is known, nowhere in the United States does a local code (there are 6,000 of them) specify any degree of noise control. It is a matter left entirely to the builder and he, along with the banker who provides the mortgage loan, is concerned primarily with keeping down already inflated costs. New York City is at present considering a code which would stipulate 45 db reduction from one room to the next, and between floors. This is the standard now required by the Federal Housing Administration in homes for which it provides a mortgage guarantee. It is inferior, however, to the 56 db prescribed for Grade I structures in Britain, and even to their 51 db for less expensive Grade II housing. The Netherlands, Sweden, Germany and the USSR likewise have up-to-date acoustic codes.

When the plasterers in New York City urge in subway advertising, "Keep New York plastered!" and inveigh against wallboard, they have a good case as far as it goes. Light sheet material on aligned studs will produce a partition that lets through TV sound and even normal conversation. Plaster is heavier and stiffer and blocks sound better. However, a serviceable partition can be built with wallboard if the studs are offset, so that there is never a direct path from one side to the other, and the interstud space is filled with soft insulating material. In general, sound insulation is the same as thermal insulation; there is no particular mystery to the art of keeping sound in its place of origin.

Some anti-noise measures, such as floating floors and hanging ceilings, do entail extra expense; others do not, or at least very little. For instance, weather stripping on inside doors (sound passes through cracks) is not a costly item, nor does the builder save significantly when he allows the electrical contractor to install outlets back to back, providing an acoustic path from room to room. If the rooms are in adjacent apartments, so much the worse. Bathroom medicine chests back to back are likewise indefensible. Overall, good acoustic design need not raise the cost more than 5 per cent.

As renters grow more critical, new construction will be forced to meet higher acoustic standards, and rents in buildings of poor construction will decline—but hundreds of thousands will still be forced to put up with annoyance which could have been easily avoided in the first place. As yet, few prospective tenants take the obvious precaution, in a new house which is still largely vacant, of playing a transistor radio at high volume in the adjacent apartment (but the squeaky sound tells nothing about transmission of low tones) and walking on the floor above, while someone checks on the sound getting through. In an occupied house, a visit in the evening will often reveal reasons for not renting that were not apparent during the day. Of course, for anyone buying a cooperative apartment investigations of this kind are even more advisable.



More publicity has been given to airplane noise than to any other kind, but relief is a long way off. Despite countermeasures, the prospect is for further deterioration in most areas. Jets produce a higher pitched, hence more disturbing noise than propeller-driven aircraft, and there are going to be more and more jets. The Federal Aviation Agency predicts a doubling of passenger volume in the next five years, and a ninefold increase in small jets, which, in proportion to power, are the noisiest of all.

The seriousness of the situation is appreciated in high quarters and some extremely competent people are working on it, particularly in the Office of Science and Technology, which advises the President, and in committees reporting to it. But, as Nicholas E. Golovin, a member of the OST staff, points out in a paper on "Alleviation of Aircraft Noise" (January, 1967, Astronautics and Aeronautics) it is extremely difficult to compromise among the conflicting interests of airplane manufacturers, airline and airport operators, pilots and communities—which themselves often contain warring factions and are by no means united behind the homeowners directly under the flight paths.

Some of the latter had no choice, but some have themselves to blame, as well as the tract developers who got them into this bedlam. Anyone who contemplates buying near an airport should make it his business to sit in the living room during the 5 to 7 P.M. rush hour, when the air and the runways are filled with aircraft landing and taking off, and on the terrace almost any time. He will then have some idea of what he is letting himself in for.

One story that can lead only to melancholy reflections concerns a housing development close to the John F. Kennedy airport, New York's largest. When the homeowners organized to combat the noise, the FAA noise abatement officer asked if they had not been aware of the problem when they bought. The indignant owners explained that the sales agency had told them that the airport would close down the disturbing runway as soon as the area was developed. It never occurred to them that, since Kennedy is ringed with developments, on this basis the airport would soon be out of business, nor did they think of checking with FAA before signing the contract.

To end on a note of relative cheer: the chances are that the supersonic transport will not make the situation worse in the vicinity of airports. Whether the SST is a good thing is a moot question, but the economic stakes are so large that the heat is on the design engineers on no account to increase take-off and landing noise. These efforts will probably be successful. They had better be.

The sonic boom is another, quite separate question, but here again a note of optimism is justified. Unrestrained, the SST could change noise from a local phenomenon to one of nation-wide proportions, as the aircraft streaked from coast to coast, laying down sonic-boom "carpets" 50 miles wide across the country. [See the recent three-part series by Karl M. Ruppenthal, The Nation.] But this will not happen. If the boom turns out to be seriously disturbing, by the time the prototype is built public resentment will collide head-on with the project. Some experts believe that by modifying the shape of the aircraft to reduce drag and hence the force of the boom, it can be kept within tolerable limits. If they prove wrong, there is little doubt that the SST will be barred from overland use. The economic consequences would be serious, but the public relations problem would be even worse. Either the technical problem will be solved, or the SST will be the first major casualty of the anti-noise movement.

THE DOLLAR INVADES EUROPE

JOSEPH D. PHILLIPS

Mr. Phillips, research professor in the Bureau of Economic and Business Research, University of Illinois, is the author of Little Business in the American Economy and The Self-Employed in the United States (both University of Illinois publications).

In January, British Prime Minister Harold Wilson, while stressing his government's loyalty to the Atlantic Charter, stated in Rome that "we don't believe that anything in it requires us to accept the domination of European industrial and economic life by American industrial interests." London newspapers published his remarks side by side with an announcement that Chrysler had obtained voting control of Rootes Motors, Britain's fourth largest automobile manufacturer. Two days later Sir Paul Chambers, chairman of Imperial Chemical Industries, Britain's largest industrial corporation, said in a Paris speech that U.S. economic expansion is a menace to the whole economy of Western Europe, and Wilson, expanding on his Rome remarks in the House of Commons, stated that "loyal membership of NATO does not mean, for our part, that we thought it right that vital sectors, particularly in the technological industries of Europe, should be overrun and dominated by American firms."

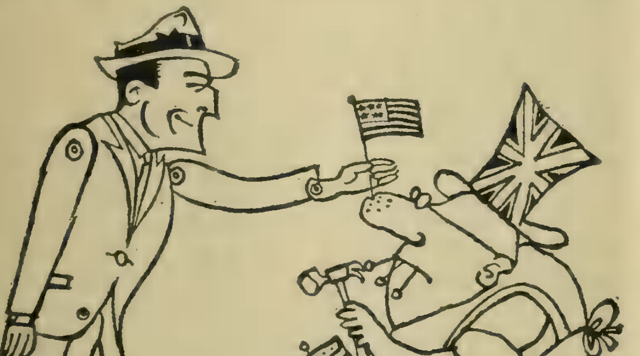
These reports illustrate, on the one hand, a widespread European attitude in both government and business circles and, on the other, the inexorable expansive pressure of the U.S. economic invasion which mocks this attitude. The British Labour Party objected bitterly when Chrysler purchased 45 per cent of Rootes stock in 1964. Chrysler agreed then to accept only three of twelve seats on Rootes's board and to make no effort to control Rootes, but to work as a partner in building the company. However, the sagging British auto market of 1965 and 1966, pinched by the austerity program adopted by the Labour government to meet Britain's balance of payments crisis, brought growing losses to Rootes. The government asked Britain's automobile manufacturers to suggest any possible way of keeping Rootes as a British-controlled company, only to report to Commons that "no such scheme proved practicable." Chrysler could say that it stepped in only when it was asked and when it became evident Rootes could not make it on its own. After this switch of control, three of Britain's top four auto companies were under control of U.S. car manufacturers.

This contrast between resistance by European governments and some private groups to domination of their economies by U.S. corporate enterprise and the actual course of events appears again and again. The proposed purchase in May, 1966, of a majority interest in Deutsches Erdol A.G., the largest West German-based oil company, by Texaco, Inc., was first reported to have been abandoned because of opposition from the West German Government. Deutsches Erdol had about 5,000 service stations, produced about 35 million barrels of petroleum products annually in its refineries and about 10 million barrels a year of crude oil in West Germany, and had interests in the crude production of Libya and other foreign areas. Rumors of the take-over had raised the price of DEA stock almost 50 per cent in the weeks immediately before negotiations were broken off. DEA objected to the government attitude on the ground that it restricted the free choice of DEA stockholders in making decisions about their financial welfare "without wanting to assume responsibility for the preservation" of their assets. Subsequently, the West German Government withdrew its opposition to the take-over by Texaco because it could not come up with an alternative to keep DEA going in the face of its unprofitable coal operations and its lack of an adequate independent source of crude oil.

In 1964, President de Gaulle, the most prominent opponent of the U.S. economic invasion of Europe, first vetoed the proposed purchase by General Electric of a major interest in Machines Bull, the French computer manufacturer in which the French Government held a large equity, then reluctantly dropped his opposition when he was persuaded that the French company could not survive without G.E.'s technological know-how in the computer field.

These retreats and the many penetrations where no attempt at a defense has been made reflect in the main the advantage of American firms in size and financial resources. Chrysler could easily dip into its assets for the $48 million—half for additional stock and half for a loan—required by the Rootes deal. Texaco could not only spare the cash for the take-over of Deutsches Erdol but also draw upon its international sources of crude petroleum to supply the DEA refineries.

However, the Machines Bull case illustrates still another advantage of the giant American firm over its European rival, the "technology gap." Enormous governmental expenditures on research and development for the space and military programs have given American corporations, which are the principal beneficiaries of these programs, such a lead in new technology that Europe runs the risk, as French science minister Alain Peyrefitte has pointed out, of "falling as far behind the U.S. as the underdeveloped nations are behind Europe." In 1966, the United States spent almost $30 billion on R&D, compared with about $8 billion in all of Western Europe; well over a million people were employed in these activities in the U.S., compared with some half million in Western Europe. Computers, those handmaidens of science, technology and massive corporate and government bureaucracy, are far more widely used in the U.S. than in Western Europe, about 55,000 of them being in operation or on order in the U.S., compared with less than one-fourth that number in Europe. These and other facilities, plus higher salaries, attract young European scientists and engineers to the U.S., a "brain drain" that further contributes to the "technology gap."



Michael Heath, New Society

One result is a large net outflow from Europe to the United States of payments for rights to use American patents; it amounts to some $500 million annually. But the advantage the gap gives to the multi-national American firm over its European rivals is what worries Europeans. They see this as a growing threat to their sovereignty. It accounts for Prime Minister Wilson's particular objection to domination of the technological industries of Europe by American firms.

The extent of the economic invasion of Europe is suggested by the growth of American direct investments there. These amounted to only $1.7 billion in 1950, when they accounted for 15 per cent of all U.S. direct investments abroad. The Marshall Plan set the stage for expansion; by 1957, the total in Europe had risen to $4.2 billion. The creation of the Common Market and the European Free Trade Association and the emergence of boom conditions in Europe stimulated the movement of U.S. firms into these areas; the high profits of the long business upswing of the sixties in the United States fed by growing military and space expenditures, provided the capital; the vast expansion of research and development, largely financed by the government, gave American companies the competitive advantage. By the end of 1965, U.S. direct investments in Europe had grown to $13.9 billion, 28 per cent of all direct investments by U.S. firms in foreign countries. It has been estimated that the total in Europe now amounts to almost $20 billion.

Most of these direct investments were in foreign corporations that are subsidiaries of American firms. In 1957, the most recent year for which such detailed information is available, less than 5 per cent were in branches of American corporations. In that year the percentage of U.S. ownership of the subsidiaries was 95 per cent or more in about three-quarters of them by value and almost as many by number. In most of the remainder, U.S. ownership was at least 50 per cent.

The growth in the share of U.S. private business investments going to Europe reflects the fact that U.S. firms have preferred to concentrate their direct investments in the most advanced industrial countries rather than in the underdeveloped areas of the world. This tendency becomes more evident when Canada, a country whose per capita income puts it well outside of the underdeveloped class, is added to Europe; these two areas together accounted for nearly 60 per cent of all U.S. direct investments at the end of 1965.

Furthermore, the largest amounts of U.S. direct investments in Europe are in the most industrialized countries. The United Kingdom, with $5.1 billion at the end of 1965, had more than one-third of the total. Direct investments of U.S. firms in West Germany amounted to $2.4 billion, or about one-sixth of the European total. France ranked next with $1.6 billion, and Switzerland followed with $1.1 billion.

More than half of all U.S. direct investments in Europe at the end of 1965 were in manufacturing, whereas in the rest of the world less than one-third were in this sector. If U.S. direct investments in Canada, Australia, Japan and European South Africa are also excluded, less than one-fifth of the foreign equities of U.S. firms are in manufacturing. The difference in this respect between Europe and the rest of the world is growing; 70 per cent of the capital expenditures by foreign affiliates of U.S. firms in Europe during 1965 were in manufacturing compared with 50 per cent in Canada, 41 per cent in Latin America, and 33 per cent in the rest of the world. Clearly United States manufacturing investment abroad tends to concentrate in the economically most advanced areas.

How profitable are these U.S. investments in Europe? The rate of return in 1965 on their book value at the beginning of the year was only 9.6 per cent, whereas the figure for the world total was 12.2 per cent. However, the world figure was pulled up by such juicy returns as the 62 per cent earned by U.S. direct investments in the Middle East, the 58 per cent in Libya, the 21 per cent in Peru, and the 18 per cent in Venezuela. These were principally the result of petroleum and mining windfalls, for which not many companies can hope.

U.S. companies with direct investments in European manufacturing did better than average in 1965, earning a return of 13 per cent. This was not as high as in the lush years of the fifties when returns on U.S. direct investments in manufacturing there ran above 18 per cent in some years, while the average rate of return on U.S. domestic manufacturing capital was 3 to 5 percentage points lower. But the rise in the average U.S. domestic manufacturing rate of return to about 15 per cent in 1965, while that of U.S. direct manufacturing investments in Europe fell to 13 per cent, has not yet reduced the enthusiasm of U.S. firms for expansion in this sector of the European economy. Expenditures for new manufacturing plant and equipment in Europe by U.S. affiliates were projected in June, 1966, at $2.4 billion for 1966 and $2.5 billion for 1967, compared with actual expenditures of $1.9 billion in 1965.

The heavy concentration of U.S. direct investments in European manufacturing was generally welcomed there in the period of postwar reconstruction when capital was very scarce and there was great need for American technology. As European expansion got under way, U.S. firms rushed to take advantage of the growing market opportunities provided. The Treaty of Rome, providing for free movement of capital not only among the member countries of the Common Market but also across the boundaries of the market as a whole, served as an additional stimulus to investment by U.S. firms, since there was no assurance that the tariff barriers confronting exporters outside the Common Market would be reduced significantly, as were those between the member countries. The way to beat the game was to get inside. The organization of the European Free Trade Association had much the same effect. Affiliates of U.S. firms proved particularly adept at taking advantage of the enlarged market areas created by these two organizations. Coming in with experience in operating throughout a large continental market, they were better prepared to set up a European network than were the French, German or other national companies.

Today, many European business and political leaders feel that expansion of U.S. firms there has gone far enough, perhaps too far. There are various reasons for this attitude. One is widespread fear that U.S. investments threaten the economic and political independence of the countries in which they occur. It is evident that President de Gaulle holds this view. The policy of his administration to convert short-term dollar assets into gold, which reduces the U.S. hoard of that fetish, has been interpreted as an effort to restrict American foreign investment by intensifying the U.S. balance of payments problem. Chairman Hermann J. Abs of the Deutsche Bank, West Germany's most influential private banker, has suggested than Bonn might be well advised to follow a similar policy.

The increasing resort by European countries to national and regional planning, even if only of the "indicative" type, intensifies the need to be able to influence the actions of key enterprises. Foreign-controlled enterprises are more likely to resist the "moral suasion" of government agencies than are those owned by nationals. Furthermore, when U.S. firms buy out domestic enterprises (a process which accounted for about one-fifth of the increase in U.S. manufacturing investments in Europe during 1965), they provide the previous owners with liquid assets that may present them with new problems of direction or control from the standpoint of the planning agency.

The position of U.S. firms in Europe also gives Washington an instrument with which to affect the trade activities of European countries. Restriction or outright prohibitions on exports to Communist countries may limit the expansionary trade policies of Western countries in which U.S. affiliates operate. In the Netherlands, U.S. embassy officials were reported to have told U.S. subsidiaries not to make certain shipments to East European countries.

Another concern of some Europeans, although it is not often mentioned in reports, is the threat to the future balance of payments of their countries contained in the present inflow of American capital. As of now, the drain of earnings to the United States is exceeded by the net inflow of capital from the United States for direct investment in Europe. In the years 1950-65, $5.5 billion were returned to the United States out of direct investment earnings in Europe, whereas net capital inflows for direct investment in Europe amounted to $8.1 billion.

However, Europe is not assured that it will continue to enjoy this surplus of receipts indefinitely. Currently, the U.S. Government, as a measure to improve its balance of payments, is trying to persuade American firms to hold back on foreign investments that require capital outflow. Furthermore, the flow of capital is dependent upon a variety of other factors in both the United States and Europe. Earnings on U.S. direct investments in Europe are more stable, but every increase in the amount invested tends to increase the amount of earnings. Not all earnings on direct investments are returned to the parent company; about one-third of the $1.2 billion earned in Europe in 1965 was retained as undistributed subsidiary earnings, and presumably reinvested. But more could be repatriated, and the U.S. Government has urged American firms to do just that as a means of relieving the balance of payments pressure. Europe could find itself paying out more in profits on U.S. direct investments than it receives in capital for direct investment. That is what happened on a world scale in the period 1950-65; U.S. parent firms took back in earnings about $13 billion more than flowed out from their treasuries as capital for direct investment abroad. (Despite this, the value of their investments abroad rose from $11.8 billion to $49.2 billion.)

More important, perhaps, is the adverse reaction of foreign business interests which feel that the expansion of U.S. affiliates may in some cases threaten their very existence. The automobile industry is an example. Some observers believe that it is already overbuilt in Europe. In the summer of 1964, when Fiat in Italy and Renault in France were making overtures to the German automobile industry for some sort of joint approach to the problem of excess capacity, General Motors announced plans for a $100-million plant in Brussels. The much greater resources of the U.S. auto firms permit them to compete most effectively and, where no restraints are imposed, to squeeze the domestic European firms. General Motors' Opel and Ford's Taunus have already reduced the share of Volkswagen in the European market. Similar developments are evident in other industries.

One consequence of the invasion by U.S. business that causes concern in some European circles has been the step-up of the merger movement. Cartels and combines have long been a prominent feature of European economies, but many of these were devices to restrict competition among enterprises that continued to function as separate companies while dividing up the market. After World War II, the occupying powers broke up many of these cartels in Germany, but soon there was strong pressure to re-establish them. Now the sheer size of the American corporations operating in Europe, such as General Motors, Ford, IBM and the international oil companies, has forced European companies to form a single giant enterprise out of several smaller ones in order to compete. There is a strong feeling in business circles and in the Common Market organization that this movement must be carried much further. However, many European companies are at a disadvantage: the Common Market authorities have not reached agreement on a statute permitting Europe-wide corporations, whereas many American corporations have established headquarters in Europe to coordinate their operations throughout the Continent. Although a Common Market Commission inquiry, made at the request of the French, reported no cases where U.S. affiliates were abusing "dominant positions" in contravention of the anti-cartel provisions of the Rome Treaty, there have been many complaints in Europe about the advantage these enterprises enjoy by virtue of their size.

The fact that much of the concern over U.S. corporate expansion in Europe reflects fear of lower profits on the part of a relatively small segment of the European population does not alter its significance as a portent of changes in legislation that may restrict the American affiliates. The worry over profits is reinforced among a larger public by feelings of national pride. In addition, it is sometimes feared that the American-owned plant might suddenly curtail its operations, leaving local employees without jobs.

By no means are all European attitudes toward American investment antagonistic. The Europeans are ambivalent. Many of them obtain top managerial positions with U.S. affiliates and become ardent supporters of their employers. Local governments and industrial development bodies, eager to increase employment opportunities and purchasing power, offer a variety of inducements to encourage U.S. firms to locate plants in their regions. Opposition to the domination of Europe's technological industries by U.S. firms is countered by statements to the effect that American direct investments should be encouraged only in those industries where they will serve to introduce new technological developments. Concern about the effect on Europe's anti-inflation efforts of an influx of U.S. capital is matched by fear that U.S. attempts to curb the outflow of capital will intensify the credit squeeze in Europe and slow the rate of business expansion.

Whatever the fears and hopes, Europe faces a continuation of the U.S. investment invasion. It could avoid it only by departing from the capitalist road. European firms are too dependent upon international markets, above all the United States, to become the advocates of general restriction. They hanker after the multi-national character on which many of the larger U.S. firms now pride themselves.

Powered by enormous cash flows and backed by the results of research programs financed in large part by the government, increasing numbers of American firms have found in foreign investment the answer to the requirement: "Expand or die." European firms will be hard pressed to match them.

Rationalizing the Irrational

THE NEW INDUSTRIAL STATE. By Kenneth Galbraith. Houghton Mifflin Co. 427 pp. $6.95.

HARRY MAGDOFF

Mr. Magdoff was formerly special assistant to the Secretary of Commerce. He is lecturer in economics at the New School for Social Research.

All the refreshing and rewarding elements of Professor Galbraith's former writing on economic affairs are present here and in good measure: the broad perspective, the bold confrontation of doctrine with reality, and the urgent concern with social reform. This book, though, takes us further; its purpose is a new synthesis, based on the proposition that today's society is drastically different from that of the past.

Economists, he charges, are trapped by assumptions and preconceptions which belong to an economic order that has passed into history. They tend to be less concerned with current social problems than with such matters and assumptions as can comfortably be handled by the scientific tools of the trade. Above all, "economics as it is conventionally taught, is in part a system of belief designed less to reveal truth than to reassure its communicants about established social arrangements."

To find out what makes today's economy tick, Galbraith urges, we must first remove our blinders and recognize that the old gods of the market place are in fact dead. However, in the process of dethronement, he leads us to new gods to worship or fear: the gods of the corporate state. He puts it bluntly:

> It is part of the vanity of modern man that he can decide the character of the economic system. His area of decision is, in fact, exceedingly small. He could, conceivably, decide whether or not he wishes to have a high level of industrialization. . . . Given the decision to have modern industry, much of what happens is inevitable and the same.

The inevitable is an economy dominated by an alliance of government and huge corporations, in which planning and control of markets are key features. While many parts of the economy still operate according to the old rules of the game, the dynamic and determinate core of the modern economy is to be found in a few hundred highly organized corporations. The prime mover of this inevitable result is modern technology. The latter involves greater specialization, more trained manpower and larger amounts of capital than in the past. More time is now needed to work up and bring a project into full operation. It is more difficult to shift from one project to another. Decision making, therefore, becomes more complex and more risky.

The only way to cope with such risk and complexity is to plan. Planning, however, has its own inherent logic. To plan effectively, the corporation must be independent and be able to control its own destiny, without reliance on outside financial institutions; a steady and sure flow of profits must therefore be available to finance research, development and expansion. Such a profit goal is attainable only if the corporation can (a) control markets and manipulate customers so that enough goods are sold at the right price; and (b) control the provision of supplies at consistent prices.

The upshot of this sequence is the giant corporation, one that is large and powerful enough to exercise the controls for the planning compelled by modern technology. Despite such power, the giant corporations would still be vulnerable without an adequate and nonfluctuating flow of total consumer income and, consequently, consumer demand. This is where the government steps in with its large spending program centered on military supplies. As Galbraith sees it:

> If a large public sector of the economy, supported by personal and corporate income taxation, is the fulcrum for the regulation of demand, plainly military expenditures are the pivot on which the fulcrum rests. Additionally, they provide underwriting for advanced technology and, therewith, security for the planning of the industrial system in areas that would otherwise be excluded by cost and risk.

The inflationary pressures associated with this activity create the need for government influence on wage and price increases; this too makes planning more viable.

The logical necessity of these arrangements leads to a harmonious blending of the goals of business, labor and government. The center of power in the giant corporation is not top management but what Galbraith terms the "technostructure": the whole gamut of executives, sub-executives, technicians and other specialized talent who participate in group decision making. The interest of this technostructure is the success of the corporation. This means that the aim is no longer maximum profits but security and growth. Enough profits have to be garnered to pay dividends and to create an independent fund for research and investment, but the major emphasis is to get the greatest possible growth in sales. Under the impetus of growth and planning, a more benevolent attitude to trade unions is not only possible, it is in fact desirable. The unions, due to their own weaknesses and needs, are also increasingly conciliatory. Above all, industry becomes an extension of the arm of government bureaucracy.

The harmony of interest, spurred by the imperatives of technology, helps to impose on all society the goals of the industrial system. Successful as this system is in producing an ever-expanding bounty, it also involves great harm to society, as for example: a cold-war and arms competition that can lead to total destruction, subordination of social goals (health, welfare and the good life), corruption of education and weakening of individualism. Since emancipation via the elimination of the industrial system is not possible (remember its inevitability), what is needed is emancipation from the goals—and ideas—of this system. Fortunately, Galbraith believes, the potential emancipators are at hand in the growing legion of scientists and educators, who might through political and group action bring about a more desirable balance between social goals and the industrial system.

My summary does little justice to Galbraith's stimulating and intriguing presentation of his argument. One of the most appealing features is the unity and consistency of the economic theory supplied—the end result, it seems, of Galbraith's long search for what is rational in an irrational society. But what emerges is as much a rationalization as a rationale of the business system. This may be due to the method of analysis itself, in the way the rational is separated from the irrational. The structure and operation of the modern economy is seen to be objectively determined; hence it is logical and inevitable. The irrational features arise from the goals of the industrial system, which are subtly interwoven with the goals of society as a whole. And since these goals are in the realm of ideas, they are amenable to change and improvement.

Galbraith's selection of technology as the key to a rational explanation of gigantism and planning may strike a responsive chord in the reader living in the atomic, electronic and space age. But does it fit the facts? Was it technology that dictated the origin of the Standard Oil Company? Is it the complexity of manufacture that induces oligopoly in the cigarette, soap, detergent and chewing gum industries, in each of which four companies control from 70 per cent to 90 per cent of the market? Or perhaps it is the mystery of technique that requires the extent of market control that exists in meat, ice cream and flour mill operations, where eight leading companies control 40 per cent to 50 per cent of each market?

While the procedure of isolating specific causes is used for the sake of dealing with reality, it may often result in a graceful side-stepping of the more vital aspects of reality. Take, for example, the appearance of hardheaded realism in the statements: "The industrial system has not become identified with weapons competition by preference or because it is inherently bloody. Rather, this has been the area where the largest amount of money to support planning was available with the fewest questions asked." The reader is thus directed to the significance of military orders as the source of corporate identification with foreign policy. But by the same token, the examination of any other interest of the industrial system (Galbraith's term for the dominant giant corporations) in U.S. pacification and control of foreign lands is eliminated. The avoidance of such an issue seems quite strange in a book devoted to proving the vital need of the giant corporations to control their sources of raw materials and to achieve persistent growth of sales. One would imagine that if control over sources of supply is an imperative for the corporation, then the latter might have more than a vague curiosity about the stability and security of their foreign properties from which life-giving raw materials come: iron ore, bauxite, copper, lead, zinc, manganese, tantalum and columbium (for jet engines and gas turbines), and lest we forget, oil.

In addition, the imperative to grow and control markets has been pushing the larger business organizations beyond the domestic borders. Thus, of the 500 largest corporations, 386 had notable foreign operations. A score or two of the large companies have a third or more of their total assets abroad; some eighty of these firms derived 25 per cent or more of their sales and earnings from overseas. Sales of foreign-based U.S. manufacturing firms have increased more than five times since 1950. In 1965, it has been conservatively estimated, earnings on foreign investments amounted to more than 20 per cent of after-tax profits of domestic non-financial corporations.

Perhaps, then, there is more than a mild interest by the corporate organizations in U.S. foreign policy and its military complement as a convenience in sustaining a comfortable business environment. In Galbraith's analysis, though, the irrationality of the cold war and militarism is an unfortunate accompaniment to the rational need of industry for government support of domestic markets; as such, it is unrelated to the persistent needs for business expansion and control.

Even more striking is the separation of the situation of the Negro and of poverty from the framework of analysis. It is hardly the case that Galbraith is indifferent to the social evils of our time; he could properly insist that the main purpose of his tract is to contribute to the removal of the evils. The issue is the diagnosis. Implicit in his diagnosis is the assumption that such evils are things apart from, and surely not a product of, the industrial system. For example, " . . . the poor, by any applicable tests, are outside the industrial system. They are those who have not been drawn into its service or cannot qualify"; the unemployed are "those who are currently unemployable by the industrial system." Hence, the solution to poverty is to be found largely in better education and "better cultural accommodation to the industrial system."

This sort of thinking reflects the common observation that there are job opportunities for certain skills, especially during the overheated period of the economy. But it does not square with the historical tendency of the industrial system to require less labor relative to the labor force: a decline in the demand for labor unrelated to the availability or lack of availability of computer programers or metallurgists. In 1929, manufacturing, transportation and public utilities supplied 46 per cent of all wage and salary jobs; in 1966, these industries, with all the help of government contracts, employed only 36 per cent of the total wage and salary earners. During the 1950s the entire private sector (small as well as big business) provided only one out of every six new jobs; the other five jobs arose from government purchases, government employment or nonprofit institutions. It is hardly reasonable to assume that the industrial system would have supplied a significantly greater number of jobs if there were more technically educated and "culturally accommodated" persons available.

By separating out social evils as things apart from the industrial system, Galbraith avoids confronting the issue of whether the industrial system operates in such a way as to create "culturally unaccommodated" pockets. Thus, he notes the pattern that Negroes are the last to be hired and the first to be fired. But he does not in the least recognize that this very industrial practice, whereby the Negro serves as a cushion of reserve labor, is an essential ingredient in a long and entrenched process in which lack of "cultural accommodation" evolves.

Nor, by the same token does Galbraith take into account any interdependence between the success of the industrial system and poverty. He affirms the role that profits play in securing corporate power, but ignores the influence of profits as a contributor to poverty and a barrier to the elimination of poverty. Profits are needed for research to create artificial obsolescence; they are needed to finance mergers for better market control. Naturally, prices and costs must be consistent with these and other profit imperatives. In turn, such necessary costs and prices become the measuring devices—the standards—to determine what is economically feasible and efficient. This much will undoubtedly be granted by our author. But he does not concern himself with the consequences that these are the very standards by which the corporation decides to invest abroad and also decides not to invest in the economic development of underdeveloped city and farm areas of the United States. Similarly, there is no consideration of the conflict between the cost-price-profit arrangements of existing institutions and, on the other hand, changes in the structure of industry to produce goods which meet social needs and, say, a program of industrialization and land reform to revitalize the urban ghetto and the rural South.

The absence of an appreciation of the influence of profit making on poverty may be a by-product of the author's concentration on his theory of corporate motivation. According to this theory, the modern corporation is more interested in rapid growth of sales than in the growth of profits. Unexplored in the book is the question whether one is feasible without the other or whether there is any conflict between these aims during a long cyclical upswing. Galbraith traces the substitution of sales for profit growth in part to the self-interest of the technostructure—its need to grow and to have a more secure base. In this respect, a new study from the National Bureau of Economic Research is particularly noteworthy. A study of compensation plans for top executives of fifty leading corporations shows that nearly half of the income of these executives is tied to the price of the stocks of their corporation, whether through stock options or deferred compensation plans. The New York gambling casino may after all be of some use to such executives, as it is to the stockholders. And one thing the stock market adores is a rapidly rising volume of earnings, especially when it is associated with a rising rate of profit.

In his reform program to replace the cold war, Galbraith does introduce a note of realism that will seem strange to the Keynesian community. The more orthodox Keynesians, especially the right wing, maintain that the economy could adjust quite readily to disarmament with simple fiscal adjustments; in particular, with a sufficient tax reduction. Progressive Keynesians, on the other hand, claim that tax-rate changes will not be effective regulators in the absence of very large public expenditures. Hence, the way to handle the impact of disarmament is to counterbalance with large public works — housing, hospitals, schools. Galbraith, though, goes much further than even these left wingers. He is all for social-welfare spending and believes it should be carried on for its own sake. But it won't do the trick because it won't feed the giant corporations with the right kind of stimulants.

To keep business solvent and sustain the economy without cold war, he proposes government sponsorship of substitutes that are roughly equivalent in scale and technical complexity to military items; for example, high-speed land and air communications, ocean-floor explorations and climate alteration. Valuable as these suggestions may be, we should recognize that they too may not be adequate. It will probably take too much time for the research and development before production can begin; more than that, they may not even then result in sufficiently large scale repetitive operations to keep the wheels of the industrial system turning. What is really needed is an ingenious scheme which could continuously depreciate our stock of bombs, missiles, airplanes, tanks and navy ships and, at the same time, stimulate the need for periodic replenishment of these stocks with new models —all this without anyone getting killed. Did someone propose a declaration of war against Mars?

END OF THE GAME and Other Stories. By Julio Cortázar. Translated from the Spanish by Paul Blackburn. Pantheon Books. 277 pp. $5.95.

DANIEL STERN

Mr. Stern is a novelist and critic. His most recent book is After the War (Putnam).

There is, currently, a secret confraternity. I am a member. We are the serious readers who admit to finding only sections of The Tin Drum actually engrossing; who applaud and desire experiment, yet find that after page 60 Michel Butor is boring; that even before page 60 the novelty and attractiveness of Robbe-Grillet has died an early death. But because we are essentially the people Nathalie Sarraute speaks of in her excellent essay, "The Age of Suspicion," we are also the ones who no longer believe the gray, endless sea of prose that claims to report our experience in the manner and language of earlier, more naive times. If one reads "straight books" with suspicion, and is still unconvinced by the self-indulgent extravagances of many of the "advanced" writers, where, then, does one stand? Or, more important, where does one turn?

One turns, it seems, to Argentinian-born Julio Cortázar. When Cortázar's most successful novel, Hopscotch, was published here last year, I read it with great pleasure . . . and boredom . . . and irritation! Here was a man whose writing flashed with wit, superb imagery and who obviously was possessed of—and by—a fantastic imagination. But what of the endless self-indulgences? The tricks and games played not with or for—but on the reader.

In this new book, a culling of stories from three previously untranslated collections, the shorter form allows no time for the merely tricky. Yet what magnificent tricks Cortázar does play. A woman dreams about a beggar woman on a bridge in Budapest (a city foreign to her). Then she arrives in Budapest and finds the beggar woman on the same bridge. They embrace—and in horror the woman stands rooted while watching herself leave. This playing with time (the two women, it is suggested, may be the same person at different times) is characteristic. But it is only one of Cortázar's techniques for breaking down reality, mixing it with various illusions, and scrambling them to make a brand new reality—or is it a brand new illusion? In "Axolotl," a man who is insistently drawn to a certain fish in the aquarium keeps returning to observe and to imagine what it must be like to be that fish. The power of the imagination is attested to by the fact that an exchange is forced. The man finds himself looking out at the world from within the watery cage.

Still a bright texture of reality runs through these stories. It is as if Cortázar is showing us first that it is essential for us to reimagine the reality in which we live and which we can no longer take for granted; and second, he shows us how to do this by the use of infinite variety and possibilities. (This variety, these possibilities, of course, all carry with them the threat of danger—people are always going out too far in the exercise of the imagination.)

In "The Pursuer," the only unsuccessful story in this volume, a musician who is obviously Charley Parker, "reaches" in the most banal Man-With-the-Golden-Horn sense, for the truthful music he knows he can blow—and in so doing disorders his senses and his imagination until he destroys himself. Pace Rimbaud and Yardbird.

In "Blow-Up," the story on which Antonioni loosely based his film, an amateur photographer (we are all dabblers in perceiving reality, Cortázar implies) takes unsolicited, candid photographs of a woman in the throes of an embrace. Only here she is with a boy, not an older man. In a nearby car an older man sits, waiting. The woman remonstrates with the narrator about taking the photograph. The boy runs away under cover of the ensuing argument between the woman (who is joined by the man in the car) and the recording angel who is telling the story. When he develops the photographs later, it seems to him that perhaps the woman had a more sinister purpose in mind, possibly to seduce the boy for the man who waited in the car. If this was so then the intervention of the photographer actually influenced the course of events and freed the youngster. Cortázar has a marvelous way of implying much with little. The possibilities of the moral effects of art as action were totally obliterated in Antonioni's film; but this implication is what makes the work a gem among contemporary stories.

As the novel, Hopscotch, did not "work," these stories "work." Their effects come off, both as technical feats and as reverberating emotions and ideas. Actually, Cortázar is involved with ideas only in the sense that the best science fiction or fantasy is. A man becomes a fish; two human beings change identities and existences. In the story, "The Night Face Up," a man on a motorcycle being chased to his eventual death in a hospital bed is contrasted (and symbolically joined) with a man in some prehistoric cave culture. At first one is convinced that the primitive is a metaphor for the more advanced situation. The reversal at the end is breath-taking.

In reading such experimental work there is the temptation to overdo the concentration on influences. In the case of Cortázar it is interesting and valid to consider them. While a number of European influences are clearly indicated, it is two compatriot authors who strike this reader as most important to Cortázar's growth: the classic Machado de Assis and, most significantly, the great modernist Jorge Luis Borges. Cortázar has lived and worked in Paris since 1951. He writes with all the sophistication of an expatriate. And, like Borges, he often combines elements of the essay with the fictional elements of his stories. Here is the author commenting on the reaction of a character to the unaccustomed availability of luxuries:

> (For the files: note, following Ortega, the contact between the common man and technology. Exactly where one would imagine a cultural shock, there is, on the contrary, a violent assimilation and enjoyment of the progress. Mauro talks about refrigeration units . . . with the self-sufficiency of the Buenos Aires inhabitant who firmly believes he has everything coming to him.)

He shares with Borges, also, a pervading sense of the mysteriousness of natural objects and banal daily life. Cortázar writes with all the ambiguity, irony and attention to objects, common to Günter Grass, Butor, Robbe-Grillet: the most nouveau of the nouveau. The difference is that Cortázar, in these stories, knows precisely when to stop. Brevity, in the land of advanced writing attains to a kind of morality. Not that serious work must necessarily be short; but it must have those virtues common to briefer works: careful selection of detail, the rightness of the particular form, and the compelling sense that what has been left out is playing an important part in the final work of art.

These factors are, to some extent, absent in Hopscotch. Deliberately, judging from some remarks the author made in a recent interview. "The novel," he states, "is like a chain of mountains. It can go on and on." But the concept of the novel as a great catchall, from which the reader takes what he wishes, is old-fashioned and no longer pertinent. The use of indeterminacy and shuffling of sequence (as in Hopscotch) is simply the catchall notion dressed up in fancy clothes.

In any case the present volume contains enough rewards for the most difficult and suspicious of readers in search of demanding pleasures and dark delights. The translation, by Paul Blackburn, is properly colloquial, elegant and eloquent, and is flavored with just enough touches of Spanish and French phrases to spice the narrative. At this point in the development of a freer form for prose writing, Cortázar is indispensable.

Introduction to Gramsci

ANTONIO GRAMSCI AND THE ORIGINS OF ITALIAN COMMUNISM. By John M. Cammett. Stanford University Press. 306 pp. $8.50.

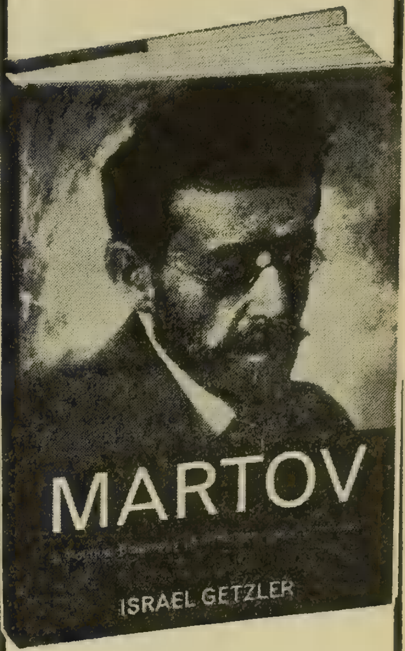
ERIC HOBSBAWM

Mr. Hobsbawm is the author of The Age of Revolution, 1789-1848 (World), Primitive Rebels (Praeger) and Labouring Men (Basic Books).

Antonio Gramsci's reputation outside Italy is now quite considerable. It has increased sharply over the past ten years, but most of it still rests on hearsay. Until recently, practically all that was available in English was an inadequate volume of selections of Gramsci's work, four or five articles of uneven quality, and a few observations by the livelier historians of ideas such as Lichtheim and Stuart Hughes. This even though Gramsci was one of the most original Marxist thinkers of this century, the inspirer and leader of the Italian Communist Party, and a man who is accepted in his own country as a major figure in Italian culture, apart from politics. John Cammett's book is the first full-scale treatment of him published in our language. It is a fairly short work—the text amounts to barely more than 220 pages—and the author does not claim that it exhausts the subject. Still, it provides us with an excellent introduction to the man and his achievement, and this is more than any other work in English has so far done.

In spite of Gramsci's importance in the politics of his country, his chief significance is as a theorist and teacher. This is not to make a sharp distinction between theory and practice. Gramsci's thought was almost as completely dominated by the practical tasks of transforming society as Lenin's, and the remarkable successes of the Italian Communist Party have been largely due to his ideas. But he had neither the temperament nor some of the gifts of the political operator, which his fellow

MARTOV



A Political Biography of a Russian Social Democrat

ISRAEL GETZLER

Julius Martov (Iulii Osipovich Tsederbaum) was of the generation of the Russian alienated intelligentsia which grew up in the reaction and gloom of the 1880s, turned Marxist in the early 1890s, and supplied the leadership of Russian social democracy in the 1900s.

This is the first full study of Martov, the founder and leader of Menshevism, and of his ideas and activities in the Russian revolutionary movement and in international socialism.

Dr Getzler traces Martov's career from his apprenticeship in Vilno and St Petersburg through his friendship and partnership with Lenin, the break-up of that association and the party split between Bolsheviks and Mensheviks in 1903, his role in the 1905 revolution and his later socialist activities ending with the Mensheviks in exile and his death.

student and successor Palmiro Togliatti so obviously possessed; and even if his career as a politician had not ended in 1926 (he died shortly after his release from jail eleven years later) he would probably not be remembered as an outstanding practical strategist and tactician.

Thus, he lives mainly through his writings, in the Ordine Nuovo of Turin (which he edited), in the "Lyons theses" which laid the foundations for subsequent Communist policy in Italy and, above all, in the almost 3,000 pages of the Prison Notebooks which he wrote, under fascism and the multiple handicaps of permanent illness, prison brutality and chicanery, restricted reading and censorship, in the last ten years of his life. Cammett is undoubtedly right in thinking that these "may eventually be recognized as one of the masterpieces of twentieth-century political thought."

Gramsci's writings are extremely Italian, and to the extent that most of us are unfamiliar with his intellectual context—for instance with the role played during his lifetime by the philosopher Croce—they are not easily accessible to foreigners, though for the same reason they make an immediate and vivid appeal to Italian intellectuals of all political persuasions.

Gramsci belonged to that international generation of revolutionaries who rebelled against the passive opportunism of the pre-1914 social-democratic movements, and the extreme determinist and evolutionist version of Marxism with which writers like Kautsky disguised this passivity. At the same time—and perhaps because they recognized the absorption of these elements in Kautskyism—he belonged to those who rejected the positivist commonplaces of late 19th-century thought. Politically, Gramsci belongs with Lenin (whose views he, almost alone in Italy, developed in 1917); with Luxemburg and what Lichtheim has called the "central-European left"; and insofar as they also rejected social-democracy, with the syndicalist rebels, though he rejected anarchism and "spontaneity." (He was, however, notably kinder to Sorel than most Marxists.) Ideologically he was, at any rate initially, very much more critical of the public corpus of Marx's writings than, say, the Russian Left. He shared with many of the contemporary anti-social-democratic Left a dislike of determinism and a taste for Hegel, but it may be argued—it has lately been so argued by Althusser and others—that his historicism, voluntarism and philosophical idealism went beyond what most Marxists would find acceptable; or at least that he never entirely reconciled this original bias with the mature reflections of the Prison Notebooks.

ROBERT BLY

Gramsci's thought undoubtedly became Marxist, but his relative independence from the received text of Marx and Engels allowed him to explore freely several aspects not normally dealt with at length in the Marxist writings of his time, notably in the field of culture and political theory. His case is particularly relevant to those who think of the historic development of Marxism as essentially the elaboration or extrapolation of classical texts, for it demonstrates that this is not in fact the way the major Marxist thinkers operated. Even those who find this immensely original thinker most congenial, should be prepared to exercise their critical faculty on him. It is one of the merits of the Italian Communist Party that it has never resisted such critical analysis of its leading theorist.

Gramsci also belonged to a country which was both industrialized and backward, economically independent and colonial. He himself was a Sardinian—and there are few more impoverished and backward areas in Europe—but his experience in Turin, the Italian Detroit, also gave him an insight into the problems of a fully industrialized society. Gramsci's background allowed, and indeed obliged, him to see revolution not simply in terms of the proletariat, but of working-class predominance within a much wider movement, in fact one of national liberation and rebirth. Piero Gobetti, the brilliant boy who inspired so much of Italian liberal anti-fascism, saw the Ordine Nuovo (with which he cooperated) as a movement capable of regenerating Italian life through the agency of the working class; and this is very much what the Communist-centered resistance movement actually was to achieve after 1943.

Such an insistence on the broad character of working-class leadership or "hegemony," to use the term central to his analysis, meant more than the mere assertion of the primary importance of the peasantry and the role of intellectuals as a special social group, though Gramsci analyzed both with remarkable acuteness. Unlike most other Marxists, Gramsci's political theory consistently operates not only in terms of the "state" but of "civil society," that is, the sum total of nongovernmental institutional and private manifestations of society, of its culture and moral climate. A socio-economic system was not merely an economic base maintained by the superstructure of the ruling-class government and coercion but also implied the "hegemonic" predominance of one social group operating through "civil society," or the element of consent that other classes gave to it. The task of the labor movement, especially in Western countries, was to make the proletariat a "hegemonic" class even before it seized power; and indeed in such countries its victory was improbable unless it established such hegemony, and won acceptance as a potential dominant class.

Politically, the most interesting aspect of this analysis is that it provides an answer to the prize question of all revolutionary movements, namely what to do when a seizure of power is not in prospect (or after it has succeeded or failed). At such times, Gramsci argued, a "war of position" must necessarily succeed a "war of maneuver," that is, the struggle for hegemony must supplement or replace the struggle for power. (Incidentally, the Gramscian analysis also appears to offer the prospect of a nontotalitarian communism, without retreating into the dream world of anarcho-syndicalism or utopia.)

Theoretically, his analysis led him into a variety of remarkable insights into the way in which political societies operate, the function of culture and intellectuals within them, and the development of his own nation. In both theory and practice it provided the Italian Communist Party with an unusually flexible approach to its political tasks: it is, after all, the party which succeeded both in organizing the most successful partisan war in Western Europe and in functioning most effectively under conditions of capitalist prosperity. Not the least surprising thing about it is that it maintained its "Gramscianism" intact through the most monolithic and sectarian periods of Stalinism. However, this is probably due less to Gramsci himself than to the exceptional political gifts of his friend Togliatti.

Cammett's book will surely attract many radicals in the United States and Britain to this impressive and stimulating thinker. At present they will still have to learn Italian to read most of his work. Fortunately a larger selection of it is being translated now. It is to be hoped that it will soon be available.

A Signal Danger

STORY OF AN ACCUSATION. By Terence Reese. Simon & Schuster. 246 pp. $5.95. Paper $1.95.

DAVID CORT

Mr. Cort's most recent book is The Glossy Rats (Grosset & Dunlap).

Bridge is a game of signals, legally limited to signals that can be understood by all the players. Tournament bridge is also a deadly competition for fame and riches, especially for American players. Thus an invisible, tabooed magnetic pull might be assumed, to invent additional secret signals, and break the game wide open. One elbow on the table might signal two good suits of the same color; the other elbow something else; a throat-clearing something else; all timed during the bidding. The check on this is that the play exposes all the cards in due course. When the same kind of hand is twice accompanied by the same secret signal, the fun is over.

And so two British champions, Terence Reese and Boris Schapiro, were accused by their American opponents, B. J. Becker and Dorothy Hayden, of holding their cards in such a manner that the number of fingers outside corresponded to the number of cards in the heart suit—a crude, unimaginative, limited and detectable stratagem for two such highly ingenious gentlemen. Two British officials, Swimer and Butler, hastily accepted the slander. In case your newspaper did not recognize the sinister international potentials of this event, it took place at the international matches in Buenos Aires in 1965 among Italy (the habitual champions), Britain, the U.S. and Argentina.

Now Terence Reese tells it all, complete with bridge hands, bidding, suspicions and rebuttals.

What is chiefly revealed by the episode and by this book is the rankling cattiness that suffuses championship bridge. To an indifferent outsider the Americans look especially smug, silly and small time, possibly because they have the most money at stake. As makers of the American image abroad, Becker and Hayden are to be deplored. The others in this world sound like non-Us trying to be U, but the Americans don't even have the pride to try. Tournament bridge must inculcate qualities of envy, malice, self-righteousness and overweening conceit.

In simple discretion, a player would only cheat with one partner, and he would be more effective with that partner than with anyone else. But in this tournament Reese didn't want to pair with Schapiro; they were worse than usual, and worse than with other partners. Since the average number of any suit in a hand is between three and four, and holding the cards with three or four fingers outside is quite normal, a large number of correlations would be inevitable. It took the genius of the Americans to settle on the heart suit. Thus we get the authentic scent of pure evil as in the play, The Children's Hour. But absurd accusations are even harder to refute than serious ones. One cannot laugh forever.

At least one example of the accusation in detail must be given. Here, with the involved bidding and thinking of these people, is Britain-Italy 18:

Criticism: That East bid two hearts because he knew his partner held only two hearts and so would not give an inconvenient raise.

Answer: The Italians were playing (Herbert) responses to take-out doubles, so that North's two clubs (as attested by his subsequent inactivity) showed fair values. Thus East knew his partner must be very weak. It was likely that the vulnerable opponents had the values for game and also likely, on the surface, that their best suit would be hearts. So East may well try to keep them out of a heart contract. As to the alleged risk, if I, as West, had held a singleton spade and four or five hearts, I would certainly have been alive to the possibility that partner's heart bid might not be genuine.

The hand actually contains a negative point for the defense. If the illicit knowledge is presumed, then West has a very obvious two hearts available on the way round. It is a set-up situation for a psychic of that type.

Underlying the episode was the challenge to the honor and self-respect of Englishmen. The British proceedings were rigorous, without trace of whitewash, and the vindication was well-earned. Furthermore, the British refused to besmirch the American accusers.

Ironically, the accusers seem to play better together than with other partners, by a sort of psychic ESP which may be parsed with intuitive legal cheating. They were unique among tournament players in accusations of cheating. This ended when at a San Francisco tournament, while the British trial was going on, somebody else accused them of cheating.

At this rate, tournament bridge may soon be destroyed, and all these people will have to go back to work.

THEATRE/ Julius Novick

Minneapolis

American productions of Greek tragedy are a problem for the critic: the plays come highly recommended, but the experience of watching them is usually very pallid. How is one to reconcile these two intractable constants? One of my customary solutions is to remark (cogently, I think) that American directors and actors do not deal with Greek tragedy often enough to learn how to handle it, and that anyhow the translation lacks the grandeur which those who know Greek customarily attribute to the original. But my favorite recourse has been to hide behind W. H. Auden's opinion that the Greek classics in English have more historical and anthropological than aesthetic interest.

Tyrone Guthrie's production of The House of Atreus at the Guthrie Theatre in Minneapolis makes such shifts and dodges unnecessary. It is the only revival of a Greek tragedy that I have ever seen; all the other attempts were mere exhumations. The Oresteia, Aeschylus' trilogy of Agamemnon, Clytemnestra, Orestes, and the great chain of familial murder that they forged, has been freely adapted for the occasion by John Lewin, but the result is still Greek tragedy, Aeschylus' drama and not Mr. Lewin's. Dr. Guthrie has succeeded—uniquely, I think, among modern directors—in conjuring up a considerable vestige of those dark tremendous forces that the Athenians encountered in the Theatre of Dionysius. And, in so doing, he has given us probably the nearest thing to a Theatre of Cruelty spectacle, as Antonin Artaud imagined it, that we have ever had in this country.

Artaud was a French actor, director, poet, playwright, critic and theoretician who died at Ivry, near Paris, in 1948, two years after his release from the insane asylum at Rodez. His influence is based on a book called The Theatre and Its Double, first published in 1938, in which he argued that the "decadent" modern theatre must be swept away and replaced by "a theatre which events do not exceed, whose resonance is deep within us, dominating the instability of the times." Peter Brook's production of Marat/Sade used techniques developed in a "Theatre of Cruelty" workshop that Mr. Brook headed for the Royal Shakespeare Theatre in London.

But just what did Artaud have in mind when he talked of a "Theatre of Cruelty"? Not what might be superficially expected. He wrote:

> With this mania we all have for depreciating everything, as soon as I have said "cruelty," everybody will at once take it to mean "blood." But . . . it is not the cruelty we can exercise upon each other by hacking at each other's bodies, carving up our personal anatomies, or, like Assyrian emperors, sending parcels of human ears, noses, or neatly detached nostrils through the mail, but the much more terrible and necessary cruelty which things can exercise against us. We are not free. And the sky can still fall on our heads. And the theatre has been created to teach us that first of all.

And that, first of all, is what Greek tragedy teaches us. Artaud sought to bring back to the stage at least "a little breath of that great metaphysical fear which is at the root of all ancient theatre":

> The theatre must make itself the equal of life, not an individual life, that individual aspect of life in which characters triumph, but the sort of liberated life which sweeps away human individuality and in which man is only a reflection. The true purpose of the theatre is to create Myths, to express life in its immense, universal aspect. . . .

This sounds as if Artaud were calling almost explicity for a revival of Greek tragedy which, more than any other kind of Western theatre, deals with "life in its immense, universal aspect." But he was not:

> We shall try to concentrate, around famous personages, atrocious crimes, superhuman devotions, a drama which, without resorting to the defunct images of the old Myths, shows that it can extract the forces which struggle within them. (My italics.)

The key assumption here is that the "images of the old Myths" are "defunct," and anyone who has seen English-language productions of Greek tragedy would be likely to agree. In our time and country, only Dr. Guthrie has been able to disprove this assumption with regard to Greek tragedy.

Artaud himself was entirely unable to see that Greek tragedy might be the foundation for the kind of theatre he sought to build, because he was in violent revolt against the French theatrical tradition of reverence for the classics, which was—often still is—expressed through static stagings in which the actors declaimed the sacred text. "A theatre which subordinates the mise en scène and production, i.e., everything in itself that is specifically theatrical, to the text," was, according to Artaud, "a theatre of idiots, madmen, inverts, grammarians, grocers, antipoets and positivists. . . ." Throwing out the baby with the bath water, he raised his famous cry, "No more masterpieces!"

> Masterpieces of the past are good for the past: they are not good for us. . . . If the public does not frequent our literary masterpieces, it is because those masterpieces are literary, that is to say fixed; and fixed in forms that no longer respond to the needs of the time.

Artaud demanded "a theatre which eliminates the author in favor of what we would call, in our Occidental theatrical jargon, the director; but a director who has become a kind of manager of magic, a master of sacred ceremonies." But what if the director could function in this manner without eliminating the author? That is exactly what Dr. Guthrie has done with The House of Atreus. The significance and power of his production come from his success in evoking "a little breath of that great metaphysical fear," "life in its immense, universal aspect," "gods . . . heroes . . . monsters . . . natural and cosmic forces"—just those central elements of Greek tragedy that are absent from most productions. The import of The House of Atreus—an import felt in the first place by some more primal, basic faculty than the reasoning mind—is that tremendous powers are loose in the world, compared to which an ordinary mortal is a puny creature indeed. In other words—Artaud's words—"We are not free. And the sky can still fall on our heads."

Dr. Guthrie's means, as well as his ends, are on the whole quite Artaudian. He does not, of course, fill the entire prescription. I did not notice, for instance, a "physical rhythm of movements whose crescendo and decrescendo will accord exactly with the pulsation of movements familiar to everyone," or "the physical action of light which arouses sensations of heat and cold," or "absolutely new sounds, qualities which present-day musical instruments do not possess." A rather more significant dictum is also unfulfilled:

> We abolish the stage and the auditorium and replace them by a single site, without partition and barrier of any kind, which will become the theatre of the action. A direct communication will be re-established between the actor and the spectator, from the fact that the spectator, placed in the middle of the action, is engulfed and physically affected by it.

But though stage and auditorium remain separate areas at the Guthrie Theatre, they are at least in the same room, and not separated by the wall-with-a-hole-in-it that we call the proscenium; and though the spectator is not in the middle of the action, the Guthrie's asymmetric thrust stage brings the action into the midst of the spectators.

In other respects, The House of Atreus comes far closer to what Artaud wanted. The prophet called for a theatre that "turns words into incantations." He demanded > cries, groans, apparitions, surprises, theatricalities of all kinds, magic beauty of costumes taken from certain ritual models; resplendent lighting, incantational beauty of voices, the charms of harmony, rare notes of music . . . concrete appearances of new and surprising objects, masks, effigies yards high, sudden changes of light . . . .

All these Dr. Guthrie supplies, and few of them fail in their effect.

Human individuality is not, as Artaud demanded, entirely swept away. Mr. Lewin's adaptation elaborates on Aeschylus' occasional hints for intimate details: the grim reminiscences of a soldier back from Troy, the feeble wailing of Orestes' old nurse. Dr. Guthrie deftly brings out the individuality of certain major characters: Agamemnon's slightly cheap arrogance, Clytemnestra's bitchiness, the forlornness of Cassandra. Yet these towering figures are not diminished thereby; the production is Artaudian in spirit because of the successful boldness with which Dr. Guthrie uses anti-realistic, hieratic, bizarre devices to place it on a superhuman plane.

The actors are not dressed in the white crypto-mini-skirts and dainty draperies that traditionally serve for Greek tragedies; designer Tanya Moiseiwitsch has swathed them in costumes of coarse, earth-colored fabrics, and covered their faces with masks. The choruses seem human, more or less, but the major characters are larger than life size; with their rigid, stately gestures, they look like huge, awe-inspiring dolls. Yet even they are dwarfed by the tawny gates that dominate the set, and by the tremendous figures of the gods, who are out of human scale altogether. At Argos, Orestes is a heroic figure, and grim enough when he kills Clytemnestra; but at Delphi, in the shadow of great golden Apollo, he looks like a small boy clinging to his father for support.

All the actors, except some in the chorus, are men, which places the action at a further remove from ordinary life. Douglas Campbell as Clytemnestra brings an incongruous touch of Oscar Wilde's Lady Bracknell to the proceedings, but his ironies gleam and sting, and he rises to climaxes of brazen power. Robin Gammell doubles successfully as Cassandra and Electra. Among the men who play men, the most notable are Lee Richardson as Agamemnon and Apollo, and Len Cariou—one of the finest young classical actors now working in the U.S.—as a powerful Orestes.

The actors who make up the choruses are notable because they are not riffraff whose only virtue is that they come cheap (as they would have to do Off-Broadway, or in most regional theatres); many of them play important roles in the Guthrie Theatre repertory. In his staging for the chorus, Guthrie has completely avoided the one-two-three-kick danger, employing instead a fluid series of stylized, asymmetrical groupings. The choral speaking, like that of the principals, rises easily from almost colloquial speech through chanting to outright song. I doubt that there is another company in this country capable of executing Dr. Guthrie's tremendous intentions.

Mr. Lewin has condensed the trilogy so that it can be played in three and a half hours; it seems far shorter. Agamemnon, the first play, is deeply impressive. The second, which Mr. Lewin entitles The Bringers of Offerings, rises to heights of power that I never thought a Greek play could attain in the 20th century. There is a grimly infectious sequence of ritual, wild yet controlled, as Orestes works himself up to the murder, and a towering moment near the end, when Orestes cries "Spread it out!" and the fatal net that had entangled his father is dragged open across the stage.

The third play, here called The Furies, is less successful than either of the others. The Furies themselves, those evocations of primitive ferocity and horror, are an unsolved problem. When Aeschylus first produced the play, we are told by an ancient writer, the Furies "so terrified the crowd that children died and women suffered miscarriage." In Aeschylus' time, of course, the audience's own beliefs worked to increase the emotional impact of these grim goddesses—an advantage that a modern director lacks. As if acknowledging that nowadays the Furies are a liability, Dr. Guthrie keeps them out of sight as much as possible: a prudent recourse, not a daring one. Unfortunately, we can still hear them, and they are nowhere near as terrible as the script keeps insisting they are. They sound as unconvincing as the Witches in most productions of Macbeth.

Another problem is the goddess Athena, who presides at the epoch-making trial that finally breaks the great chain of murder. Enthroned and tremendous, she looks like the radiant principle of justice she is supposed to be, but Douglas Campbell plays her as a world-weary ironist, not even seriously interested in the case unfolding before her. In every play there are certain places where any suggestion of mockery, however immediately effective, can tend only to undermine the final effect; this trial is one. Furthermore, the final ceremony of order which ends the trilogy, and which should be a sublime climax representing the emergence from darkness into light, is not, in Dr. Guthrie's staging, equal to the rites of chaos which have gone before.

Aside from these particular difficulties with The Furies, the production's limitations, as well as its virtues, are those demanded by Artaud. There are certain functions of theatre in which the prophet was aggressively not interested. Myths, dark forces, "life in its immense, universal aspect" were everything to him. "It is not on the social level that the action of theatre unfolds. Still less on the moral and psychological levels." Such a pronouncement would cut off whole dimensions of implication from The Oresteia, and that is what happens in Dr. Guthrie's production.

The Oresteia is not in any case of overwhelming interest as a psychological drama, but on the social and moral plane (the two are impossible to separate) it has much to say. In a pamphlet published by the Guthrie Theatre, the the poet Robert Bly writes:

> In The House of Atreus, Aeschylus, a genius ten times over, describes what it feels like for a family or a nation to be caught in its own past mistakes. And what is the mistake this ruling family made over and over again? It was the refusal to forgive, expressed as the inability to forgive. . . . Like the characters in The House of Atreus, our whole nation is now being pulled into the bottomless mud because of our past mistakes in Southeast Asia. . . . We cannot forgive North Vietnam nor the Vietcong; they in turn cannot forgive us. We are in the House of Atreus.

With this in mind, several members of the theatre published an advertisement in a Minneapolis paper inviting Vice President Humphrey, then in town, to come and see the production.

I doubt that he would have been very much edified, not at least, about Vietnam. We could never be in this House of Atreus; it is a house of giants, not of men. In Dr. Guthrie's production, the trilogy has no existence as a problem play, a hypothetical case, a discussion of issues, though Aeschylus included, and Mr. Lewin has preserved, all these things in it. At the Guthrie Theatre The House of Atreus is simply a rite, an evocation of something high and formidable, an image of magnificence. Perhaps it could not be anything else, and still be this; at any rate, it is enough. In our time we have hardly known that such a thing was possible in the theatre, which is why Artaud was so frustrated. Artaud was too unpredictable and irrational, and too bitterly opposed to a verbally oriented theatre, for it to be safe to say that he would have admired The House of Atreus, but it does realize, however imperfectly and partially, some of his dearest dreams.

and fie to you

New York City
Dear Sirs: In your August 28 issue, Richard J. Walton ["Voice of America: Memorandum to John Daly"] accuses the Voice of America of being a sort of international WLBJ, ". . . the Voice of Lyndon Baines Johnson." I ran the Voice for almost two years, and I'd like to comment.

Walton makes a foolish error when he says that the incoming head of the VOA "must do things LBJ's way or not at all." The President picked me for the VOA job, and that's the last I saw or heard of him, or anybody else at the White House. My boss at the USIA, Leonard Marks, may be a great pal of the President, but he very, very rarely got involved in editorial decisions, and almost never —really, only once or twice in a couple of years—had anything to say about the play of hard news.

I like to say that the VOA is the point at which two disciplines intersect: journalism and diplomacy. There is always friction at this intersection, and always will be. The diplomats often think bad news should be ignored, and the journalists believe in explaining it. I will not deny that we had occasional battles, but Walton has got his combatants mixed up. The VOA policy people were the ones who fought for the integrity of the VOA, and it gives me particular anguish that these gifted and dedicated people should be slurred.

Walton's piece represents a viewpoint which is at once unrealistic and understandable: the writers and editors at the VOA, being journalists, are constantly striving for the greatest possible measure of editorial freedom. But the official government radio of any country in the world must have some policy control, in order to represent that country. This applies all the way from the hopeless diatribes of Radio Damascus to the good old B.B.C. While I worked at the VOA, I thought our policy machinery was in good balance, and so did most people. But I don't think I won the hearts and minds of that little band of freedom-at-any-cost civil servants who would like to have run their own independent radio station. (Are you reading this, John Daly?)

As for the Foreign Service "fifth column" within the VOA, a few are marvelous, some are good and one or two are bad. A few, indeed, are as bad as some career employees at the VOA, the unmovable petty Bourbons of the Civil Service. That's an argument you can take both sides of.

So the VOA is decidedly not WLBJ, and when I knew it, the VOA told the truth about our society and the world, as well as saying some nice things about it. It was critical of LBJ when necessary, and honest about the things which happen in this country. I thought it was a good place to work, and I think John Daly will, too. Fie on you, Dick Walton.

John Chancellor

West Redding, Conn.
Dear Sirs: I am happy that Mr. Chancellor and I agree on the central point of my argument, that, to use his words, "VOA is the point at which two disciplines intersect; journalism and diplomacy. There is always friction at this intersection, and always will be." There certainly is, and at crucial moments diplomacy almost always triumphs as everyone at VOA recognizes. If a heraldic device should be struck for VOA, it might show a diplomat rampant and a journalist couchant.

Many at VOA have the sincere conviction that diplomacy should, in the national interest, triumph over truth . . . . Certainly there should be some policy control, but I believe B.B.C.s policy of objectivity would represent American principles better than VOA's policy of advocacy. . . .

Without going into further detail, let me say that my

McNamara's Gimmick

Secretary McNamara's latest scheme for solving the insoluble—a barrier of barbed wire, mines and esoteric devices across Vietnam just south of the formerly demilitarized zone—leads to the suspicion that the situation of the United States is even more desperate than the public has been allowed to know. The current project has been under study for about two years but the underlying idea has been a recurring refuge for military strategists for more than two millennia.

McNamara's prospectus reads like a compilation of all the electronic wizardry that is featured in science magazines for juveniles, known in the trade as "gee-whiz" material. It comprises supersensitive sensors, "burglar alarms," ground surveillance radar, geophone seismic detectors, moisture or sweat detectors, "people smellers," trip wire devices, beams of invisible light, and of course secret devices that would be treason to mention.

As a general rule, defensive barriers of great magnitude are proposed by the weak to thwart the strong; that was the reason for being of the Maginot Line, behind which France hoped to hold out against the aggressive and more numerous Germans. Obviously the American forces in South Vietnam are in no danger of being overrun en masse—although if the North Vietnamese and the Vietcong had air superiority, or merely parity, that would be a real danger.

Mr. McNamara has conceded the fact, obvious by now, that the North Vietnamese cannot be bombed into submission. Nor can bombing and anti-guerrilla warfare prevent the movement of supplies from North to South. Enough gets through, and the Vietcong have sufficient support among the peasants, so that the Americans and the Thieu-Ky forces are able to hold on to only large cities and some patches of countryside. The McNamara Line certainly will impede to some degree North Vietnamese movement, whether of men or supplies, but by all indications the improvement will not be decisive. This is not a mere conjecture from 9,000 miles away; the fact is that the American combat forces have no confidence in the latest response to the "do something" impulsion. The intruder-detectors will have to be guarded by strong points, which will be subjected to mortar attack and other harassment; the sections of the line between the points will have to be patrolled, the patrols will be ambushed; in short, to be effective the barrier will require enormous manpower. At the western end, where there are mountains as high as the Appalachians, no conceivable amount of support will avail, and that is where the bulk of the infiltration occurs. The line would have to be extended through Laos into Thailand, a matter of 170 miles if it could be run in a straight line, which is of course impossible.

The real purpose of the project is political rather than military. It will—so the Administration hopes—placate the doves while not enraging the hawks. Its construction will lend credence among those who still would like to believe Secretary McNamara's piteous protestations that all we want is to induce the North Vietnamese to let their neighbors alone. President Johnson will be able to say to Senator Mansfield: "You see, we are trying everything—even McNamara's barrier—to carry on the war in a moderate way."

The hawks cannot object—at least not vehemently—since the barrier will be billed as a means of saving American lives. However, the prospect that the hawks will be silenced for very long is as remote as a successful military role for this latest innovation. Already Ronald Reagan, who may be aspiring to hawk leadership as the high road to the Presidency, has called for use of the "full technological resources of the United States" for instant escalation to win "as quickly as possible." Asked what that meant, he backed off slightly, but the wording describes the atomic bomb. When McNamara's barrier fails, what but the bomb will remain?

'Poor George'

The press has had a field day with George Romney's latest demonstration that he is not an adroit politician. It is true, as Senator Javits said, that he used an "inartistic word" when he confessed he had been "brainwashed." Those Americans who look for a father image in their Presidents will complain that if he could be brainwashed once, he could be again. All the same, the hue and cry raised by Romney's use of the word is beside the point. What is important is the stand Romney and the other candidates will take when the exigencies of campaigning force them to face up to what promises to be the crucial issue of the election.

In effect, we warned Romney that he would be brainwashed once more on his trip to Saigon (see "Romney the Rambler," The Nation, January 30, page 130). The reason we ventured to advise him was that it was apparent from the start that Romney, in his own bumbling way, wanted to move to the dove side on the issue of Vietnam but was apprehensive that it might look as if he were taking an unpatriotic position and ruining his chances for the nomination. Subsequently, Senator Morton showed the way; he simply said, "I was wrong." Romney, after all, comes from the auto industry, where the sales figures often leave no choice but to make that admission and try again.

That Romney was injured for a week or so by his faux pas is obvious; the withdrawal of support by the Detroit News made him look even worse. While the bricks were raining down, however, most newspapers and radio-TV commentators failed to notice that the Detroit Free Press did not join in the barrage but said that while his choice of words may have been poor, "the sentiment behind the words was not poor." The Free Press went on to say that "Governor Romney undoubtedly did rely heavily for a long time on what government officials told him about the situation in Vietnam and only after some reflection and independent investigation and reading did he determine that much of what he had been told was pure hogwash." This is a sober evaluation, and one which a large section of the uncommitted electorate, sensing that is has been brainwashed in the same sense as Romney, may take to heart. That Romney has injured himself, for the long pull, much less disqualified himself for the nomination, is an unwarranted conclusion.

The consequence of the whole uproar, and Romney's subsequent refusal to back down, is that a Republican contender stands before the people avowedly critical of Johnson's war in Vietnam. It is about time that the bipartisan cant about the war was ended. Truman, Eisenhower and Kennedy all contributed to this bogus consensus, but it was Johnson who is responsible for the massive escalation, for making this an American war. If the GOP has any sense left, it will pre-empt the peace position now, unequivocally, and force Johnson to run as the war candidate. Nothing like this can be expected from a habitual practitioner of deviousness like Richard Nixon; but Romney managed, so to speak, to fall into the position, and so has contributed a mite toward the political clarification that was so badly needed.

The Teachers' Revolt

There is a larger issue in the current rash of teachers' strikes than the bread-and-butter one. Teachers are staging a revolt against the failure of the public to upgrade the status of the profession. There is every reason to believe them when they say they are concerned about the school system as well as about winning better working conditions. In New York City the fiscally beleaguered Lindsay administration made a generous offer to the union. But in New York as elsewhere teachers want a larger voice in policy determination as well as better pay. Teachers are in revolt as well as on strike. The attitude of public employees toward collective bargaining and the right to strike has undergone a marked change in the last five years. Timothy Cooney, in a Nation article (January 24, 1966), pointed out: "Until a few years ago, the average civil servant was prevented from striking by his own convictions and not by laws and injunctions. . . . In recent years, however, there has been a marked change in attitude." A "new breed" of public employee has emerged, younger, better educated, with higher expectations. This "new breed" will not accept lower wage rates and inferior working conditions in exchange for security of employment. Nor will it settle merely for better wages; it demands a new status. There has been, for example, a significant change in the composition of the teaching profession. The National Education Association points out that men, mostly young men, now constitute 31 per cent of all teachers and more than half of those in high schools. Public employees today have outgrown the subservient attitudes of the past and demand exactly the same rights as other workers. Legislation is not likely to prevent or terminate their strikes.

Not only has a "new breed" emerged; the public's attitude has begun to change. The public is much more willing to concede the right to strike that it was not so many years ago. Teachers are not unmindful of their professional responsibilities, but the public has been unmindful of the critically important role of the teacher in society. In the past, the public has been fairly generous in supporting school bands, athletic programs, buildings and equipment, but has failed to upgrade the professional standing of teachers or to concede them the role in policy formation to which they are entitled. Predictably teachers' strikes will continue until a new status has been accorded the profession.

House of Spooks

Critics of the Central Intelligence Agency have for years said that that house of spooks is nutty; but for the most part such things were said in the spirit of hyperbole. Now it appears that perhaps they were right in this: the CIA does in fact appear to be run by kooks.

Assuming that an organization's sanity can be tested by the manner in which it hires and fires its employees, consider this evidence of mental aberration: The CIA uses handwriting analysis (according to The Wall Street Journal) to test the character and personality traits of job applicants. This is scarcely a scientific or even a common-sense test, of course, but that doesn't seem to bother the men who run the CIA.

More recently Sen. Sam Ervin of North Carolina came up with the fascinating information that at least as late as 1963 the CIA was financing the development of a "wiggle seat," a sly kind of lie detector. The job applicant would be seated in a plain-looking chair during his interview; but unbeknownst to him, the specially equipped seat would be recording his pulse, adrenalin flow, respiration and skin dampness. It is not known whether the wiggle seat has ever been put into service.

What is known is that the CIA is using its battery of ordinary lie-detector machines with a mindless fury. Senator Ervin has learned, through his own sources within the spy agency (its top officials will no longer talk with him) that more than 5,000 lie tests were administered on both employees and would-be employees during the last year, and only thirty for counterintelligence purposes.

Because of his psychotic affection for the machine, CIA Director Richard Helms is frantically determined that Congress shall not include his agency under the pending bill to outlaw lie-detector tests and to prohibit any government agency from asking a job applicant such things as whether he ever had sexual relations with an animal, whether he slept with his wife before marriage, whether he urinates more than other people, or whether he believes in the Second Coming. Helms has lobbied furiously in the Senate to keep the privilege of asking CIA workers questions of this sort, and he will undoubtedly now go to work on the House to defend his bureaucratic voyeurism.

He is especially interested in having the right to use the lie detector to hunt for homosexuals. But the reason is not clear. Does he wish to get rid of them as security risks? Or does he want to recruit them as agents? The latter is rumored and the rumor has been published, even in the highly responsible Christian Science Monitor. Helms has not denied the published rumors. Senator Ervin—certainly no defender of Helms—feels, however, that not even the CIA is that dumb. But even assuming the CIA wants to use the lie detector to weed out homosexuals, this makes little sense.

In one of the closed sessions of the Senate subcommittee considering Ervin's bill, Sen. Birch Bayh of Indiana, a close friend of Helms, argued with Ervin: "Sam, if the Russians find a queer on the CIA payroll, they can intimidate him and put him to their own service." To which Ervin responded tiredly: "Yeah? And how are the Russians going to find him—with a lie detector?"

But logic, as Ervin has discovered, isn't the best of weapons to use in fighting for legislation.

No Hope?

Richard Blumenthal's report on the New Politics Conference (p. 273) is no more enthusiastic than James Ridgeway's report in The New Republic (September 16.) The editors take a somewhat more sanguine view of the Chicago proceedings than that reflected in these reports and dissent, in particular, from Mr. Ridgeway's conclusion: "It is indeed the worst of times, and the National Conference on New Politics destroyed what was left of our hope and we are alone." On the contrary there are signs of growing confidence in President Johnson's proposition, that for political ills there are political remedies.

The evidence is much too voluminous to summarize here, but a few items can be mentioned. Anti-war protests are multiplying, not abating, and these activities will accelerate as the 1968 campaign unfolds. Thousands of volunteers have participated in the campaigns conducted by Negotiation Now! and the Vietnam Summer Project. Volunteers in the latter project have interviewed thousands of voters on a neighborhood, community and precinct basis. Incumbents have been lobbied, and candidates interviewed. The peace constituency is estimated at 20 million voters and is concentrated in key states. There are a minimum of fifty Congressional districts in which peace candidates would have an excellent chance of winning on the basis of close studies. A new mood has emerged during the summer which finds reflection in the headlines: "Finds Johnson Low in '68 Saddle" (Ted Lewis in the New York Daily News, August 29.), "The President in Trouble" (Newsweek, September 4), "Governors Wary of Johnson in '68," a caption on a New York Times account (September 3) of the Midwest Democratic Governors Conference, in which one governor was quoted as saying: "Up until a couple of months ago, the people of Missouri were hawks. Then Johnson called for the 10 per cent surtax and announced at the same time he was sending more troops to Vietnam. He hit them right in the pocketbook and you never saw so many people turn so fast."

The Republican situation is beginning to unfreeze; the shifts in position of Governor Romney and Senator Morton are significant straws in the wind. The Democrats are more sharply divided than at any point thus far. Sen. Joseph Tydings is merely the latest to defect from the President's position. A group known as "Concerned Democrats" has opened offices in Washington to spearhead a drive to defeat the President in 1968. Students have set up a committee called Alternative Task Force 1968. Esquire raises the question, "Is It Too Late for a Man of Honesty, High Purpose and Intelligence to be Elected President of the United States in 1968?" and nominates its own candidate, J. Irwin Miller—incidentally not a bad nomination. A committee is touting Gen. James Gavin as a peace candidate and the General is bringing out a book entitled Crisis '68. In Los Angeles, Dissenting Democrats, headed by Robert Vaughn, will work to elect candidates who favor ending U. S. participation in the war. The group is out to gather a million names by November 11, to run an advertisement in newspapers in 25 major cities. "Individuals Against the Crime of Silence," another Los Angeles group (P. O. Box 69960, Los Angeles) is securing thousands of signatures to a declaration against the war and U. S. participation in it which will be deposited at the United Nations. There are new stirrings in the labor movement; a conference of labor representatives has been scheduled for the weekend of November 11-12, which will be held at the Center for Continuing Education, University of Chicago; and opposition to the war is mounting in such organizations as the NAACP.

In the pleasant, heavily Republican suburb of Willoughby, Ohio, a group has been formed to sponsor an initiative measure which would record sentiment against the war. The measure was ruled off the ballot on the ground that it would have no "legislative effect," but an appeal has been taken to the Ohio Supreme Court because of the interest other communities have shown in the project. Twenty-five residents of Loomis, a Northern California town (pop. 2,300), heard a Vietnam Summer Project broadcast and promptly organized a "peace center." It would be difficult to imagine communities more unlike than these two. The New York City Committee for the Immediate Withdrawal Referendum has obtained 97,000 signatures to its petitions.

The New Politics Conference which was held at Chicago was itself a manifestation of the reviving interest in political action; no doubt the organization will find ways of participating effectively in local campaigns.

The disenchantment with politics is an expression of the deep-seated bias in this country in favor of "instant remedies" for ancient or obdurate evils. Coupled with this penchant for instant remedies is a related insistence on the assumed need for one and only one approach to the desired political goal. There is no one approach to the problem posed by the 1968 election; all manner of activities and stratagems can and should be used. Essentially what is needed is a restoration of confidence in the good sense of a majority of the electorate, once they are given a clear view of the issues and options. There will be options; in fact a new negative option has been provided in at least one state. Wisconsin has now added a new line on the ballot: "None of the Names Shown," which the disgruntled voter can mark. Even if only one candidate appears for an office, the voter can mark the ballot "No" and the No votes will be announced. A trivial concession no doubt, and not much of a remedy, but entirely logical in theory and one which other states should adopt. The options will not be ideal in 1968; they never are, but the voters will not be "powerless" either, for they never are, if they have the wit, will and energy to seize upon the opportunities that exist. President Johnson is right: for political ills there are still political remedies.

THE REAGAN BACKLASH

REVOLT AGAINST THE POOR

PHIL KERBY

Los Angeles

California, under its thirty-third Governor, Ronald Reagan, is in the throes of a middle-class revolution against the poor. While the inner cities across the nation explode with the violence of the dispossessed, the quiet revolutionaries of the California suburbs do not have to take to the streets. Their maximum leader in Sacramento has the silent levers of power at his command, and he is using them in a carefully selective fashion against the welfare state.

It is a tricky process awash in the drip, drip, drip of popular rhetoric against big government, taxes, waste and all the rest, but the welfare-warfare state of the great corporations, as well as their satellite interests, remain untouched. The target is the welfare state of the unemployed, the disabled, the aged.

Two simultaneous actions in August brought the philosophy of the Reagan regime into clear focus. Reagan signed a routine bill authorizing salaries up to $20,000 a year for eight of his executive aides. The legislation provides immediate relief for two hardship cases, each drawing $16,500. On the same day, the economy-minded administrator of the Health and Welfare Agency disclosed a sharp cutback in services under the state's Medi-Cal plan enacted in March, 1966, to augment federal Medicare. Surgery will be permitted only under "life-threatening" emergencies. Other services eliminated dental care for the blind, dependent children, disabled children and persons on old-age security. The ability of the middle-class to co-opt welfare programs was demonstrated during the first sixteen months of Medi-Cal. Twelve hundred physicians during that period got an average of $70,000 each, and some received $80,000 to $110,000. Physicians' fees totaled $167 million. (Shortly after the reductions took effect, a superior court judge ruled they violated the Medi-Cal law and issued a permanent injunction against them. The state will appeal.)

The Medi-Cal cutback affects 1.5 million persons, and its announcement came, perhaps significantly, the day after the Republican Party won control of the state Senate which, along with the Assembly, had been in Democratic hands for a decade. Democratic Assemblyman John L. Burton, running in a special election for the Senate from San Francisco, had the support of minority and low-income groups, but that was not enough. He lost to Municipal Judge Milton Marks, supported by Reagan and Reagan money which washed into the area from throughout the state. San Francisco, whose registered Democrats outnumber Republicans two to one, joined the middle-class revolution. If any one factor decisively affected the outcome it was the fear and the reaction inspired by the uprisings in Newark and Detroit. Governor Reagan sent out the proper political signals to the fearful. He blamed the disorders on "mad dogs." Marks's victory, Reagan said, will help him put into effect his "concept that government is the servant and not the master of the people." So far, the Reagan administration has it both ways: servant of the wealthy, master of the poor.

The new 56-year-old Governor set the tone of his administration in his inaugural address on the "complex" problems of government: "You and I have been . . . told there are no simple answers. . . . Well, the truth is, there are simple answers—there just are not easy ones." To people living in the squalor of the ghettos, to the aged, the disabled, the dependent mother on welfare, Governor Reagan quickly proved his point. For them, his simple answers have not been easy ones.

Reagan explains it all so well over his regular state-of-the-state television reports, privately financed, that his popularity is undiminished and may even be greater today than it was last November when he retired Gov. Edmund G. Brown with nearly a million votes to spare.

Reagan's election as governor, without a day's experience in public office and after a second-lead movie career, a long run as propagandist for the General Electric Company, and host of a television show, was the miracle of the year, or any year, in American politics, but a greater miracle may lie just beyond the horizon. "Ronnie Baby," after eight months in Sacramento, is running for President of the United States. The very thought of it, he confided not long ago, "terrified" him at first. He is rapidly learning to live with fear. A Republican assemblyman told a reporter near the end of the recent session of the California legislature: "The people around Reagan, except Phil Battaglia, are weighing every move by Reagan for its effect on him as a Presidential candidate." Philip M. Battaglia, a Los Angeles lawyer and Reagan's executive secretary, has now resigned, and Californians have a choice of two rumors: one, Battaglia quit after failing to persuade Reagan that he should concentrate on Sacramento and forget Washington; and, two, Battaglia will travel the country, setting up a Reagan-for-President organization. The latter appears more likely.

They laughed when Reagan became a candidate for governor ("Reagan for governor? No! James Stewart for governor. Reagan for best friend"). They chuckled even as he sat down in the governor's chair ("Lights, camera, reaction"). Nobody has been laughing lately. Reagan, as nominee of the Republican Party is a real possibility. Reagan as President? In the chaos of current politics, that could happen. Simple answers, supremely illogical, hard on the defenseless, but emotionally satisfying to millions burdened with the fears of a hopeless war in Vietnam and the Negro revolution at home, may be just what the country wants in 1968.

Even so, Reagan and his handlers will need a greater miracle to put him in the White House than the one that switched his address from his all-electric (courtesy General Electric) Pacific Palisades home to Sacramento. Governor Brown's administration was ripe for political disaster. Brown succeeded very well as governor; he failed as a politician, lacking the killer instinct necessary to control the feuding factions in his own party; friendly and outgoing, Brown could be crossed and double-crossed with impunity, and was. Hence the rise to power of Assembly Speaker Jesse M. Unruh, who carved out his own feudal domain in state politics, and the emergence from oblivion of Mayor Sam Yorty of Los Angeles. Unruh likes the taste, the smell and the feel of power, but he is an imaginative politician who often seeks to use that power for constructive ends. Although the observation could have come with more grace from someone else, Unruh was quite right in saying that the most creative proposals in the past legislative session came from the Assembly, and by inference, from him. Both Yorty and Unruh excel as picadors, and their expert work on Brown set him up for the kill. Unruh wandered out of the state during the election, privately, and with utter composure, predicting a Democratic debacle. Yorty, a spoiler who may get more satisfaction from the defeat of others than from his own victories, ran against Brown in the primary, talked ominously of the nonexistent "Brown machine," and ludicrously suggested that the affable Governor was surrounded by sinister left wingers. After Brown lost to Reagan, the smiling Mayor consoled himself by dropping in on Reagan's campaign victory breakfast. Such is the nature of California politics.

More basic to Reagan's success than the routine maneuvering of knife-wielding politicians is the shifting, rootless character of California society. The state adds 1,200 persons a day to its population, and about one-fourth of the population moves once every five years. Between elections, neither major political party has more than a skeleton organization, and no political leader can claim a disciplined following. The power of Jesse Unruh, the most influential politician in the state next to the governor, rests on his control of the Assembly, not on any popular base. The state, preoccupied and enthralled by phenomenal growth, has never developed an established leadership elite with a tradition of public service.

California, in 1966, was ideally created for the architect of the Creative Society. Reagan began with no organized political following. His assets were far more important: a public identity and television, the single most unifying force in the midst of chaos. He used TV with the skill and familiarity gained from years on the sound stages of Hollywood; he spoke of real issues: oppressive bureaucracy, the waste and cost of government, and violence in the streets (code for Negro riots). He played on fears and exploited prejudice with greater emphasis than he placed on solutions, and the strategy worked. It was particularly effective in Southern California which has drawn most of its migrants from the South and Midwest. The Southerners brought with them their racial stereotypes and the Midwesterners their conservatism. (Reagan won easily in Southern California and lost narrowly in the San Francisco Bay area.) The middle class had voted for Brown four years ago against Nixon and for Johnson two years ago against Goldwater, but in 1966 they felt threatened, and deserted wholesale to Reagan. The election revealed their anxieties over the multiplying and seemingly insoluble problems of congested urban life. Festering beneath it all were the war in Vietnam and the Negro revolution.

Two days before Reagan's inauguration, Gordon P. Smith, educated at the University of Massachusetts and the University of Denver and a self-made management consultant, was informally talking over money problems with a few key Republican legislators and several administrators of the University of California. Reagan had done what every out-of-office candidate has always done: he promised to cut costs and introduce efficiency into government. Smith, his freshly appointed state director of finance, casting about for ways to reduce expenditures and increase income, proposed charging tuition at the nine university campuses and California's eighteen state colleges.* He plunged the Reagan administration into a controversy before Reagan had even located the elevators in the state capitol. Smith assumed, in his innocence, that conversations at a private meeting would be considered confidential. The university administrators, hostile to tuition, leaked word to the press, and the storm broke. Tuition-free higher education has been a century-old tradition in California, but attendance at the university and the state colleges costs each student about $2,000. This figure includes living expenses and fees students now pay, averaging $250 at the university and $125 in the colleges. Added to this total, under Reagan's proposal, would be $250 annual tuition at the university and $180 at the colleges.

The twenty-four member Board of Regents of the university, each appointed for sixteen-year terms, represents, more than any other group, the "establishment" in the fluid society of California. They reacted coldly to the idea of tuition and stiffened as Smith lectured them briskly on the operation of "their university." Reagan, angry but undismayed, then made a frontal attack. In the face of expanding enrollment this fall at the university (90,000) and state colleges (185,000) and record budget requests for both systems, he announced a deep slash in state aid. The U.C. regents wanted $278 million. He proposed $196.5 million. The state college Board of Trustees wanted $213 million. Reagan, the citizen-politician, proved tougher than expected. After the noise and smoke cleared away, the regents settled for $251.5 million, $28 million less than their first request. In addition, they agreed to use their $20-million contingency fund to meet expenses in 1967-68, which meant state support for the university was reduced by $48 million. The state college system accepted $197 million, instead of the $213 million requested in state aid. When the tumult subsided, the regents had staved off tuition this year. At the end of August, the board again turned down tuition, but agreed to impose a new "charge" next year without specifying the amount. If the "charge" approaches the $250 tuition figure, Reagan will have won the fight by surrendering a point in semantics. He is pressing hard, and his latest argument is that fees imposed on students who can afford to pay will be distributed in scholarships and loans, making it possible for more students from low-income families to attend the university. Any significant program of this kind probably would cost more than the funds raised by new fees under whatever guise.

*In August, former Governors Brown, Goodwin J. Knight and Earl Warren, announced their opposition to tuition in an open letter to the University Board of Regents. They said tuition "would discriminate severely" against potential students from low-income families.

The costly system of higher education in California, the most advanced in the nation, was tempting game to any politician, as a result of a series of headline-attracting disturbances at Berkeley. First, the Free Speech Movement erupted, followed by the "filthy speech" movement and, more seriously, the strong protests against the war in Vietnam. Right-wing zealots like Max Rafferty, State Superintendent of Public Instruction, sought constantly to bring chaos out of comparatively mild disorder. He said during one of his more lucid moments that Berkeley offered students a four-year course in "sex, drugs and treason." Reagan discovered during the campaign that his attacks on the university aroused popular response. The sight of a student, especially a bearded student, carrying a placard, seems to stir an atavistic hostile itch in the adult population. Reagan suggested that the payment of tuition might help to keep some of the "troublemakers" off the campus. In the middle of the controversy stood the university's president, Clark Kerr, mild-mannered, an intellectual, a liberal and, as a result, a natural scapegoat. Kerr wanted, under moderate guidelines, to allow more freedom for students on campus, and this stimulated anger right and left. Not that the Kerr administration was faultless. Student protests against restrictive rules against free speech and the factory system of education had solid merit, and they were first met by a series of hypocritical evasions. Reforms instituted later appeased neither the Left activists nor the Right reactionaries because both sought goals that had little connection with the merits of campus disputes.

Reagan's election meant that Clark Kerr was out, and nobody knew that better than Kerr himself. Conservative regents, who accused Kerr of vacillation in handling the student protests, had long wanted to fire him, but Governor Brown's influence was sufficient to stay the knife. With Reagan in and Brown out, Kerr's departure became only a question of time, but the timing, unfortunate in Reagan's view, was not to be of his choosing. Kerr had responded vigorously against the deep cuts in the university budget, and he sought the support of the Board of Regents at its mid-January meeting, the first the new Governor would attend as ex officio president of the board. He was counseled to resign and go quietly. He quietly stayed for an eyeball-to-eyeball confrontation with Reagan and the conservative faction on the board. They fired him as a burnt offering to Reagan, as Kerr knew they would, but he retained his half-smiling composure as he picked himself up outside the swinging doors. The frenetic fringe of the New Left, which considers history nonexistent, and the far Right, which views history as a left-wing conspiracy, joined in the applause as the new sheriff threw Kerr out of the schoolhouse. Reagan was discomfited, but only slightly, at the resulting fuss, which came mainly from the university community and a few newspapers, principally the Los Angeles Times.

If he could look down from his counting house in the sky, the role of the Times in the 1960s would confuse and dismay the grand old bearded walrus of reaction, Harrison Grey Otis, who ran the paper for thirty-six years from 1881. His heirs faithfully carried on in the ancient, hidebound tradition until 1960 when the old man's great-grandson and namesake, Otis Chandler, became publisher. Strange things happened. The Times attacked the John Birch Society and began a pattern of objective news coverage, which disillusioned its old friends (who had always depended upon the paper to be faithfully unfair) and surprised its critics. In 1964, the Times slipped from its new-found grace and tepidly endorsed Goldwater with the comforting assurance that he would lose. Two years later, the Times (it is a Republican newspaper) swallowed hard and endorsed Reagan. Seldom has a paper been so saddened so soon after its candidate took office. Mrs. Dorothy Chandler, wife of the former publisher, mother of the present publisher, cultural boss of Southern California, and vice chairman of the Board of Regents, expressed "shock" at Reagan's slashes in the university budget. "No substantial reduction will be possible in the higher education budget," said the Times, "if the quality of such education is to be maintained and expanded. . . ." And the Times capped a series of editorials by stating: "Although the Governor declares himself dedicated to preservation of the quality of education and the enrollment 'of the largest number of students possible,' his barebones budget for higher education raises some serious doubts." Reagan, who has a low boiling point despite the image of affable good-guy seriousness he presents on TV, confessed to one reporter that he took a cold shower to cool off after reading one of the Times's editorials.

Reagan may have been under the impression that the budgets for the university and state college system could be cut without opposition, except from educators, with whom he shared a mutual contempt, and their sordid intellectual allies. He was mistaken. The Times attempted to educate him: "This state has achieved its tremendous technological growth and resulting prosperity primarily because of its unrivaled sources of higher education and university-connected research. To jeopardize these resources would be the most short-sighted and destructive kind of economizing." The San Francisco Chronicle chimed in: "If the University and the State colleges are the primary source of the leadership that brings . . . research and development funds to California, that is certainly one of the strongest reasons for the State's recognizing that its higher education system should be kept strong. The research and development activity that we have is the best guarantee that job creation will continue to be created in the numbers needed." The Chronicle duly noted that California gets about a third of the $14.3 billion spent annually by the federal government in prime contracts for research and development. Research goes where talent is, and among the 26,000 scientists in California are nearly half of America's Nobel Prize winners and 158 members of the National Academy of Science. W. K. H. Panofsky, director of the Stanford Linear Accelerator Center, underscored the point: "There is little doubt in my mind that the primary reason for California's leadership in scientific and technical talent lies in its state university and state colleges."

The warning to Reagan was simple: hands off the welfare state—as it applies to California's vast technological economy. Idealogues of the Right may fulminate against big government; the sophisticated corporate managers, including the managers of the university, understand the source of the state's prosperity. Berkeley Chancellor Roger W. Heyns said: "Potentially, each $1 in state support cut from the university research budget can cost $5 in federal research funds, a loss that could escalate to several millions." California industry depends on the production of scientists and technicians by the university and profits tremendously from state-federal subsidized research. (This was a central point in protests by students, who claimed the university had become a parts-replacement factory for industry.) California, the staging area for the war in Vietnam, gets more than 18 per cent of the $32 billion currently spent for military prime contract awards of $10,000 or more. The space agency dumps more billions annually into California. Even the ordinary operations of state government, health and welfare, roads and parks, draw heavily on funds from Washington. Withdrawal of federal subsidies would collapse the state's economy overnight.

But Reagan had a promise to keep and miles to travel. "The cost of California government is too high," he said in his inaugural address. "We are going to squeeze and cut and trim. . . . It won't be easy, nor will it be pleasant. . . ." It wasn't easy, as he predicted; it wasn't pleasant—and it wasn't done. After eight months under Governor Reagan, California has the biggest budget, $5.09 billion, and the biggest accompanying tax increase, $946 million, in the history of any state.

Reagan entered the governor's office thoroughly self-indoctrinated on the simple virtues of business and businessmen and the crimes of government and politicians. He had spent, by his own count, 4,000 enthusiastic hours of free-enterprise speechmaking for General Electric. He believed, along with his government-subsidized business friends, in reducing government costs (read the welfare state of the poor), set out to cut some—and collided instantly with the reality of the welfare state.

Reagan ordered all state agencies to trim their budgets by 10 per cent, and he underscored this with specifics. He proposed saving $17 million by cutting back the administration of state mental hospitals, with the elimination of 3,700 jobs, the closing of fourteen outpatient clinics, and the shifting of part of the burden to the counties. He pointed out that the population of mental hospitals had been declining. This had been accomplished by improved standards of therapy and the use of the outpatient clinics, and psychiatrists believed that a system working so well should not be scuttled. In a letter signed by all 650 of its members, the Southern California Psychiatric Society called the cutbacks "disastrous." Reagan did nothing to temper their hostility by referring to them as "head shrinkers" or by his breezy remark that prisons and hospitals make up the "biggest hotel chain in the state."

"I See a Tall Dark Deficit in Your Future"

Other economy moves followed: a job freeze in hiring new personnel; closing of eight of the state's forty-one conservation camps established to fight fire and erosion; a 77 per cent cut in the budget of the Office of Consumer Counsel; elimination of the state subsidy for the Mendocino Alcoholism Treatment Center; a delay in the construction of new facilities to relieve overcrowded conditions at the San Quentin state prison; and postponement of the opening of two youth training centers for juvenile offenders. Some economies, like the restriction on out-of-state travel by junketing state employees, met no opposition at all. (This will not apply to the Governor or his staff. In Reagan's record budget, $152,000 is provided for travel by him and his aides, more than double the amount requested by Brown.)

These savings enabled Reagan in January to hand the legislature a theoretical budget of $4.6 billion, a slightly lower figure than Brown's estimates for fiscal 1967-68. It seemed that the Governor who had been miraculously elected had accomplished another miracle. He had—on paper—but the whole thing proved illusory. As the protests escalated, Reagan backed away from some of the reductions in the mental health program. Eight hundred of the eliminated jobs were restored, and it was announced that "phasing out" would be substituted for outright dismissal. Closing of five of the outpatient clinics was postponed. It was discovered that the cost of Medi-Cal, the state's medical-aid program for the needy under 65, had exceeded estimates and required an additional $75 million. To relieve local property taxes, Reagan had promised to expand state aid to local school districts, and $170 million—later dropped to $148 million—was added to the budget for this purpose, and there was a $197 deficit inherited from the Brown administration. Brown had foreseen the need for more revenue, but could not get his tax measures through a captious legislature. When all the maneuvering had ended, the January budget had increased by $434 million. Before he signed it, Reagan cut away $43 million in a final flourish. One of the items that fell on the cutting-room floor was $750,000 for a governor's mansion to replace the old Victorian relic abandoned by Reagan for a rented house in a Sacramento suburb. Reagan said he thought the people of California would like to build a new mansion on a "voluntary basis." His close associates and admirers are now engaged in this philanthropic effort, with the notable lack of assistance from Governor Brown and his immediate predecessor, Republican Goodwin J. Knight, who believe the governor of California should not have to "depend on charity" for his residence.

California's biggest budget confronted Governor Reagan with his biggest moment of truth—new taxes.

Ronald Reagan was making one of his famous speeches against the dragon of big government in general and the income tax in particular. He told the Business Educational Institute of New Jersey: "We have received this progressive tax direct from Karl Marx, who designed it as a prime essential of a Socialist state." That was plain citizen Reagan speaking. Six years later, Governor Reagan sent a big bundle of tax increases to the California legislature. Leading all the rest was a hike in the personal income tax, increased on the average by 60 per cent and close to 100 per cent in brackets above $15,000. Other increases: sales tax up 1 per cent; bank and corporation taxes up 1.5 per cent; cigarette taxes up 4c a pack by August 1 and 3c more by October 1; liquor up 50c a gallon.

Business interests kicked at new taxes on business; labor protested the sales tax; the Los Angeles Times thought that so huge a tax increase should await a reform of the entire tax structure, but California voters, who might have wanted to impeach Pat Brown if he had increased taxes on this scale, were not disturbed. The new levies have not yet caused them to feel the "pain" which Reagan prescribed as excellent therapy to make Californians aware of the cost of government. By rejecting a state income tax withholding plan as too painless, Reagan sacrificed about $60 million annually lost from people who leave the state without paying taxes on their California-earned income. Reagan said he liked neither the budget nor the tax increases, and pinned the blame on the prior administration, which had "looted and drained" the state of its resources. "We stand," the Governor said of his administration, "between the taxpayer and the tax spender."

John G. Schmitz thought otherwise. "Reagan," he said near the end of the last legislative session, "just wants to run socialism more efficiently." Schmitz is a special case. A confessed member of the John Birch Society and a state Senator, he represents Orange County, which believes that government, by definition, is subversive. Schmitz has a philosophy: "I'm up here in Sacramento to see if it's possible for a man to keep his campaign promises." He voted no on the budget, no on the tax package, and no when the farsighted legislators voted to give themselves a cost-of-living raise from $6,000 to $16,000. When Reagan decided it was not possible to repeal the Rumford open-housing act and supported modification instead, Schmitz voted no. His gorge rose again when Reagan signed the liberalized abortion law (see Kerby: "Abortion: Laws and Attitudes," The Nation, June 12). To Schmitz, greatly distressed by it all, Reagan is making a pass at middle roaders to broaden his Presidential appeal, while taking his conservative friends for granted. The Orange County Senator, who won't be taken for granted, is among the small, but perhaps growing, number of true believers disillusioned by Reagan.

Moderate Republican politicians, who admire Earl Warren and like Pat Brown, are not too unhappy with Reagan. One, a state Senator, said: "Reagan appeases the Right with rhetoric, while moving toward the Center of politics." Another, a state Assemblyman, thinks the big budget and the big taxes would have been about the same if Brown had been reelected. But a Sacramento reporter who covers the capital has a different view: "Reagan was elected to stop California, to put on the brakes, and that is just what he is doing." Governor Brown shares the pessimism of the true believers, for different reasons. Brown: "Lack of interest in social justice is Reagan's greatest fault." Assemblyman Charles Warren of Los Angeles, a rather unpartisan state Democratic chairman, believes Reagan may turn out to be a "passably good caretaker governor, but lacks the imagination of a real leader."

Except for a few light jabs, Democratic politicians, who have as much respect as anyone else for a man who can win by a million votes, have not been able to lay a glove on Reagan. His most consistent and most effective critic, oddly enough, turned out to be the Los Angeles Times, whose editorial management, infiltrated by intellectuals, is running a low-grade fever over the Governor. Calling the latest legislative session "disappointing," the Times said: "The Administration won out on the largest tax increase in California's history to support the largest spending program in history, but there was no commensurate tax reform and no meaningful property tax relief."

The attitude of the Times, formerly a house organ for business, is not typical of the free-wheeling business and industrial entrepreneurs of the state, the comparatively new rich, who have made their money in postwar federally subsidized California, whose population, now nearly 20 million, has nearly tripled in the past quarter century. They lavishly financed Reagan's campaign, they reciprocate his boyish admiration for them, and they are the single biggest influence in his administration. Reagan has weighted his administration with men whose views are antithetical to their official functions. His real estate commissioner is past president of the California Real Estate Association and a leader in the fight against the state's open-housing law; the agricultural commissioner is a rancher and a member of the anti-labor Right To Work Committee; a former consultant to savings and loan associations is the savings and loan commissioner; the industrial relations commissioner is a former corporation executive; and other appointments reflect a similarly negative outlook. The head of the Department of General Services is a retired right-wing army general; the Governor's clemency aide is a former assistant district attorney who believes in capital punishment. Reagan reached into the ranks of Berkeley professors, of all places, for an appointment to the State Utilities Commission, but the professor is a long-time advocate of more lenient regulation of utilities. Exceptions to the mediocre quality of such appointments are excellent selections in conservation and resource development, agencies vital to a state being ploughed under and paved over by rapacious exploiters.

Flushed with a million-vote victory, surrounded by men who were as conservative, or more so than he was, Governor Reagan launched a no-compromise administration. Such ideological purity, never known under Pat Brown, became the spirit of Sacramento under Ronald Reagan—but not for long.

The Governor of California—"where the action is"—is a figure of national political importance. The spectacular election of Ronald Reagan, a liberal turned right-wing movie actor, made him something of far greater significance in our publicity-conscious culture: a national celebrity. He attracts relays of journalists to Sacramento. They usually depart bemused. Governor Reagan was not the Ronald Reagan of the evangelical speeches against the income tax as a "Communist plot." He is not the Reagan who trembled in fear the Communists might take over the country no later than 1970. In short, Reagan, as one put it elegantly, is not a "nut."

What had happened to "Ronnie Baby"? He had been reading the public opinion polls, and the polls told him that his fellow countrymen considered him a "Presidential possibility."

Governor Reagan, who will go to the Republican convention as a favorite son, wants a firmly united party behind him. One of the prices of unity—supporting the moderate Senator Kuchel—is a moderate one. There is the more difficult problem of Richard M. Nixon. In stage whispers that can be heard in the upper balcony, Reagan's staff refers to him sadly as "the all-time champion loser." Rumors floating around say Nixon has hinted he might enter the California primary if Reagan stacks the state's national convention delegation too heavily against him. That is unlikely, unless California Republicans, in the midst of success, revert to the strategy of 1958 when the magic coalition of Nixon, Knight and Knowland schemed the party into disaster.

On the biggest issue in Presidential politics, Reagan's view is characteristically clean-cut and straightforward: "We ought to go into Vietnam and make it one big parking lot and paint a stripe down the middle." Despite this quality of simplicity and candor, and other advantages, Reagan, coining one of his nimble phrases—"I have a four-year contract with the people of California"—keeps saying he is not a candidate. His staff assistants, brisk, young confident types, keep leading him up the mountain and showing him those polls. The latest, a year and five months before the Presidential election, reports that the strongest Republican ticket would be Rockefeller for President and Reagan for Vice President. Reagan's aides can put together any number of combinations, and they always end up with Reagan for President.

Meanwhile, a lovely little cloud, no bigger than a dainty woman's white glove, has arisen on the California horizon, an omen of yet another political miracle fashioned in the Hollywood dream factory.

Shirley Temple is running for Congress.

VIETNAM ELECTIONS

MARCHING OUT THE HORSES

KARL H. PURNELL

Mr. Purnell is starting this month as the Vietnam correspondent for the Public Broadcast Laboratory, the new TV network directed by Fred Friendly.

Saigon

The big surprise in Vietnam's recent elections was the excellent showing of an unknown peace candidate, Troung Dinh Dzu. By far the harshest critic of the present military junta, Dzu placed second in the race. His campaign symbol of a white dove of peace and his continued jabs at the ruling generals apparently aroused hope among some Vietnamese who saw in him a promise for change.

At a large political rally in Nha Trang, a coastal city approximately 350 miles north of Saigon, the short, heavy-set Dzu told a cheering crowd that it was time to throw out the rascals in Saigon.

"What is democracy in Vietnam? It is anything which is against the present government," he shouted to an appreciative audience.

Even Dzu's campaign oratory was not enough to stop the government landslide. Generals Nguyen Van Thieu and Nguyen Cao Ky received twice as many votes as Dzu.

This kind of sweep might be considered a strong mandate to rule in a Western democracy where a majority can express its will at the polls. In Vietnam, however, it appears that the generals may have gone too far in masterminding an election which may well have sown the seeds for yet another revolution.

Before the campaign for a new President, Vice President and Senate started, the generals had planned their victory. Essentially, these preparations consisted of three parts: selection of candidates, official pressure on the peasants and a large military vote. Having accounted for each of these ingredients by Election Day, there was little need for the generals to manipulate the ballot box. It was simply a matter of marching out the horses on September 3 and pretending to the world that a democratic election was being held.

The selection of candidates was held in such a way that the most popular political figure in Vietnam, General Duong Van Minh, was eliminated from the race. "Big" Minh, in exile since last year, was the one person who could rally heavy Buddhist support and also cut into the large military vote. As such, he was a dangerous rival to Thieu and Ky. Consequently, the Armed Forces Council ruled, on grounds of "security," that he could not enter the country to campaign. When questioned about this, General Ky exploded in anger. "Minh better keep his mouth shut or we'll exile him forever," he said. Shortly afterward a docile Credentials Committee of the Constituent Assembly found a technical flaw in Minh's application and the one man who could have given the generals a real race was eliminated.

Another prominent candidate was eliminated because his platform did not conform sufficiently to present government policy concerning the war.

Au Troung Thanh, a Minister of Economics under the Ky government until he resigned in protest last year, also wished to be a candidate for President. Thanh had promised that if elected, he would seek an immediate cease-fire. Furthermore, he favored halting the bombing of North Vietnam in order to get negotiations started. This policy, Thanh said, reflected the true aspirations of the Vietnamese people.

It did not, however, reflect those of Ky and Thieu. Thanh's candidacy was thrown out on the grounds that he was a leftist and a Communist. When Premier Ky was asked why he had allowed Thanh in his cabinet as Minister of Economics if the man was a Communist, the General replied that he wanted to "keep an eye on him."

There were several other candidates eliminated from the race who protested in downtown Saigon. However, their appeals were in vain and the list was narrowed to ten civilians and the generals.

The ten civilians were mostly middle-class, French-educated politicians who posed little threat to the generals' candidacy. Only Dzu had much life, but he was practically unknown in Vietnam and had only a token organization.

Tran Van Huong, a former Prime Minister until he was overthrown, was thought to be the leading civilian candidate. However, his dull speeches and quiet manner failed to inspire much reaction despite the fact that he was relatively well known. Possessed of a dedicated band of young followers, Huong simply could not pull the kind of vote needed to overcome the bloc votes of the generals.

The third-place civilian, Phan Khac Suu, 62, is an old hand at Vietnamese politics. He had spent several years in both Diem's and Japanese prisons for his opposition to existing governments. As a candidate, he had the same trouble as the others developing a dynamic image among those who were not acquainted with him. Most of the candidates possessed dedicated followings; however, none had the kind of organization required to beat the combined power of the generals.

If the civilians had made the one sacrifice needed to defeat the Thieu-Ky ticket, the election would have been a different matter. There were rumors during the campaign that several of the front runners would drop out in favor of one candidate. Negotiations to this effect were held at several points during the monthlong campaign, but they could not agree on who should drop out. Consequently, the civilian candidates split the anti-government vote ten ways, allowing the Thieu-Ky ticket smooth sailing on Election Day.

With the opposition weakened and divided, the generals' second strategy was to rely on the influence of province, district and hamlet officials to deliver a fair share of the peasant vote.

The kind of pressure which a local official can exert upon the Vietnamese peasant cannot be underestimated. The recent history of rural Vietnam has taught the peasant farmer that respect and obedience to the local authority can spell the difference between life and death. Since the province, district and most hamlet chiefs have been appointed by the Saigon government, it takes little imagination to determine which ticket these officials were supporting. Most peasants, who neither knew the candidates nor had any conception of what the election was about, were easily susceptible to the subtle suggestions of their superiors.

This willingness to comply with government wishes was dramatically illustrated by the 83 per cent voter turnout in Vietnam. Americans who are accustomed to a 55 to 60 per cent turnout are usually surprised to find that so many people vote in Vietnam. The answer is simply that local officials make it known that they want the people at the polls on Election Day. Each voter's card is stamped after he votes. Many Vietnamese are convinced that if their cards are not stamped, they will be arrested. Consequently, they make a point of getting to the polls and, in many cases, of voting for the candidate suggested by the authorities.

The third element of the Thieu-Ky victory was reliance on a well-disciplined military vote. There are 5,953,251 registered voters in Vietnam. Of these, approximately 1 million are considered part of the military, according to figures released by the political section of the United States mission in Saigon.

Even assuming that Thieu and Ky did not get all the military votes (American officials conceded 70 per cent to them), they still had the election well under control before the voting started. Their nearest rival, Dzu, polled only 817,120 votes, which was just over the number of military ballots upon which the generals could rely. This military vote, plus those picked up by province officials, was augmented by several deals made with groups interested in the status quo. The Chinese in Cholon, many of whom are making fortunes because of the war, businessmen who cater to the Americans, and those who profit from widespread corruption, all threw their support to the generals. With this kind of backing it is surprising that the victors polled only 1,649,561 votes.

In fact, the final tally indicates that the mass of Vietnamese people do not approve of their new President and Vice President. Generals Thieu and Ky received only 34 per cent of the total vote, the rest being split among the remaining ten candidates. Had this anti-government vote not been divided, or if a run-off election were held, it is almost certain that a civilian President and Vice President would be elected.

Furthermore, there are more than 3 million potential voters in South Vietnam who live in Vietcong-controlled areas and are presumably sympathetic to the National Liberation Front. If this were added to the anti-government vote, it becomes clear that the 1.5 million votes or so won by the generals represents a small portion of the Vietnamese people.

Many of the defeated candidates feel that they have been cheated of a hard-earned victory through the power politics employed by the generals. Several, including Dzu, held a press conference four days after the election to protest the election results. These candidates have had years of experience in politics. Their followers, some of whom were members of the constituent assembly, are well acquainted with the mechanics of an underground movement. One candidate, Ha Thuc Ky, spent several years in solitary confinement during the Diem regime. Tough, astute and experienced, several of these candidates and their followers claim they are now faced with the choice of joining the National Liberation Front, which they despise, or starting an underground opposition movement aimed at toppling the generals.

The frustration of the defeated candidates, plus the bitterness of those Vietnamese who feel the elections were not meaningful, is precisely the kind of spark which is needed in order to kindle a new revolt in Vietnam.

Their despair is what the militant Buddhists have needed to rekindle the Struggle Movement so ruthlessly suppressed by the government last year. Thich Tri Quang, the shrewd monk who led several previous revolts, has been biding his time for just this opportunity. Already, rumors have started of a coalition between the Buddhists of the An Quang Pagoda in Saigon and the bitter civilian candidates.

Although the immediate results of the September 3 elections may have pleased those who favor a continuation of the war in Vietnam, it may well be that the generals have overplayed their hand in their sweep at the polls. By arranging so ingeniously for their continuation in power at the expense of the Vietnamese people, the new President and Vice President may have won a Pyrrhic victory which both they and their supporters may soon regret.

THE CHASTENING OF NASA

CARL DREHER

On October 4 the space age will be ten years old. The National Aeronautics and Space Administration, established about a year after Sputnik I by the Space Act of 1958, grew rapidly into a great federal empire, with 42,000 employees of its own and more than 400,000 people across the country working on the moon program alone. Only the Central Intelligence Agency surpassed it in status and immunities. NASA's notices in the printed and electronic press were almost uniformly laudatory. In the halls of Congress its request was law. If it did not get the money right away, it threw a tantrum and Congress came across.

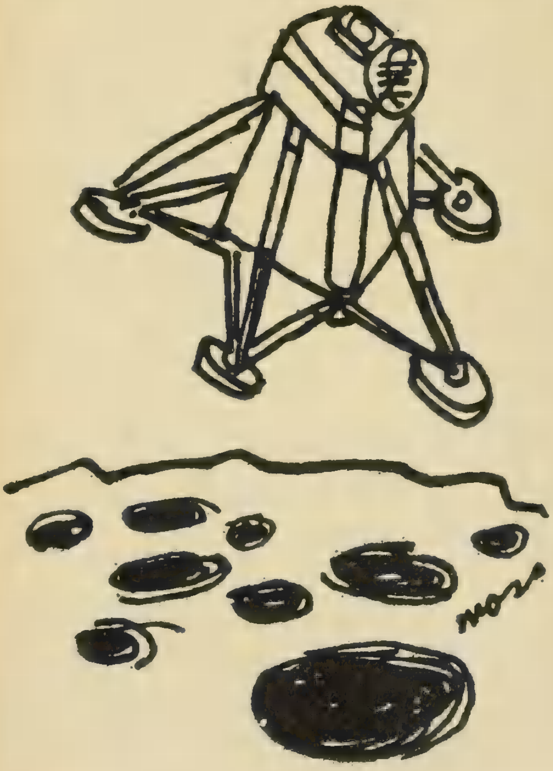
In its Mercury and Gemini flights, NASA and its contractors must be credited with some solid engineering and managerial achievements—and debited with errors which for a time were screened from public view. Then came the tragedy of January 27, 1967. Where previously NASA could do no wrong, after Grissom, White and Chaffee lay dead in their burned-out spacecraft, NASA and its prime Apollo contractor, North American Aviation, incurred the opprobrium reserved for fallen idols in the American success saga. They did indeed have much to answer for. Despite all their simulators and computers and "sophisticated" technology, they had designed Apollo with a pre-launch atmosphere of 16 pounds per square inch of pure oxygen and a hatch-opening time of not less than ninety seconds—a foreseeably lethal combination in the event of ignition of the abundance of flammable materials in the cabin. There could be arguments pro and con on many points, but what could not be disputed was that the Apollo in which the fire occurred was so full of defects that it should never have been tested with men inside.

The basic mistake, however, was the cold-war race for the moon which, despite pleas and warnings from disinterested observers, NASA had pressed from the outset and even today has not repudiated. President Kennedy's 1961 setting of a target date for the landing on the moon, "before the decade is out," was necessarily a political decision, both on his part and that of the Congress which authorized it and appropriated the initial funds. Kennedy inherited the problem of a bad international image of U.S. scientific capability which the Soviet accomplishment in space had created. If he continued the program at the leisurely pace of the Eisenhower administration (Clarence B. Randall, President Eisenhower's economic adviser, had referred to Sputnik as "that basketball in the sky"), the U.S. was certain to face a whole series of future Soviet firsts. Kennedy concluded that it would be self-defeating to continue a space effort that gave no promise of better returns than in the past. His choice was essentially either to pull out, hoping to find some other, socially more useful way of demonstrating U.S. technological prowess, or to accelerate the program to the point where our achievements would reflect our true capabilities vis-a-vis the Soviet Union.

Jerome B. Wiesner, President Kennedy's science adviser, weighed some very large development projects at home and overseas as alternatives to an accelerated space effort, but he and the President were unable to convince themselves that there was a really satisfactory substitute from the point of view of offsetting the damage done to the international reputation of U.S. science and technology. The President understood that the program could not be justified primarily on the basis of its scientific objectives and he never presented it in that light. The other problems he was facing at the time, including the aftermath of the Bay of Pigs, exacerbated the political problem and may very well have had some influence on the decision.

Once the die was cast, the 1970 goal was an effective political and morale-stimulating way of presenting the moon project to the country. But it was never contemplated that this objective, projected far ahead in time, under unforeseeable technical conditions, would determine future decisions affecting space missions and the lives of the astronauts delegated to carry them out. Yet NASA, no doubt guided subsequently by the wishes of the Johnson Administration, continued to adhere to the deadline laid down in 1961 and, in fact, pushed it forward: according to the industry press, in mid-January, 1967, they were shooting for August, 1968.

After the fire, NASA officials kept reassuring Congressional investigators and newsmen that the 1970 goal was still attainable. They have never stopped. James A. Webb, the head of the agency, set the pattern in April and has been dutifully echoed by his subordinates. As late as August 18, at a conference on bioastronautics at the Virginia Polytechnic Institute, a NASA official emphatically reaffirmed the December 31, 1969, deadline. It seems almost incredible that after the loss of a year as a result of redesign necessitated by the fire, the fact that neither the Saturn V booster nor the revamped Apollo has flown, and current reports of defective workmanship in wiring passing through pyrotechnic areas of the 017 Apollo scheduled for an early (unmanned) launching, NASA still clings to the deadline which, perhaps more than any other factor, got it into trouble.



There is reason to believe that behind the scenes the deadline is no longer taken literally and that NASA will not launch upcoming flights until hazards have been reduced as far as possible. Yet even the pretense that the race must continue, after the loss of three of our space fliers and at least one of the Russians', calls into question NASA's good faith and independence of political dictation. It also has practical consequences, such as making more difficult U.S.-Soviet cooperation in efforts to rescue astronauts stranded in earth orbit. The future course of Apollo will furnish further evidence of the extent to which NASA chastened is NASA improved; this should have a bearing on the proportion of the country's resources to be applied to post-Apollo activity, including the Apollo Applications Program (AAP).

The money to be spent, and the probable loss of life even if future flights are conducted with all possible prudence, must be weighed against the benefits to be expected. One certain return is public entertainment. Ironically, the sacrifice of the three fliers will greatly enhance the pulling power of the next manned flight for TV kicks and the interspersed advertising. The public knew that space flight was dangerous; how dangerous has now been demonstrated. The public does not wish to see astronauts killed any more than they wish to see auto-racing drivers killed, but without death lurking at the turns they would not go to the races. Thus Navy Capt. Walter Schirra and his crew will play to the biggest audience yet and their mission, now scheduled for mid-1968, will be the most suspenseful up to that time. In fact, even the forthcoming unmanned Apollo flights will whet the public appetite and get more attention than unmanned flights normally do.

AAP and manned planetary missions are in a different case. The principal entertainment feature will be a possible manned mission to Mars. The formidable difficulties of this project will be discussed later; in the present connection the point is that simulated and unmanned flights, with their low show-business potential, will extend over a period of perhaps ten years. If men do finally take off for Mars, the journey will be of such duration that the high spots—launch, rendezvous and coupling, and ascent; circumnavigation of the planet or the maneuvers of landing and departure; and the last stages of return to earth—will be separated by months, if not years, of uneventful and boring flight. From an entertainment standpoint, the project lacks an essential element—sustained pace.

However, titillating the public is only one feature of space flight. Intellectual values are also involved. Many intelligent people tend to disparage the technological expressions of intellect, but this aversion must be regarded as a selective form of anti-intellectualism. The diverse kinds of thought and invention necessary for space travel, the interdisciplinary links that must be forged before hardware can be manufactured and operational techniques developed, are as formidable as anything to be found in other forms of cultural achievement. Space travel provides information on the universe, and on man, which is unobtainable on earth. Important, also, is the fact that NASA financed "scientific investigation" to the extent of $560 million in fiscal 1967. Even if a considerable part of this is not basic science, NASA is sponsoring a major intellectual effort, though one particularly vulnerable from a budgetary standpoint. In a struggle for funds between science and non-science, it needs no gift of divination to predict the outcome.

Except for those who take the position that we do not need further technological progress, the promoters of AAP can make out a strong case for future space inventions useful on earth. The amazingly rapid achievement of communications via satellite certainly supports optimism in this area. Orbiting telescopes, earth-resource satellites for agricultural surveys and the like, satellites for weather forecasting, mapping, navigation, etc., are confidently to be expected. Until men had gone into space no one ever got a good look at the earth from a distance. In another phase, medical knowledge will almost certainly be derived from experience with subjects in closed ecological systems radically different from those of submerged nuclear submarines, while psychological data may be obtained from the behavior of men in "micro-society." It should be noted that most of this space research and development involves flight in low earth orbit, where the basic vehicular problems have been solved and the period of useful returns is at hand.

There is, of course, the other side of the coin. Both the U.S. Air Force and the Russians have been using surveillance satellites for some years. "Inspection" of intelligence-gathering spacecraft will surely follow, and this could lead to disabling action against spacecraft, manned and unmanned, engaged in activities virtuous in ourselves but nefarious in others. The Air Force's Manned Orbiting Laboratory (MOL) is nothing but a preparatory model of a combat-type spacecraft.

Combat in space, which is to be distinguished from bombs in orbit, is not the worst innovation that can be imagined. From any rational viewpoint, space, the remoter the better, is surely the preferred place for military activity. Unfortunately, for the present at least, combat in space is almost certain to be in addition to, rather than a substitute for, combat on earth. However, none of this is an argument against NASA. It is not what it pretends to be—a wholly civilian agency—but it does promote some useful civilian activities and should be encouraged to enlarge this phase of its operations. As it is, the Air Force gives signs of pushing NASA for space funds at the $5 billion annual level by the mid- or early 1970s.

The most immediately salable effect of space enterprise is that it provides employment for large numbers of workers, ranging from scientist-engineers down to the technicians who replenish the Coke machines. Here we must distinguish between what should be and what is and, barring revolutionary change, will continue to be. As American society is constituted, no end of things that should be done are not done, or are done badly, while some activities, such as sending a deputation to Mars, receive a higher priority than they deserve by humanistic standards. Nevertheless trivial, senseless or even harmful activities enable employment to keep up more or less with disemployment, one of the perennial hazards of our kind of technological culture. Space is doing its part in keeping the economy from sliding back into the 1930s; therefore space is good—and isn't it better, actually, than many occupations that we tolerate?

The following are more or less educated guesses on future space development. First, men will almost certainly land on the moon and return to earth, though the odds against completing the round trip will be against the early arrivals. Eventually, small colonies of astronomers and other specialists may serve limited tours of duty. From such societies we might get new knowledge and insights. This assumes that if combat occurs in cislunar space it will not spread to the moon, or that there will be intervals of peaceful or even cooperative exploration.

Large-scale colonization of the moon is not taken seriously even by space enthusiasts. Any place lacking an oxygen-bearing atmosphere is dubious on that ground alone for long-term residence. The antarctic regions, which do have oxygen and where thermal conditions are less severe (except for wind) than on the moon, and which are easily reached by aircraft, are still practically uninhabited.

I am far from certain that men will reach Mars and Venus, but the chances are fifty-fifty, or better, if we are willing to pay the price—about $100 billion for Mars alone. I have a more decided opinion about the outer planets. It is conceivable that men will not desire to go beyond the terrestrial planets even if development of nuclear propulsion should make such journeys feasible. The orbit of Jupiter, the nearest of the outer planets, is at a mean distance of about five astronomical units, i.e., about five times as far from the sun as the earth, or about 480 million miles as compared with 93 million. Because of its enormous mass (for a planet, but still less than a thousandth of the mass of the sun) and the resulting gravitational characteristics, a landing on Jupiter's surface (assuming that it has a solid surface) would be suicidal, aside from the time required to get there. Its satellites would seem more feasible for landing purposes, but it is hard to see why exploration should not be carried out by unmanned probes. One thing is certain: it would be cheaper, though by no means inexpensive. The cost of an unmanned probe to Mars, even, is at least $2.3 billion.

If I could return to earth in 2067 for a review of these prognostications, I would no doubt be amazed by many technological marvels unconceived by the most farsighted engineers of today. If I were told that men had not been able to reach the moon I would be astonished—and mortified. But if I learned that Mars had been reached, but that it had proved impractical or not worth while to go farther, I would not be much surprised.

Although Mars (hence also Venus) may be feasible objectives, this by no means is to say that the jump beyond the moon is a natural progression. One of the impressions that came out of the bioastronautics conference (the sixth of a valuable NASA-Virginia Polytechnic Institute series on various aspects of space flight) is that our preparation for the Mars mission is in a very early and primitive stage, and the difficulties that can be perceived, not to speak of the unexpected, make those of Apollo seem slight by comparison.

One set of difficulties centers about man himself; hence the pertinence of bioastronautics to missions of Mars magnitude. Such projects are known as 1,000-day missions. By some configurations it can be done in half that time, but the propulsive energy requirements are more within reason with the longer duration, and the re-entry speed less appalling. All these long-duration missions, however, present problems that will take a while to solve, if indeed they prove to be soluble.

By way of example, toxicologists are not sanguine about man's ability to withstand the build-up of initially minute quantities of contaminants in the spacecraft atmosphere. These microbiological poisons are virtually undetectable, but cumulatively they may have deleterious effects. The only way of finding out is ground-based simulation for periods as long as the actual mission. And unlike a long-duration earth-orbiting flight, which can be terminated if an astronaut is taken sick, serious illness on a 1,000-day mission would as likely as not be fatal to the astronaut involved and perhaps to his companions.

Dr. A. A. Thomas, director of the toxic hazards division of the biomedical laboratory at Wright-Patterson Air Force Base, reported that ninety-seven trace contaminants were identified in the course of a twenty-seven-day manned experiment in a space cabin simulator. Twenty-one of these were attributed to the crew, the rest came from the materials in the cabin. Carbon monoxide increased from 1 milligram to as much as 25 milligrams per cubic meter, and this was with everything working normally. Carbon monoxide production in even a small fire, or contaminants released in large volume from some otherwise minor malfunctioning of equipment, could be lethal. Sickness which has only nuisance significance on earth could be extremely dangerous in space: for instance, vomiting, with release of particulate matter, or diarrhea, could produce emergency conditions. Nor, just because men are known to thrive in an atmosphere of pure oxygen and under weightless conditions for periods of a week or two, is it safe to assume that there would be no harmful effects over periods of months or years. Equally unknown is the effect of long confinement in a closed environment on the body's immunological system.

Merely to touch on another problem: the daily intake requirement per astronaut is estimated at 15 pounds a day for food, oxygen and water. This amounts to 2.7 tons annually per man. Techniques for regeneration of water and oxygen are well advanced, but the food problem for missions of long duration is not a slight one. Closed-cycle food systems, such as obtaining proteins from bacteria acting on body wastes, or cultivation of algae, have many unresolved questions.

NASA's problems are technical and budgetary. Although ruthless cuts in the 1968 budget are unlikely, the debate in Congress had ominous overtones. One member of the Senate space committee was quoted as saying: "We didn't want to put NASA out of business, but we had to placate the cannibals who wanted to cut even more." The "cannibals" wanted an across-the-board cut of $1 billion, and next time around they may get it.

Aside from Apollo, which is sure of respectful treatment, military and earth-oriented applications will be in earth orbit and these are most likely to emerge at the head of the breadline. Most members of Congress have little use for projects that do not promise immediate pork-barrel benefits, or that cannot be connected with wars in progress or in prospect, or that will not show the United States to advantage, militarily or technologically, vis-a-vis a rival. Another difficulty is that while a number of Congressmen have developed considerable expertise on space programs, most members have little idea of what it is all about, especially in relation to scientific aspects. Consequently, even assuming the best of intentions, NASA's most valuable contributions are most likely to be manhandled—unless the scientific community can convince the Congress of the folly of such an order of priority.

Space has another technological-political aspect that has had little attention but which may play a major role in the future. Our current social pathology is that of a country which is dissipating its resources of materials, machinery and skilled manpower in a war the end of which is not in sight, and in preparation for bigger wars to come, specifically the one against Red China. No nation has ever had the capability to deploy military manpower on anything approaching the present American scale; with supreme irony, that power, which might have a stabilizing influence, is being used in precisely the way the founding fathers repudiated—America going abroad in search of monsters to destroy. Simultaneously, America is going out into space, and while this venture has its military aspect, it is a continuation of man's exploration of the universe and carries with it neither the moral nor the military peril of our invasion of Southeast Asia, which even many "hawks" now feel was ill advised at its inception.

Both that war and the journey into space impair our ability to find solutions for the deterioration of American cities, and specifically for the problem of Negro disaffection, but in very different degree. The space agency's current budget is at most one-sixth of the billions being squandered annually in Vietnam, and only about one-fifteenth of the total $70 billion defense budget—less when the final returns on Vietnam are in and $70 billion mounts to $75 billion or $80 billion — assuming the Chinese stay out. Moreover, if NASA were severely cut there is little prospect that its loss would be a gain for the slums. It is much more likely that the Air Force would pick up the pieces. On this and the grounds previously cited, it seems that cuts in NASA's funding should be opposed, even by those who otherwise would not regard a slowing down of space activity as a national calamity.

Suppose, however, that the war were to end. Then, and only then, could national attention, national understanding and national will be focused on the most pressing internal problems. In the meantime NASA and its contractors are menaced by the pressure for cuts—cuts anywhere, everywhere, except for the war raging in Southeast Asia.

These budgetary slashes, moderate at present but drastic in prospect, bring into the realm of practical politics the question The Nation raised editorially ("Vietnam vs. Space," May 23, 1966) namely, whether the long- and medium-term interests of space administrators and workers are not opposed to the interests of those employed in materiel manufacture (munitions, military aircraft, tanks, artillery, etc.). The potential conflict is obscured by the fact that in aerospace, particularly, these essentially disparate activities are carried on by divisions of the same corporations. But, once space begins to suffer from Vietnam, or from some future extension of this type of warfare, the conflict which exists but is not yet articulated may come to expression.

The Nation editorial emphasized that such a clash would involve far more than favored places at the public trough: "aside from jobs, careers and incomes, the space people have created a vast complex of new technologies to which they are passionately devoted . . . [they] foresee a great future for themselves and their children—provided their claim on a cut of the national resources is recognized and the holocaust that would end it all can be avoided. The Vietnamese War forecloses that claim, invites the holocaust, and is a disgrace to a nation with the professed ideals of the U.S. . . ."

What is this—wishful thinking, or prophecy? It could be the former now and the latter later, since it applies not only to Vietnam and the 1968 budget; besides, in the meantime, civil disorder has become a potent factor and is taking on an ever more menacing character. The policy of revolutionary violence of the black power movement, however self-defeating it may be for the moment, is not to be dismissed from a long-term international perspective. These revolutionists base their plans on the undeniable fact that most of the world's population is desperately poor, as is the American Negro "under class." Both groups are teased and tormented by their exposure through the news media to American middle-class affluence. The result may be a succession of Vietnams, paralleled by Negro guerrilla warfare and terrorism in the United States.

These not implausible upheavals may fall short of nuclear war and genocide, but they could bring in their train concentration camps and copious bloodshed, with an explosive generation of war psychoses in the United States, which so far has been in the fortunate position of fighting its modern wars on foreign soil. In such extremity the armed services will get everything they want if, indeed, they do not take over the direction of the government under the assumed conditions. But what will space get—nonmilitary space or anything else that is halfway humane, useful, civilized?

To sum up NASA's prospects beyond the moon landing: the technical problems for manned deep space flight are formidable, the solutions will be expensive, the immediate returns are becoming less attractive in Congressional eyes. An ominous domestic and foreign situation for which no solution is in sight is developing and, by every indication, will be reflected in pressure on NASA's budgets and the business fortunes of space contractors. The handwriting is on the wall. But—as yet—there is nothing fated or irreversible about the prospect. And the space people are in a favorable position in one important respect—in a relative sense, what is good for them is good for the country too, and in serving their own interests they can be helping to control the malign forces that threaten us all.

NEW POLITICS AT CHICAGO

RICHARD BLUMENTHAL

Mr. Blumenthal has been editorial chairman of The Harvard Crimson and a reporter for The Washington Post.

Chicago

"Pinch me, Ernest," said the white-haired little lady from Wisconsin Citizens for Peace, as she stared about her in bewilderment. "I can't believe its all real." Hanging above her from the gilded balconies of the Palmer House Grand Ballroom, the banners of the New Politics Convention proclaimed "A NEW POLITICS IN 1968 AND BEYOND"—"FULL LIBERATION OF THE BLACKS"—"DON'T MOURN, ORGANIZE." Under the twinkling chandeliers, speakers marched across the richly carpeted floor to denounce the materialistic corruption of liberalism and demand a radical, revolutionary, irreversible change in the decision-making process of society. Television lights cut through the heavy haze that filled the high-ceilinged room, forcing the radicals to squint or wear sun glasses as they railed against the establishment press. It was so bizarre—so much a melange of McLuhanesque gimmicks, visual shocks and identity crises — that one hard-nosed newspaper man summed it up as a "pop convention." As if to pinch himself, Simon Casady, co-chairman of the National Conference of New Politics, told reporters: "The atmosphere has got a touch of absurdity about it, I admit, but the politics is real politics."

Whether new politics or real politics, the affair was a great deal more significant than a mere happening. [See editorial, "No Hope?" p. 261.] This band of disparate liberals, peaceniks, radical community organizers, militant and moderate blacks, had come to Chicago to agree on a strategy—perhaps even a set of candidates—to defeat President Johnson and end the war in Vietnam. They soon became preoccupied with the psychological mechanics of keeping one another in one room and one movement. Their announced goal was to redistribute power in society, but they spoke almost entirely about the distribution of power within their own organization. And in the process of testing themselves—building what they eventually called "an alliance" between whites and blacks—they transformed their convention into a kind of 20th-century morality play on race relations. It was a play that did not challenge so much as it caricatured the one they attributed to the establishment.

The moving force in the drama was the black caucus—meeting continuously in secrecy, with shaven-headed bodyguards posted at the doors, shifting from one building and one room to another, staring fiercely at whites as they walked past them in the hallways, and taunting them as they solicited contributions for "our black brothers in the jails." Leaders of the convention knew only vaguely how many there were (estimates ranged from 200 to 600, though reporters never counted more than 180 entering a meeting room); the whites dealt with Carlos Russell, chosen by the blacks as leader through "African consensus" (none of the Negroes could remember ever having voted), a tall, articulate former anti-poverty worker from Brooklyn, whose charismatic speeches were flavored with the accent of his West Indian birthplace. Russell's band included African nationalists attired in African shirts and faletas; Northern ghetto militants wearing blue jeans and rimless tinted glasses, representatives from Rev. Martin Luther King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference in high-priced suits and ties, women from the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party in simple cotton dresses and young men from the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee in "black-power" T-shirts.

This caucus, playing on a cauldron of guilt, suppressed self-contempt, hatred and physical fear, brought the convention to its knees with two tests of sincerity—called "tests of the social barometer." In the first, presented during the opening plenary session, they demanded that the whites endorse—without amendment—thirteen principles in a black power resolution, including a condemnation of the "imperialist Zionist war" in the Middle East and all the statements of the Newark Black Power Conference. Then, after a taunting kick at participatory democracy by one of their leaders, James Forman of SNCC, they persuaded the convention to give them 50 per cent of the vote, a controlling share. Rarely did the blacks themselves speak for these demands; they preferred to leave the argument to white radicals and wait in the wings with their silent threat to withdraw. Not until the final session, in fact, did they all take their seats, then filing into the ballroom silently and glowering en masse. Though often bitterly divided among themselves, they refused to discuss or even reveal their differences to the rest of the convention.

Under pressure from the caucus, the 2,100 delegates debated the thirteen-principle black power resolution without once discussing the merits of the Newark pronouncements—few even knew what they were—or of the Israeli-Arab issue. They concentrated instead on their own responsibility for centuries of oppression, the failure of civil rights legislation, the hypocrisy of their fathers, brothers, etc. The ultimatum-threat would measure their personal commitment: "it is only fair of them," said Mike Eisenscher of the Milwaukee organizing committee, "to ask of us that we put up or shut up." "I don't agree with any of it," said a Maryland woman who asked not to be identified, "I just think we have to make some gesture." "I don't think what it says is important," said Donna Allen of the Washington Mobilization to End the War in Vietnam, as she raised her delegate card in favor of the principles. "If we accept them, we've got to accept this." Eric Mann, a Newark community organizer who has spent several years working in the ghetto, warned that they were "browbeating" themselves into a "patronizing, condescending and manipulating view of blacks." But the delegates voted by a 3 to 1 margin to approve the principles and give the blacks "sole power" to amend them. If this was in fact a black power resolution, only blacks should have the right to say what would be in it.

The dominating argument for the second test was less the guilt of the whites than their simple weakness and incompetence. The case for the 50 per cent demand was couched in terms of "an equal voice" for the Negro minority—an example for the rest of the world to follow. But the proposal would plainly give the blacks much more than an equal voice, since they would be voting as a bloc against the splintered whites. Such control was right, one speaker after another argued, because the white radicals had no power base or constituency outside the convention, whereas the blacks could summon up their 17 million "brothers" in the ghettos (counting out 3 million as Negroes, or "Toms"). The blacks were the movement. "We are just a little tail," said Bertram Garskoff of the Ann Arbor Citizens for Peace, "on the end of a very powerful black panther. And I want to be on that tail—if they'll let me." Once they surrendered power, Garskoff said, the whites must "trust the blacks the way you trust children. . . . Now I don't mean to say it like that because these are very sophisticated people and they've taught the whites in here a hell of a lot."

This challenge to power and manhood produced frightened yelps from many of the New Politics leaders. "One thousand liberals are trying to become good radicals and they think they can do it by castrating themselves," charged Arthur Waskow, a member of the steering committee. "The black caucus came in and gave us a set of demands which they intended to act as a social barometer of where the whites stand," said Peter Weiss, a member of the executive board. "And we answered: 'We haven't got the imagination to figure it out—we stand wherever you say.' That is not a relationship out of which anything healthy can come."

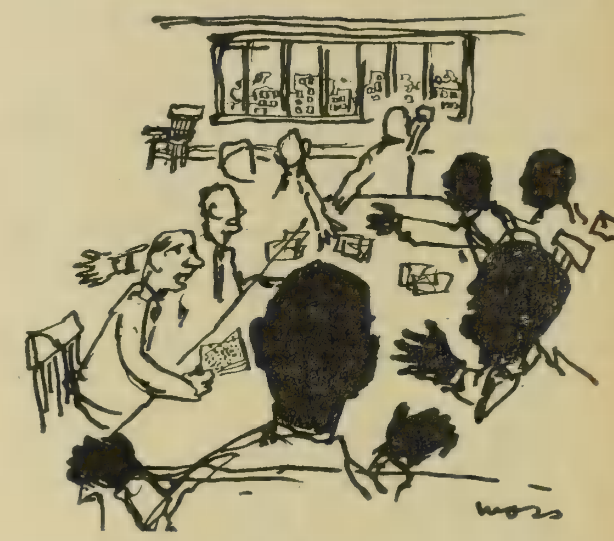
When the whites passed this final test—voting again 3 to 1 to give the blacks control—the blacks rewarded them with ostentatious kindness. The sound and fury of their accusations and demands gave way to the hushed voice of young Russell, speaking with his black brothers behind him in a press conference: "This is the first time in my life that blacks have worked with whites on an equal basis." The resonant bongo drums and black power chants and phonograph recordings of civil rights demonstrations—which had echoed through the convention hall for four days—were suddenly silenced. The blacks seemed to remove their fearsome bearded masks of hatred—smiling down on the whites, and not just through them. "We are for togetherness," said Russell.

Nevertheless, this business of "building trust," as it was called, left the white delegates curiously drained and dispirited—with little time or energy for the subject originally closest to most of their hearts: formulating a strategy for 1968 and "beyond." After a comparatively short debate, and several backstage compromises, the delegates approved a strategy resolution that ruled out a nation-wide Presidential peace ticket or party but encouraged groups in individual states to mount their own candidates and campaigns if they could muster sufficient financial and popular support. The strategy provided for a nominating convention to coordinate campaigns in different states, but it clearly emphasized sustained local organizing, aimed at a local redistribution of power, and convention leaders expected peace tickets in only about six or seven states. In effect, the strategy focused on the "beyond," rather than on 1968. It was thus a clear victory for the white community organizers who feared that a national campaign would detract from their efforts to build a revolutionary movement at the grass-roots level, "from the bottom up." It bitterly disappointed many of the delegates from moderate peace groups, who believed that with black support a nation-wide peace ticket might hold a sort of balance between the major parties in a 1968.

The blacks, moreover, for all their talk of alliance, refused to drop their anti-Israel principle from the black power resolution. This measure, many of the peace delegates felt, would be fatal to any candidate associated with the New Politics group. Rev. Martin Luther King himself sent a secret last-minute appeal through his aide, Jose Williams. Dr. Benjamin Spock, prominently mentioned as a King running mate, also expressed hope that the blacks might decide to significantly modify the statement. But the black caucus recommended only that the principle be changed to condemn the Israeli Government, instead of "imperialist Zionist war." Some of the New Politics organization's largest contributors, including Martin Peretz and his wife, indicated that they were through with the group.

Many of the blacks were equally uneasy—even unhappy—in the coalition produced by these tumultuous doings. They were not only contemptuous of the whites for the ease with which they capitulated but offended by what they regarded as a more subtle and pernicious form of paternalism. "I don't think they understood these demands at all," said Roy Ennis, leader of the Harlem Congress of Racial Equality. "This patronizing thing is just a new trick of keeping the natives happy. I think they feel, many of them, that they can co-opt or capture us—it's the same old desire of whites to use blacks." "Its just self-flagellation," remarked a national leader privately. Many wondered why they had chosen to ally with a white group that lacked both financial power and popular following. "I don't make alliances with someone weaker," said Ennis, "they would have to use our power base."

The black leaders had insisted, after all, that Negroes would no longer ally with whites out of love or brotherhood — only out of self-interest, and only when they were ready. "No one who has not suffered as we have," James Forman had told them, "has the right to dictate the forms of our struggle." "I don't believe black people are in a position to coalesce with anybody at this time and age," Floyd McKissick, national CORE leader, had said. "We have to build our own position." And McKissick had insisted: "No longer can black people be a plank in somebody else's platform." If the blacks commanded the crucial sources of power in the ghetto—through electoral politics, as well as uprisings — why should they tie the white radicals around their necks? Lost somewhere in the flush of victory were self-interest and self-determination.



And who were these radicals they had gained as allies? Were they strong, self-confident determined workers? No, admitted Paul Booth, an executive board member and long-time community organizer. "Most of them are just liberals trying to show they're different from their parents, or the people back home." Some in the group, like Booth, Todd Gitlin, Mike James, John Maher, Mann and others, were dedicated radicals, who have worked in the ghetto, organizing the poor to gain power against the establishment. But the vast majority were more like Peggy Brennan, a 42-year-old Nassau County mother of three, who got involved in politics seven years ago and is now running for county clerk on the United for Peace ticket. Her revolutionary program, she says, has no name: "When I married my husband seventeen years ago, I didn't have to give it a name or describe it. He knew my needs and I knew his—call it life." Or Robert Kealy, of Oconomowoc, Wis., who retired as a government attorney two years ago at the age of 49 to begin studying for a degree in comparative literature at the University of Wisconsin. "I always thought of myself as a liberal," says Kealy, a small, balding man. "I voted for the [black power] resolution because the blacks had a right to formulate their own position and not have it formulated by someone else." Or Frank Parker, a 26-year-old government attorney who graduated from Oberlin, Oxford University and Harvard Law School and who works part time for Concerned Citizens for Peace in Washington, D.C. "Don't get hung up on this word radical," he says, "it's what you do that counts."

Few of the committed community organizers had a developed or concrete program to offer the blacks. "Community organizing has become as American as cherry pie," Todd Gitlin told a Vietnam Summer caucus, "it's only a method; we need to give it some political content." The radical ideology, Booth admitted, was at best one of "bits and pieces." For all the heated and tedious discussions within the radical caucus, they were no more sure of that political content at the end than when they arrived.

The attempt to wring an alliance out of tests of sincerity and faith, divorced from tangible issues or interests, thus only increased distrust and doubt. By forcing the whites to take this kind of personal, soul-searching test, the conference in effect compelled them to gloss over important differences if not to falsify their real feelings on some of the issues. What the whites offered the blacks was contempt for the white middle class—springing from self-contempt—that affirmed something about the power of being black. But that self-contempt, as Robert Scheer, managing editor of Ramparts warned, would cut the whites off from their potential constituency—"our own parents, sisters, the kids on the block, the guys who hold down normal jobs." Until the radicals could "reach normal America," he said, "we're not going to develop a base and we're going to be useless."

The whole affair might be dismissed as a work of the theatre of the absurd—if it did not bear so striking a resemblance to what delegates to the National Student Association's Congress did only a few weeks before. This group of nice middle-class white liberals (they had no aversion to being placed in that category), acceded to demands from their own black caucus that they endorse a black power resolution without amendment. The resolution called for liberation of the blacks "by any means necessary"—a phrase which opponents argued would condone violence and which supporters preferred to leave ambiguous. But the issue for the blacks was not so much the content of the resolution as it was the test of faith. The whites first turned down the phrase, but reversed themselves after the blacks threatened to walk out.

In both instances, the blacks argued that whites should not be allowed to amend the resolutions because they would be altering a document written by blacks to "define themselves." "This is a statement of black power," argued Fred Patten, a student at California State College in Los Angeles attending the NSA congress. "They have been defining us for 300 years. If we allow them to change this, we allow them to define us again—just the way they will call us Negro instead of black." Neither whites nor blacks at these conventions realized that if these resolutions were in fact self-definitions, it would be meaningless, even dishonest, for whites to try to approve them and take them as their own. Whites, in effect, would be attempting to redefine themselves—a ludicrous, as well as humiliating task. If not allowed to amend the resolutions to express themselves, they would at best be patting the blacks on the head for a job well done, or co-opting them—both of which run directly counter to the spirit of the resolution.

The delegates at the New Politics convention thus adopted one of the aspects of the old politics to which they objected most strongly: the tendency of politicians to substitute vague statements of solidarity and love for coalitions for action based on real interests. In the old politics, at least, the statements were accepted as meaningless, but the honesty of the New Politics requires that they be taken literally. The New Politics delegates tried to bring more human warmth into political contention—"Make love more possible," as Carl Oglesby of Students for a Democratic Society would say—and at the same time make politics more real. But they shifted the focus of their strategy for a short-term immediate issue on which they were all united (ending the war in Vietnam) to a longer-range tactic on which their real interests differed very sharply (local organizing). This tactic was only a method of politicking—bereft of goals, program or interests that would give it political meaning. To paper over their differences and furnish some basis for unity, the convention leaders then had to turn to tests that were almost entirely emotional—centered on "the spirit of resolution," as Garskoff put it, rather than "the principle"—and equally unrelated to anybody's real interests. They appealed to "personal commitment," "true feeling" and "sincerity." Through their New Politics they attempted to apply on a mass level relationships of love and trust which they knew deep down could only be meaningful on an individual level.

The New Politics radicals feared being taken on their own terms—real interests—because they recognized very early what Roy Ennis later pointed out: "Why should I negotiate with the whites here? They've got nothing to deliver. I'd rather bargain with the power structure." Their convention demonstrated that a New Politics based on abstract tests of inner motive may be even more corrupting than the old politics—and ludicrous without power.

view, from the middle of the heap, was different from Mr. Chancellor's from the top, but since most of the policy disputes never reach the director's desk, his view from the top was not necessarily better than mine. . . .

VOA was, in many ways, a good place to work, one of the reasons being the courtesy and consideration of Mr. Chancellor and his colleagues at all levels. But there comes a time when some decide, for whatever reason, that it is time to leave. Some, like Mr. Chancellor, make that decision within a couple of years; others of us, often to our regret, take longer. But since Mr. Chancellor and I, from our different viewpoints of status and philosophy, both have the best interests of VOA in mind, perhaps this airing of our differences is useful.

Finally, I prefer the second of the two definitions my dictionary gives me for "fie": humorous pretence of being shocked. Richard J. Walton

BOOKS & THE ARTS

The New Novel, USA: Thomas Pynchon

ROBERT SKLAR

Mr. Sklar is the author of F. Scott Fitzgerald: The Last Laocoon (Oxford). He teaches at the University of Michigan.

We speak of writers as emerging, as if in our mind's eye the literary world were a stage and apprentice writers waited in the wings, or a sea where writers surface like submarines, or a world into which they are born from the womb of the muse. The stage, the surface sea, the world, belong to criticism and literary history; the wings, the depths, and the womb to sociology and the history of taste. Writers, in a different metaphor, make up an iceberg, with only a thin sharp edge showing in the open air, visible to the critics and the public unwilling to dive. But at the present moment no metaphor seems quite appropriate for the generation of American writers under 30. From this generation so far only one fiction writer, Thomas Pynchon, has emerged above the surface: and few could guess how vast or sturdy the iceberg is beneath him. This fact clashes so strongly both with historical precedent and with the contemporary experience of other art forms that it cannot help but illuminate the status and prospects of American fiction today.

From the 1890s on, every young American generation—until the present one—found its voice and proclaimed its special vision through the art of fiction. Of breakthroughs and new starts the sixties have seen many—but they have come from writers already past the age of 30, like Joseph Heller, Kurt Vonnegut, Jr., and John Barth. The children of the Great Depression have produced, astonishingly, almost no visible literature, nor have their younger brothers and sisters born during the Second World War. Graduate fellowships may have stolen the energies of young writers, the hippie ethic may have immobilized them, or activism pulled them out into a different world. Perhaps they may come back from these diversions, like Conrads from the sea, to write mature and worldly novels.

The fact remains that young people read fiction but, on the whole, they do not write it. They do write poetry. They write songs and sing them. They paint, they sculpt, they play instruments, make films, dance, design happenings. Young people have made a considerable contribution, here and there a major contribution, to all the arts except the art of fiction. If fiction has not completely lost its relevance as an art form to creative young people, then it languishes in a period of biding time; since fiction is tied more closely to events and ideas than other arts, perhaps it stands in a fallow period, assimilating new configurations, as happened in the mid-19th century after Darwin and the early 20th after Freud. In this perspective, Thomas Pynchon is far more than, dutifully recognized, the only known and therefore leading writer of the under-30s; for more than any other contemporary American novelist he has succeeded, in two interesting, intelligent and serious novels, in absorbing and transforming new scientific and philosophical perspectives within his art.

Pynchon was born in 1937 and attended Cornell University, where as an undergraduate he published his first story, "Mortality and Mercy in Vienna," in Epoch. Soon after leaving Cornell he published three short stories—"Under the Rose," in Noble Savage #3; "Entropy," in The Kenyon Review, and "Low-lands" in New World Writing #16—which earned him an immediate reputation among the narrow but intense circle of short-story readers. His novel V. won the Faulkner prize as the best first novel of its year, 1963. His second novel, The Crying of Lot 49, published last year and received with far less warmth from reviewers and readers of fiction, won as compensation an award given annually to a meritorious novel that criticism and commerce have unjustly slighted.

Besides the novels he has published in the past five years only one story, "The Secret Integration," in The Saturday Evening Post, and a magazine essay on Los Angeles in The New York Times Magazine. The critical point in Pynchon's career so far lies in the radical shift in literary focus he undertook to make from V. to The Crying of Lot 49. To say that the second novel is a better and more important novel than the first is not simply a way of scoring an easy victory over dull reviewers or doggedly insisting on a principle of growth. To grasp the nature of Pynchon's shift, for its artistic and intellectual value, and as a liberating gesture in its own right, is to take the measure of his wider significance for contemporary American fiction.

> In this and subsequent issues, a group of mainly younger critics will attempt to define and evaluate the form and direction being taken by contemporary American fiction. Our critics will include Charles Thomas Samuels discussing Norman Mailer; Stephen Koch on Susan Sontag; Shaun O'Connell on the fictional side of William Styron's new novel (based on the life of Nat Turner), and Herbert Aptheker on the historical side; and Leonard Kriegel on the effectiveness of current Vietnam war novels, among others. Mr. Sklar's essay on Thomas Pynchon is the first in the series.

As a liberating gesture, Pynchon's shift from V. to The Crying of Lot 49 broke him free from the constricting limitations of belonging to a "school" and writing in a genre. One reason the second novel proved disappointing to some admirers of the first, in fact, was its failure to fulfill the stereotyped expectations they had held for him. Yet even if V. wears a "black-humor" label, and stands as one of the most intricate and elaborate novels in that genre, it accomplishes a good deal more than that. One who rereads V. in the light of The Crying of Lot 49 may come to feel that V. is itself a liberating gesture, a gesture of liberation from nearly all the styles and forms of fiction that have preceded it.

As Catch-22 may be the first American novel truly to have attained a Cubist form in its treatment of space and time, so V. may be the first American novel of collage, an abstract composition put together with parodies of spy novels, political novels, adventure novels, decadent novels, romances, utopias and whatever other category the ingenious mind can find. V. may be doomed to the fate that befell Finnegans Wake, as Edmund Wilson described it, to go directly from the pen of the author into the hands of the schoolmasters. This is not the place to begin the task of critical dissection to which V. is foreordained; but when that job is done the attentive explicator will find that one of the principal subjects of parody in V. is the "black-humor" style itself.

Read in the light of The Crying of Lot 49, then, V. does not appear as a launching platform for a style or a subject but rather as an isolated object or as an ending. That novel published in 1963 seems in 1967 not so much a contemporary work as a historical work, a novel that reflects the moods of the late fifties in America and the style of the early sixties. Part of this feeling, if it is an accurate one, may be attributed to a stylistic trait of the novel common to many works in the "black-humor" genre, a style deliberately constructed to put a distance between the reader and the work, as if the novel were a game drawing on the reader's mental faculties but deliberately excluding his emotions.

The natural reaction to this sort of reading experience is to feel admiration for the author, for his ingenuity or his imagination or his nihilism or his guts, and feel almost nothing for the novel itself. In contrast the reader, for example, of The Sound and the Fury invests his primary feelings into the matter of the work itself, and responds to the skill of the author only secondarily, as a deliberated afterthought. V. is like a riddle that once correctly answered never taxes the mind again; The Crying of Lot 49 is founded in an emotion of mystery, an emotion which remains, inviolate and mysterious, even when the outward mystery is solved. V. is a complex novel that gets simpler with each rereading, The Crying of Lot 49 a simple novel that reread grows more complex.

V. is chiefly memorable for what its earlier admirers called its vast warehouses of information, its immense knowledgeability, its prodigies of research. If one function of the novel, as Mary McCarthy once suggested, has been to provide facts, to let the reader know how to catch a whale or cut a field of hay, Pynchon's V. may rank as one of the most encyclopedic founts of facts in the history of the novel. In V. the reader may find out how to perform a nose operation; how the Germans wiped out the native population of South West Africa before the First World War; how British espionage agents operated in the Middle East since the time of Kitchener; a good part of the history of Malta in this century, and much more. How much one may care to rely on Pynchon's facts is another matter; this reader, at least, has not yet taken the trouble to verify Pynchon's account of Wilhelmian Germany's African policies or of Maltese political life; and given Pynchon's propensity to parody the fictional styles which have conveyed this sort of subject in the past, it might be wise not to make any bets on the basis of what one reads in V. In any case the truth of Pynchon's details, or even their significance, is not a matter that deeply engages the reader's concern.

Form and style in The Crying of Lot 49 combine to give a far greater resonance to facts, but a much more striking comparison can be made between Pynchon's very good short story, "Under the Rose," and the chapter of V. into which that story later was transformed. "Under the Rose" is a poignant story of a few days in the life of a British spy in the Middle East, ending with his death. The story is far from simple, but it is tightly controlled, and the effect is tragicomic, an exceptionally fine fusion of emotional depth and historical breadth; more than anything else Pynchon has written, "Under the Rose" justifies the claims of some critics who link him to the tradition of Nathanael West. In the novel the focus is fragmented among eight different narrative voices, and the culmination of the action is deliberately shrouded in mystery. Pynchon obviously was reshaping the material to fit the larger thematic purposes of the novel, but undeniably the narrative form diffuses the reader's attention and ultimately his concern for the characters and their fate.

Nevertheless, Pynchon has created in V. an aura of formidable intellectual competence, and nowhere more significantly than in his mastery of scientific and technical subjects, particularly physics and electronic technology. It may be that no American novelist before Pynchon—science-fiction writers not excepted—has brought so thorough and so prepared a scientific intelligence to bear on modern life, and this capacity to include in the novel the pervasive scientific and technological aspects of our day-to-day lives rather than to neglect them through ignorance, may make V. a landmark of the novel in yet another sense.

It is true, though, that Pynchon dissipates this competence by expending it on a theme beloved of science-fiction writers and their cousins among black humorists, the battle between men and machines, between the power of animation and the power of the inanimate. Perhaps the struggle of humans against the inanimate which pervades V. is one more aspect of Pynchon's satire, almost a self-parody of a black-humor thematic stock in trade. On a different level it is an aspect of Pynchon's even more pervasive concern with dualisms, with worlds and anti-worlds and worlds within worlds. At the heart of Pynchon's imagination lies not science and technology, nor the parody and wild humor which are so much a part of his style but a sense of mystery, a vision of fantasy, that expresses itself in dualisms, in images of surface and depth, of mirrors, of secret societies and hidden worlds.

The prime mystery of V., of course, is the mystery of V. herself, as a woman in many guises—Victoria Wren, Hedwig Vogelsang, Veronica Manganese, a mysterious woman in Paris, the Bad Priest killed in Malta—as a bald cipher that is charged with greater resonance with every repetition, until the eye responds to every capital letter V as if it were inked in red: Veronica the rat, Vheissu the fantasy land beyond the deserts and the mountains, Venezuela, the V-Note jazz club, Valletta, the capital of Malta, and the Vatican, Voce del Popolo, Birth of Venus, Ponte Vecchio, Via Cavour, Queen Victoria. Who is V.? The British espionage agent, Sidney Stencil, one of her lovers, in 1899 had written in his journal: "There is more behind and inside V. than any of us had suspected. Not who, but what: what is she? God grant that I may never be called upon to write the answer, either here or in any official report."

Pynchon, however, does feel called upon to write the answer, and he raises few mysteries in V. for which he does not quite openly and obviously provide the solution. But to answer who she is in her many masks is not to answer Sidney Stencil's question, what she is, and that question Pynchon leaves to his exegetes. It is true that a Freudian or a Jungian explication would serve the book quite comfortably, though Pynchon has dropped his broadest hints in the service of a historico-philosophical interpretation. One of the principal changes Pynchon made in revising "Under the Rose" for the novel, curiously, was rigorously to eliminate the word "apocalypse" each of the many times it appeared in the short story. Yet he still tosses "apocalypse" around so much in V. that its face is rubbed smooth, and one can barely make out its features.

The reverberations of that word, however, lead the attentive reader inexorably toward a historical interpretation for the novel, an interpretation that may encompass a meaning for 20th-century history — history since that portentous day in "Under the Rose" when Kitchener and Marchand collided at Fashoda—and one that must come to terms with the revolutionary stances which Pynchon so noticeably adopts. All the answers to the puzzles of V., and all the possible interpretations of its meaning and significance will one day be given to us in the scholarly studies for which V. seems almost to have been made; one leaves them here in a half-completed form because their true completion may be found, not in an explication of V. but in Pynchon's second novel, The Crying of Lot 49.

Pynchon's radical shift in literary focus from V. to The Crying of Lot 49 took the shape not of new themes and images but rather changes in form and tone that significantly altered the value of old themes and images. His verbal playfulness, puns and jokes are reduced in quantity rather than intensity, and are made to serve the movement of the novel. Factual materials remain as important to the second novel as to the first, but where in V. the facts seemed to have been real but not necessarily true, Pynchon quite obviously invented the "historical facts" in The Crying of Lot 49 for the purpose of the novel and thereby made them more plausible, artistically more true. The form of V., moreover, exaggerated the sense of mystery and the aura of an exotic unknown, though Pynchon too often broke in and disengaged the mystery by providing explanations. In The Crying of Lot 49, the form of the novel centers on the normal and the everyday: strange events are explained earnestly and straightforwardly, yet the aura of mystery obstinately grows. And finally, whatever sense of mystery remained in V. was focused and contained by the past, where in The Crying of Lot 49 the feeling of mystery that will not down comes inexorably to rest in the present and the future.

The Crying of Lot 49 is the story of how Mrs. Oedipa Maas discovers a world within her world, an anti-world, an adversary world—or invents one in her imagination. She has been named co-executor for the estate of a California financier named Pierce Inverarity, with whom, before her marriage, she had had a brief affair. In Mexico City with Pierce she had seen a painting that had made her cry: a painting of frail girls held prisoner in a circular tower, that made her recognize that she too was imprisoned in a tower, "that what really keeps her where she is is magic, anonymous and malignant, visited on her from outside and for no reason at all."

When the novel opens Oedipa is already primed to find a new magic to deliver her from the malignant magic that has her in its spell. Driving into the Southern California suburb where Pierce had lived, she looks down on the neat pattern of uniform houses and thinks of a time when she looked at a printed circuit inside a transistor radio —"there were to both outward patterns a hieroglyphic sense of concealed meaning, of an intent to communicate. There'd seemed no limit to what the printed circuit could have told her (if she had tried to find out); so in her first minute of San Narciso, a revelation also trembled just past the threshold of her understanding. Smog hung all round the horizon, the sun on the bright beige countryside was painful; she and the Chevy seemed parked at the center of an odd religious instant." Shall I project a world? Oedipa writes later in her notebook. Oedipa comes upon her new magic—to adopt language which Pynchon's reference to religion validates —in an immanent world which gradually becomes more and more imminent.

The adversary world reveals itself to Oedipa through the symbol of a muted post horn and also by signs bearing the initials WASTE or w.a.s.t.e. These signs and symbols represent an underground postal system which operates parallel to or in direct subversion (through forged stamps and cancellations) of the U.S. Post Office. Oedipa pursues the long history of this secret system through investigations into the arcane byways of bibliography—a good part of the novel centers on the performance of a mock Jacobean revenge play, The Courier's Tragedy, and the tracing of its various texts and editions—and philately, giving Pynchon an opportunity to display his intellectual ingenuity in two fields he neglected to cover in V.

But the backbone of Pynchon's intellectual structure in The Crying of Lot 49 as in V. is science, and in the second novel he develops a scientific metaphor far more rich and more original than the animate-inanimate dichotomy he borrowed or parodied in V. As with V., Pynchon set down the new theme even more precisely in a preliminary short story, "Entropy," of which, however, only the theme carried over to the novel. In physics the term entropy applies to the second law of thermodynamics. It describes loss of energy, or the amount of energy unavailable for use in a thermodynamic system. Henry Adams borrowed this idea for his essay, "The Rule of Phase Applied to History," in which he calculated the running down of intellectual energy on earth — Thought would reach the limits of its possibilities, he postulated, in the year 1921.

Henry Adams' concept of entropy lies at the core of Pynchon's story of that title, but the concept of entropy most important for The Crying of Lot 49 derives from communications and information theory, particularly as that term was discussed by the mathematician Norbert Wiener. In The Human Use of Human Beings and in Cybernetics, Wiener argued against the pessimism which the second law of thermodynamics had engendered in Henry Adams and others. He agreed that the universe's energy would surely run down some day, but at a given moment in a given part of the system there were forces powerful enough to decrease entropy, to increase the amount of available energy in that part. "We may well regard living organisms," Wiener wrote, "such as Man himself, in this light." In The Crying of Lot 49 Pynchon takes up not only the scientific significance of Wiener's viewpoint but its obvious social and political significance as well. The w.a.s.t.e. system puts to use moral and human energies that the surface system—the United States Government and the dominant American mode of life, as Pynchon makes explicit—lets go to waste.

The Crying of Lot 49 is a radical political novel. Where in V. and in "Under the Rose" Pynchon tossed out an idea of political apocalypse with bravado and as if to scare the liberals, in The Crying of Lot 49 he never uses the word "apocalypse" but rather builds a concept and a structure of revolution right into the form of the novel. Unexpectedly Oedipa runs across a Mexican anarchist she and Pierce had once argued with in Mexico. The anarchist says to her:

> You know what a miracle is. Not what Bakunin said. But another world's intrusion into this one. Most of the time we coexist peacefully, but when we do touch there's cataclysm. Like the church we hate, anarchists also believe in another world. Where revolutions break out spontaneous and leaderless, and the soul's talent for consensus allows the masses to work together without effort, automatic as the body itself. And yet, sena, if any of it should ever really happen that perfectly, I would also have to cry miracle. An anarchist miracle.

The Crying of Lot 49, too, in this sense, is an anarchist miracle, a novel which not only postulates another world but creates with the truth of art another world's intrusion into this one.

It is perhaps idle to talk of an American tradition in the novel, but one of the unmistakable virtues of The Crying of Lot 49 is its success in making new and contemporary a traditional concern of the great American novelists—the creation, through the style and form of their fiction, of a social system more true to their national ideals than the existing political and social system. The Crying of Lot 49 ends with Oedipa Maas awaiting the auctioning of the lot of postage stamps which will prove whether the muted post horn symbol and the w.a.s.t.e. signs form only a web to snare her paranoia or, in truth, the communication network of another world.

For all his philosophical and scientific competence, for all his revolutionary political inclinations, Pynchon is above all an artist; and the ending of The Crying of Lot 49 makes clear what the Argentine Jorge Luis Borges meant when he wrote in an essay, "that imminence of a revelation that is not yet produced is, perhaps, the aesthetic reality." One would like to say of The Crying of Lot 49 what T. S. Eliot said of The Great Gatsby, that it represents the first step forward for American fiction in some time; for if the road ahead for fiction lies in the direction Borges in his stories has pointed, toward greater philosophical and metaphysical sophistication, Pynchon surely ranks as the most intelligent, most audacious and most accomplished American novelist writing today.

Dorothy Richardson in Limbo

PILGRIMAGE. By Dorothy M. Richardson. Alfred A. Knopf. 2,110 pp. $30.

DOROTHY RICHARDSON: An Adventure in Self-Discovery. By Horace Gregory. Holt, Rinehart & Winston. 114 pp. $4.95.

RICHARD FREEDMAN

Mr. Freedman teaches at Simmons College and the Harvard Extension. He has written for The Kenyon Review, Book Week and Saturday Review.

A decade after her death, the reputation of Dorothy Richardson remains an equivocal one. Frequently cited in textbooks on the novel as one of the originators and finest practitioners of the stream-of-consciousness method, Dorothy Richardson has been bracketed with such 20th-century giants as Proust, Joyce and Virginia Woolf. What she has lacked has been readers.

Pilgrimage was originally published in twelve installments beginning in 1915 and reaching semi-completion in the ominous year 1938, when few readers had the equanimity to plow through its more than 2,000 pages. The new edition appends a previously unpublished final section, "March Moonlight," found among the author's papers at her death.

To her first readers Dorothy Richardson must have seemed willfully eccentric and avant-garde, especially in her avoidance of "plot." A half-century later she appears doomed to occupy the limbo of the Historically Important. Today her long work reads like a hyper-inflated Edwardian Bildungsroman, the kind of novel that painfully details each faltering step in its hero's intellectual, emotional and spiritual development. It is no accident that in her Foreword, Dorothy Richardson pays tribute to Goethe's Wilhelm Meister, the first real Bildungsroman, and to Arnold Bennett, whose Clayhanger is the best example of the genre in her own period. Still another Edwardian, H. G. Wells, encouraged her to write, had a brief affair with her, and appears as a major character, Hypo Wilson, in the novel. Profoundly influenced, too, by Charlotte Brontë's Villette, Dorothy Richardson turned her eyes at least as much to the literary past as to the future.

The major pleasure Pilgrimage affords now is as a period piece, both in its subject matter and its technique. The years 1890-1915 are richly evoked in all the material detail for which Virginia Woolf took the Edwardian novelists to task in "Mr. Bennett and Mrs. Brown." As a chronicler of those years, always through the myopic but piercing eyes of her heroine, Miriam Henderson, Dorothy Richardson is unsurpassed. The emotions of a well-brought-up girl on smoking her first cigarette, the suffragette movement, radical talk in Soho cafés, English schoolgirls in Germany, all saturate the novel in the flavor of the time.

But the great novelists with whom Dorothy Richardson is so often compared have more going for them than this. Where Pilgrimage fails in comparison to Joyce's Portrait of the Artist, Proust's Remembrance of Things Past or Virginia Woolf's To the Lighthouse is in the inadequacy of Miriam Henderson as the focal figure for such an inordinate weight of analysis of emotion. Where Joyce's Stephen Dedalus has a "dewy wet soul," Miriam's is merely damp.

If one is going to write a work about oneself as long as Pilgrimage, it helps to have the verbal wizardry and the sense of humor of a Joyce or a Proust. Dorothy Richardson's language is pedestrian, and she is totally humorless in her dogged pursuit of the "important ideas" of her time. This is a severe limitation because the ideas she considered so important are now vieux jeu indeed, while, paradoxically, Proust's dilettante dabbling with the petite madeleine will resonate forever.

Dorothy Richardson herself mentions Proust in her Foreword as someone who, like her, was "producing an unprecedentedly profound and opulent reconstruction of experience focused from within the mind of a single individual." But she is chary of the term "stream of consciousness," which was first applied to her work by a fellow novelist, May Sinclair. More accurately, Pilgrimage is an omniscient narrative with a rigorously restricted point of view, in the manner of James, but lacking his high intelligence and moral sensitivity.

Pilgrimage differs, too, from such stream-of-consciousness novels as Virginia Woolf's Mrs. Dalloway and To the Lighthouse in the way in which it renders material detail. We see the London of Mrs. Dalloway exclusively as it impinges on the consciousness of Clarissa and other major figures in the book. The material settings of Pilgrimage remain independent of Miriam's perception of them. They are externalized in a conventionally Edwardian way, and occupy at least as much space in the novel as Miriam's mind does.

Horace Gregory's essay, beefed up to book length by the inclusion of long, not very relevant quotations and even less relevant digressions on Byron, Shelley and Violet Hunt, is hardly the magic "key to the author and achievement of Pilgrimage" that its jacket proclaims it to be. Having read Dorothy Richardson's letters (as extensive, he tells us, as her novel!), Gregory has come to the conclusion that Pilgrimage "is closer to the art of autobiography than to fiction," and is, in fact, "an extended memoir."

Mr. Gregory then glibly refers throughout his book to "Dorothy-Miriam" or to "Hypo-Wells." Wells himself called Pilgrimage "a very curious experiment in autobiography." Part of its curiousness must be a fictional element sufficiently strong to preclude so easy an identification between author and heroine: and surely Walter Allen is correct when he says, in his brief but sensible introduction to the novel, that "there is still a world of difference between autobiography and an autobiographical novel, and we have no more right to see Dorothy Richardson and Miriam Henderson as interchangeable and synonymous than we have Joyce and Stephen Dedalus or Lawrence and Paul Morel."

By making precisely such an unsophisticated—and undocumented—identification his shaky major premise, Gregory is able to construct a narrative which takes us through the novel, keying major episodes to Dorothy Richardson's life.

Dorothy Richardson seems to have been goaded into writing in the first place by a childhood which was quiet on the surface, but which seethed, in a characteristically Victorian way, with the usual sexual turmoil exacerbated by a stygian, pre-Freudian ignorance. Her mother stabbed herself to death with a kitchen knife when Dorothy was 22, an event which filled the author with personal guilt only partly expunged in the last section of her novel.

Her father's betrayal of her was even more grotesque. A grocer by birth, a gentleman by volition, and a failure at both, Charles Richardson determined that he wanted a son after having been presented with two daughters. Undismayed by reality, he "dealt with his disappointment by making her a favorite daughter and calling her 'my son' " throughout his life. Small wonder that Pilgrimage teems with Lesbian episodes, and that in it, the wrongs perpetrated by men on women loom disproportionately large.

Charles Richardson's follies were financial as well, necessitating Dorothy's getting a job as quasi-governess in a German school (the material for "Pointed Roofs," the first section of the novel), and later, as secretary to a London dentist. Gregory's account, thin as it is, of her struggles to keep financially afloat without compromising her art, is harrowing. Encumbered with a chronically ill and unsuccessful artist, Alan Odle, whom she married in 1917, she found herself translating mediocre French and German books, and even writing for The Dental Record.

Such heroism demands our respect. One only wishes that the novel it produced were as triumphant a vindication of the sacrifices endured while writing it as, in all fairness, it should have been. But Pilgrimage remains a curious monstrosity, an eccentric offshoot in the history of fiction, rather than a legitimate masterpiece.

The Mind of the Exile

FERDYDURKE. By Witold Gombrowicz. Translated by Eric Mosbacher. 272 pp. $5.

PORNOGRAFIA. By Witold Gombrowicz. Translated by Alastair Hamilton. 191 pp. $5. (Both Grove Press.)

PAUL ZWEIG

Mr. Zweig is a poet who teaches at Columbia University.

Witold Gombrowicz is an exile. He is a man who has been left out, and who has left himself out. For almost thirty years, the circumstances of war and politics have kept him from his native Poland. And yet there is a more permanent exile embedded in his character: a rootlessness and brittle resonance marking the sensibility and style of his novels.

Gombrowicz's first novel, Ferdydurke, was published in Poland before the war, and was very well received. Soon after, however, he left Europe, fleeing not only the war which already threatened but also, it would seem, the burden of his own recognition. He settled in Argentina where he lived, entirely unknown, for more than twenty years.

Ferdydurke, however, continued to lead an underground existence in Poland. Although it was never republished, copies of the book circulated among Polish intellectuals after the war. Expressions from its rich bestiary of human behavior became part of the language. When the events of 1956 brought about a brief cultural thaw, it is not surprising that one of the first acts of the new intelligentsia was to re-issue Ferdydurke. Again it was a great success. Too great. For the government, soon after, withdrew the book from circulation. Its humor was too well suited to the rebellious mood of the Polish intellectuals.

This time, however, the novel was noticed abroad, particularly in France, where Ferdydurke and a new novel, Pornografia, were quickly translated. Gombrowicz's popularity in France was, and remains, enormous. His play, The Marriage, was produced several years ago, and is still talked about. His Journal, short stories (Bakakai), new novel (Cosmos) and other writings, have all been translated into French. The two novels issued last spring by Grove Press mark the first step in the announced publication of Gombrowicz's complete works in English.

are separated by more than twenty years, they form together an appropriate entry into the world of Gombrowicz's imagination. Both explore the precarious tyranny of the "adult": the tyranny of "man" over "boy," of style and form over the "green" shapelessness, the beauty and "inferiority" of youth.

This is the theme to which Gombrowicz returns again and again, as if he needed to resolve its fascination anew each time he wrote. Man is in love with his own "inferiority." He distrusts what he has become: a face, a moral whole, and loves only what he despises: his youth, the corrosive "unseriousness" of "the boy," "the girl." In the preface to Pornografia, Gombrowicz quotes a passage from his Journal: "Youth seemed to me the highest value of life . . . but this 'value' has a peculiarity undoubtedly invented by the devil himself: being youth it is below the level of all values."

This is the moral dilemma upon which both novels turn. It is appropriate to have abstracted the "idea" from its dramatic context in the novels, for Gombrowicz, at his most intense, at his most grotesque, remains a man of ideas. The novels are immersed in a thickness of reflection, a peculiar electricity which is, at times, more convincing than the characters themselves.

Neither Ferdydurke or Pornografia are wholly successful as novels. Gombrowicz's gift for characterization flows out of the terrible urgency of his "idea." As a result, there is often a curious rigidity, a lack of dramatic wholeness, especially in the first half of Pornografia. Events are grossly manipulated, their "meaning" overpowers them. Yet Gombrowicz's very persistence becomes fascinating. The reader finds it hard to resist his perverse concern with youth, and its terrible "unseriousness."

Of the two novels, Ferdydurke is undoubtedly the more successful. Because it is frankly satirical, Gombrowicz is freed from the need to embrace his characters too closely. The novel generates a mood of grotesque humor in which the characters move flatly, almost jerkily, like surrealist marionettes. The narrator of the story is a young man in his early 30s who suddenly finds that he has been made captive of his own "immaturity." An inspector of schools, by the name of Pimko, the essence of fat, ridiculous adulthood, has taken him in hand. He is abducted by the hypnotic Pimko, who leads him to the local high school, and inscribes him in the proper class as a boy of 17. The school is a vast model of "maturity," a hierarchy of forms, styles, orthodoxies, which is wildly ridiculous and yet inescapable. It becomes a grotesque symbol of all conformist "adulthoods." And its self-defeating purpose is to manufacture "immaturity," inferiority. The dead forms of Patriotism, the "Ideal," Fatherhood, Motherhood, are wielded by worm-eaten professors, so as to fabricate childishness, irresponsibility, and therefore, paradoxically, the corruption of the forms themselves.

There is a grotesque episode in which two schoolboys, Mientus and Siphon, agree to the most terrible battle of all: a duel of grimaces. In order to defeat the tyranny of face, they will take their faces in their hands, and hurl them at each other. "Some of us trembled at the throught of Mientus bringing out into broad daylight the dreadful weapon which no one had yet dared to use, except after taking precautions to ensure solitude and secrecy. Mientus was proposing to do in public what we had never dared to do, except alone in front of a mirror when nobody could see." Idiosyncracy, in all its seething nakedness, tears holes in the fabric of names and attitudes. The face is destroyed by its opposite, the face. It is this energy which is at play throughout Ferdydurke: the adult "lies" of form and style are endlessly worried by youth, by what is inferior, below all values, and yet, ultimately, fascinating.

Twenty years later, in Pornografia, Gombrowicz returns to these ideas, this time in the style of a Polish "provincial novel": an old-fashioned vehicle for the same half erotic, half philosophical obsession. The novel tells of two men who visit a friend in the Polish countryside, during the German occupation. In this stifled atmosphere of war and ennui, the men become fascinated at first, and then obsessed, by a couple of adolescents. The boy and girl have always known each other in their childish way. But now it becomes the secret "pornography" of the adults, to bring them together erotically. The adults, drawn to the "mere" beauty of the boy and the girl, despise them for their youth. Yet they become wholly engrossed in a scheme of manipulations which are meant to bring the children together, "in" and "for" the adults.

Here again, in this work, Gombrowicz's sheer persistence, his ability to create a mood of cold, desperate obsession, finally overcomes the improbability of the story. The world of Witold and Frederick, the two men, is formed and noble, disengaged from the "greenness" of youth. And yet there is no passion it can generate for itself. It is impotent and deathlike, if it cannot reach out "obscenely," for the despised gift of the young. It cannot live, it can only manipulate.

Although the novel gathers strength as it goes on, it fails seriously in one respect. The reader feels too easily that Gombrowicz is working out a kind of intellectual jigsaw puzzle. His distrust of the adult prevents him from creating adult characters. It boils over into an absurd sense of physical repulsion. "There were five of them—men—in the house. Hippolytus, Siemian, Albert, Frederick and I. Ugh . . . Nothing in the animal world attains such deformity—What dog, what horse can compete with this incontinence, with this cynicism of form? Alas, after the age of 30, men lapse into monstrosity."

The exile of Witold Gombrowicz is irreparable. Like Gulliver, he cannot bear the presence of man (or woman), and Pornografia suffers from this inner constraint, this inability to approach the other without disgust or, if the other is "young," without a curious ecstacy mingled with condescension.

Machismo

DOWN THESE MEAN STREETS. By Piri Thomas. Alfred A. Knopf. 333 pp. $6.95.

ELMER BENDINER

Mr. Bendiner, writer and editor, is the author of The Bowery Man (Thomas Nelson).

In any society the transformation of boy into man is a painful ordeal of alternating proof and doubt, but in the comfortable classes a soothing murmur assures the fledgling that when he shaves the stubble on his chin he will in fact be a man.

In the ghettos the world damns the boy to nothingness and dares him to be a man. There is no slow maturing, no time for experiment and question. There is only a desperate hunger for the state of grace called machismo.

Piri Thomas in his autobiography, Down These Mean Streets, describes the passionate, painful search to validate his manhood for which, with dead-pan cool, he had to fight, steal, submit to buggery, open his veins to any drug, take any dare, any risk. He has done it all in Harlem's mean streets and gone on from machismo to manhood, acquiring during the journey an understanding of man.

This is not a confirmation ritual imposed by what the sociologists call the "barrio subculture." This is a trial by ordeal that American society devises when it challenges a boy to feel like a man while he's up to his neck in the muck that is thrown at him.

Piri Thomas emerged from his ordeal like a phoenix out of the fire. He survived the anguish of addiction and cold-turkey withdrawal, street combat and the degradation of prison. He came out to engage in what is called social rehabilitation of his countrymen in Harlem and in Puerto Rico. More important, perhaps, he has given us this document of how a boy grows up in hell.

His account is all the more effective because he has not written of his childhood as hell untempered by love. He writes fondly—almost sentimentally—of the barrio and its people as if there were no villains, Negro or white, but only victims. He has compassion even for cops.

When he is not talking about the fight for manhood he is developing the second theme of man's development, what Whitman called, "the dear love of comrades." Comradeship to a boy does not depend on a cause or a banner. It is blind to human faults and deaf to reason.

One of the most telling crises Thomas describes occurs in prison when the cons are about to riot over food. Their complaint seems unfounded to Piri Thomas; there is no prospect of winning, there is only a humiliating defeat, reprisals, injury and perhaps death to be expected. And still he feels the overwhelming need to stand shoulder to shoulder with men who have nothing in common with him except a common condition.

He wavers until it is too late to leap to their side and then he curses himself for having failed to join still another lost cause that would have won nothing and cost him his parole. The soldier-hero knows that comradeship is more precious than victory and that reason is only a distraction. But manhood and comradeship are the only possible achievements in the ghetto.

Piri Thomas had a special problem to compound the general terror and confusion. He was the only dark-skinned member of a Puerto Rican family. His brothers and sister could pass for Spanish whites and so escape the skin stigma. For a while he carried his Spanish accent like a badge and explained to all who would listen that he was not Negro but Puerto Rican. It impressed only one white American, a Southern whore who thought she was accommodating a swarthy grandee until he shattered her complacency by shouting that she had just been had by an American Negro.

Piri Thomas flirted with militant Mohammedanism in prison but on his return to Harlem relapsed into respectable Christianity and earnest social work. This may seem to some to be a happy ending; it may disappoint others. In any case it would be best to await further word from Mr. Thomas. He may tell us whether he can find new answers in the old formulas or whether Malcolm X did not wind up a similar odyssey in a more promising port.

There is one danger in Piri Thomas' book though not primarily of his making. Middle-class Americans may smile contentedly when they finish its horrors and say: "You see, I knew it could be done. There is some good in them after all, and if they only try like Piri Thomas, they can all make it."

To guard against that crushing smugness it would have been good if Piri had a bit more anger and a bit less of the Puerto Rican's Christ-like tolerance that bids them murmur sympathetically at the hostile world—"Ay Bendito."

I Quit! From Solo to Chorus

THE NEW LEGIONS. By Donald Duncan. Random House. 274 pp. $5.95.

ALAN SAMUELS

Mr. Samuels is a writer, presently in the armed forces.

The jacket of Donald Duncan's book is approximately the Ramparts cover for February, 1966, on which a grim, highly decorated master sergeant announced he had just quit the Army. This bad omen notwithstanding, The New Legions is not one of those articles stretched into books only to exploit the initial publicity. Duncan is an astute man with a lot more to say.

Actually he seems to have had two books in mind: an autobiography and a sociological study of Army influence in America. The New Legions contains snatches of each. The personal parts describe induction, jump school, Special Forces training and some daring infiltration missions in Vietnam. Most of these episodes are written in Male-Adventure style—a parody of Robin Moore's fake toughness. An unfortunate result is that we get little sense of the internal dialogue Duncan must have conducted before he quit, and only a slight understanding of why, if his background and ambitions were so typical, he took such an exceptional step in the end.

The essays are better, particularly those on the depersonalization of the Army experience and the way in which universal military training has led to the subservience of civilian America. One of the strongest discussions—because the personal half takes on the weight of parable—deals with the Special Forces, advance party in our Vietnamese adventure. Duncan, who was attached to Special Forces as an instructor, recruiter and team leader, concludes that its true specialty has always been fighting publicity campaigns. He describes the extremely funny turning-point victory which came when President Kennedy was dazzled by a hoked-up display of proficiency on a visit to Fort Bragg. Kennedy immediately upgraded the role of Special Forces, and authorized its members to wear the coveted green beret.

As often happens, though, the perpetrators of the sales pitch fell for it themselves. The greenie beanies—though their reading of Mao, Tito and Che should have taught them better—came to believe that good training in language and first aid, demolition and intelligence-gathering, would enable them to counter an army of farmers fighting for their land. Vietnam was the first test of their peculiar theory that a shark can be trained to move among the people like a fish in water.

Duncan tellingly describes his arrival there, a Candide in tropical worsteds, wholly dedicated to winning the hearts and minds of the people. Within hours a bar girl gave him his "first Vietnamese evaluation of the Special Forces . . . 'Ohhh!' she squealed, smiling approval. 'You Special Forces . . . Special Forces number one. They eat pussy.' "

There were other disillusionments, of course: a recruiting officer saying, "Don't send me any niggers"; Americans lighting cigarettes while their Vietnamese counterparts tortured and murdered prisoners; the blatant venality of Saigon's rulers. But Duncan kept his observations to himself. (Only recently he has learned that a man he worked with intimately in Vietnam was also against the war at that time, and has now quit in disgust.) He played it so straight that when he finally did resign he was the most decorated enlisted man in Vietnam, and up for a Silver Star.

Duncan's decision was all the more remarkable because the voices for peace had never reached him. He had to work out all the arguments against soldiering on his own. It's true that the peace movement lionized him afterward, but it never reached out to him during his struggle. Even today the movement does little to encourage future Duncans. Implicit in the cry of Hell No at the induction centers is the idea that the aimless draftee who stumbles nervously past the picket line has already reached a moral par with the Marine who burns huts by zippo lighter.

Despite the signs that say Bring Our Boys Home, the Women Strike for Peace rhetoric about Their Sons, and the occasional agitator who enlists, there is very little contact between Movement people and army people. Many of those who carry signs calling the GIs brothers seem in fact to be rooting for their death—that is, they gloat at news of Vietcong victories. (The National Guardian runs what can be read as a triumphant box score of American casualties.) As for the would-be organizers who enter the service, they often underestimate the psychological and practical difficulties of propagandizing in basic training—when your constituency is literally running from dawn till dusk. The hard fact is that the Movement barely understands the workings of the war machine. I have heard men who know the history of Southeast Asia cold, who could cite every argument against a counter-deterrent nuclear strategy, use the words "platoon," "battalion" and "brigade" as synonyms.

One way the Movement might learn more about the GIs it must influence, if it means business, would be to operate out of the bar-whorehouse-pawnshop towns near the big training bases, the parasite towns where soldiers drink and dependents live. There are services to be performed out of store fronts in Leesville, La., and Manhattan, Kan. The children of personnel stationed at, say, Fort Polk, must attend rural Louisiana schools. A pre-school or upgraded teaching facility would be welcomed by wives and military men alike. Perhaps an ombudsman's ear could be tilted toward the post to pick up such scandals as the one that broke this summer at Fort Leonard Wood, where the commanding general had been pressuring men to plead guilty in court-martial cases. (This story floated in rumor form for months; by breaking it, a Movement journal like Viet Report would have earned the good will of some 35,000 soldiers.) But Viet Report isn't interested in the day-to-day problems of American soldiers. Another Movement job might be to help doctors and enlisted men organize, at those posts where spinal meningitis is endemic, a fight for a guaranteed eight hours sleep.

But why should the induction centers be the scene of the Movement's final appeal to GIs? The day you report, Duncan reminds us, you are frightened and bewildered, hardly in condition to ingest a pamphlet on high politics. And reporting for induction, though traumatic, need not represent a philosophical watershed. Boys of 19 or 20 have not thought it all through and arrived at a firm, homicidal resolve. They are as old as college boys, and just as subject to wavering. Many accept induction even though they disapprove of the war. Some are educated; some have been exposed to the hip scene; some are black men who admire Muhammad Ali but, unlike him, need the honorable discharge in order to make a living. They are not all conformists, certainly not all killers, but they are not up to the enormous sacrifice the Movement now demands of them.

Only a handful of men have the resources, moral or financial, to say Hell No. There are many more who are whispering Well Maybe. They don't want jail, exile or ostracism, and they hear the Movement's strident message as: Risk Your Neck. The army seems unchangeable to them, since they have never seen anyone change it. They sense that the Movement is preoccupied with Vietnam and oblivious to their other difficulties. And so they rightfully wonder, if a Romney came in tomorrow and ended the war, would there still be a Movement to honor the men languishing in stockades and penitentiaries?

It is only after soldiers see that it is possible, on some level, to change their situation that they might think of pressing demands which now seem outlandish and suicidal—such as the right to decline assignment to a given duty station. To expect mass refusals to fight in Vietnam is like thinking American workers could have forced through the Wagner Act in 1870. The Movement has not taken the elementary step, Step A of any serious organizing process: convincing people that problems they perceive as individual and unsolvable are in fact widespread and—by common action—solvable. Only when that job is done will Duncans appear in legion. Then and only then will there really be a chance of stopping the war in Bolivia.

THEATRE/ Julius Novick

Stratford, Conn.

Some years ago I wrote that the American Shakespeare Festival Theatre and Academy at Stratford, Conn., was "conscientiously devoted to bad work." This is no longer true; today the festival is not conscientiously devoted to anything in particular at all. This season its four productions have been staged by four different directors, none of them permanently employed at Stratford: two solid old-timers of various vintages (John Houseman and Jerome Kilty), a notorious chichi merchant (Cyril Ritchard), and this year's hot young director (Michael Kahn). But one advantage of this absolute eclecticism, this commitment to nothing except Shakespeare's name, is that some fine work now and then manages to get done.

Every year the festival mounts one non-Shakespearean production; this year it is Anouilh's Antigone, a grave, intelligent, and yet impassioned meditation on the eternal struggle between freedom and order. The best single piece of acting at Stratford this year is Maria Tucci's performance as Antigone. Delicate yet strong, Miss Tucci's Antigone has depths of sensibility apparent behind the Botticellian beauty of her face. She is clearly marked out for tragedy from the moment she appears, and yet she is never pretentious or monotonous. Otherwise, this Antigone is not a distinguished production.

Morris Carnovsky has produced a strong but ponderous Creon; constantly addressing Antigone as though she were a public meeting, he crushes much of the irony, delicacy and compassion out of his part. Jerome Kilty, the director, has decked the play in modern trappings—rock'n'roll, mini-skirts, pantsuits, a hand mike for Anouilh's one-man Chorus—but they never seem like anything but trappings.

The all-round best production this season is a vigorous Macbeth, imaginatively staged by John Houseman in a cold, threatening, aluminum environment designed by Rouben Ter-Arutunian (scenery) and Jennifer Tipton (lighting). When King Duncan says, "This castle hath a pleasant seat," he is obviously quoting Shakespeare instead of looking around him; otherwise the problems of staging Macbeth are ingeniously and conscientiously solved. Even the witches are less of a nuisance than usual. John Colicos is a satisfactory Macbeth, and Carrie Nye is a young, blond, sinuous, bitchy Lady. (For a change, when Lady Macbeth cries to the evil spirits, "Unsex me here," there is something to unsex.) Mr. Houseman, his designers, and his actors have provided a cogent and skillful traversal of the play. Only later, reading Herbert Blau, did I come upon words for what the production seemed to me to lack: " . . . the subterranean life of the plays (a Macbeth, for instance, clawing bloodily at "the insane root"), and instead of fidelity or capricious updating, an immediacy of conception, by which I know that that world on the stage is unavoidably mine." But this (like most things that Mr. Blau wants) is hard to find.

The festival's Merchant of Venice is remarkable in one respect. Michael Kahn, who directed, has borrowed Tyrone Guthrie's idea that Antonio, the Merchant himself, the man who risks losing the famous pound of flesh, is deeply in love with his friend Bassanio, in whose behalf he takes the risk. This may sound like mere wise-guy psychologizing, but in practice it makes excellent sense. It turns Antonio, who in most productions is just a faceless necessity of the plot, into a genuine and highly interesting character. It explains his mysterious sadness, his sense of himself as "a tainted wether of the flock." It lends poignancy to his willingness, at whatever risk to himself, to lend Bassanio money, though Bassanio has made it quite clear that he wants the money to go court a wife. Wisely, Mr. Kahn does not take things too far; the subsidiary Venetians discuss the matter in tones that drip with unmistakable innuendo, but there is no pawing and no camping. The courage and magnanimity with which Antonio endures and abets what amounts to Bassanio's rejection of him give him considerable stature; as finely played by John Devlin, he rivals Shylock in gravity and dignity.

In other respects, however, this Merchant is not up to much. Morris Carnovsky's Shylock is sustained by the actor's tremendous inborn dignity and strength, but it is a disappointment all the same. The ferocious irony in the part goes for nothing; perhaps Mr. Carnovsky simply has no gift for irony. But one gift he does have is the power to thunder like Jove, and this he does not use. In the climactic scene after his daughter leaves him, he does not rage; he weeps, damps down the scene with self-pity, and thus discourages us from pitying him. Acting teachers tell you not to give rein to your sobs and tears, that it is much more effective to fight against them and barely manage to hold them in; they would seem to have a point. Barbara Baxley makes a pretty, blond Portia, with an attractive shyness and a nice dry wit, but her thin, nasal voice sets strict limits to what she can do with her part. Still another of the production's liabilities is that Mr. Kahn, desiring to show us that the Venetians were a giddy and superficial bunch, has encouraged or at least permitted several of them to giggle and chuckle and frivol and revel with annoying insistence and lack of conviction. Notwithstanding all this, however, I enjoyed the trial scene enormously; I had not seen it for a time and had forgotten what a brilliant piece of dramatic craftsmanship it is.

Even more so than the trial scene from Merchant, "The most lamentable comedy, and most cruel death of Pyramus and Thisbe" from A Midsummer Night's Dream is an almost irresistibly brilliant piece of writing for the stage, and in Cyril Ritchard's staging it is very funny. But on the whole this production of Midsummer is characterized by a disagreeably spurious chic. The court of Theseus is dressed in a sort of musical-comedy Empire style; the fairies prance about in chiffon; the forest, hung with coldly glittering strips of plastic, looks like Tiffany's window. Mr. Ritchard turns the play into a star vehicle by doubling as Bottom and Oberon. His Bottom is comic enough, and his Oberon is not without dignity, but Mr. Ritchard has abused his considerable talents for so long that he is now the prisoner of his own persona, and can do only superficial variations on his familiar, annoyingly swish routine. His production and both his performances have an air of campy meretriciousness about them.

Four plays then, four directors, four directions. This is a better season than many have been at Stratford, but once again there is a sense of aimlessness and discontinuity. Nothing, artistically speaking, leads to anything else; nothing is being built. And meanwhile the plays themselves are not being grappled with on any very profound level.

I am so partial to whatever glows who am a fire fed by what timbers! I add more lovers and friends. Look,

I burn more fiercely tonight.
Listen,
good luck to you out in the heart of the universe, burning.
I must confess
my burning fiercely in this land of ideals and slaughter is impossible.

My friendship
for you is a sudden storm where there arises a vision of the young, meteorites about you being everywhere snuffed out in the frigid darkness.
Good lord, are we cousins?

I must go,
although I remember
now Walt Whitman's embracing of the universe and you tightly, with my neck strained upward.
How nice if I remained and my mind then unlocked a thousand doors to you, but my new girl friend is wringing her hands waiting. Smack in my opened will be, to the "screw you" of living, wild star, the opposite phenomenon. . . .

ARE YOU A DISSENTING DEMOCRAT?

12,000 Southern California registered Democrats signed this ad which appeared in the Los Angeles Times on June 23, 1967

AN OPEN LETTER TO PRESIDENT JOHNSON AND THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY

This is to respectfully advise you, Mr. President, that as of this date we 8,000 registered Democrats, who helped elect you in 1964, are disassociating ourselves from you and your administration because of your conduct of the war in Vietnam.

We voted for you because you gave us hope of peace when in your election campaign you said: "We are not about to send American boys nine or ten thousand miles away from home to do what Asian boys ought to be doing for themselves." (Akron, Ohio, October 21, 1964) This was a pledge, Mr. President. Since then over 10,000 Americans and countless Vietnamese have been killed in this war.

Your administration threatens us daily with the prospect of an all-out confrontation with China and inevitably with the Soviet Union, leading us inexorably toward a thermonuclear holocaust.

Mr. President, we dissenting Democrats want a cessation of bombing and an end to escalation. We want an immediate beginning of meaningful negotiations with all forces involved in this conflict. We want out of the war in Vietnam!

We echo the observation of Democratic Senator George McGovern who said: "We seem bent on saving the Vietnamese people, even if we have to kill them and demolish their country to do so. I do not intend to remain silent in the face of a policy of madness."

We will, also, no longer commit the crime of silence. We endorse the statement of Republican Senator Mark Hatfield, who said of this war: "The freedom to stand opposed to the government's policy is not a privilege that can be withdrawn when the boat begins to rock. That freedom is the inherent right of a people in a democracy."

We have taken pride in the domestic accomplishments of the Democratic Party. But, today, our concern for our country and for humanity outweighs any rigid party affiliations.

MR. PRESIDENT, WE ADVISE YOU AND THOSE ON EVERY LEVEL OF GOVERNMENT THAT, FROM THIS DAY ON, OUR CAMPAIGN FUNDS, OUR ENERGIES AND OUR VOTES GO TO THOSE AND ONLY THOSE POLITICAL FIGURES WHO WORK FOR AN END TO THE WAR IN VIETNAM.

(4,000 signatures arrived too late for publication)

Our goal is one million signatures endorsing this ad to appear in major newspapers throughout our country. A petition with these signatures will be presented to the Democratic National Convention.

ONE MILLION DISSENTING DEMOCRATS CANNOT BE IGNORED!

costs of relocation

Chicago, Ill.

Dear Sirs: Perhaps with the kind of readers The Nation may be presumed to have, it is not necessary to bring together the contributions of Kenneth Burke ["Responsibilities of National Greatness"] and Ivor Kraft ["The Classroom Struggle"] in your issue of July 17. But it is just such readers, I believe, who view proposals for "federal expenditures upward of $50 billion a year over the next twenty-five years," as Mr. Kraft does, in terms of "an annual gross national product of $1,000 billion," without realizing, as Mr. Burke does, that such an allocation of money "involves a corresponding allocation of goods and manpower," which cannot be employed to overcome the deficiencies of our schools without being withdrawn from other uses. The use Mr. Burke mentions is "construction, military aid, transportation and the like, in connection with our military activities abroad," and this reader, at least, would be glad to divert resources from such use to improving our public schools.

But in a free society the reallocation of manpower is far more complex than merely taking a GI out of uniform and giving him a certificate to teach children to read. It involves incentives that would reallocate resources which now are demanded for their own use by groups in our society with more bargaining power than schoolteachers possess. It will not be enough, for instance, to raise schoolteachers' salaries. They must be raised above the wages of auto workers, steel workers, truck drivers and space scientists, so that young persons will prepare to become teachers instead of taking jobs that pay more for less.

Whatever we allocate in tax money to the welfare of others must come out of the amounts we have to spend for ourselves (and not be covered by a cost-of-living increase in pay), or there will be no reallocation of resources but only inflation. This can only increase the anger of people who have been led to believe that we really mean to help them.

There is no painless way to be a liberal. If there is no sacrifice, there is only a four-flushing pretense of liberalism.

let the world go hang

Boston, Mass.

Dear Sirs: It is obvious that the article "TV Editorials: Brave and Free?" [The Nation, Sept. 4] is either misnamed or that its author, Victor Bernstein, did not do his homework. For the article does not deal with broadcast editorials as such; it deals mostly with one station, WCBS-TV of New York, and its editorial writer, Mr. Michael Keating. Moreover, not only do I find his critique of Mr. Keating and WCBS-TV inapplicable to other broadcast editorials but I find the critique itself rather offensive.

For instance, Mr. Bernstein notes that Mr. Keating "talks in simple terms, mostly about local and state problems, and to the political sophisticate much of what he says conveys little more than that there is one young man who is against sin." Well, jolly for Mr. Bernstein who, we have to assume, is the political sophisticate for whom Mr. Keating's editorials are not quite up to snuff.

But then, just how politically sophisticated is Mr. Bernstein? In reference to the equal-time doctrine, he writes: "This balancing act between assertion and counter-assertion . . . must of course rob any editorial campaign of its dynamic." Is Mr. Bernstein implying in politically sophisticated terms that the Pavlovian possibilities inherent in the radio-television media are not fully exploited because equal time must be granted to the opposition?

Fish to the Cats

Secretary McNamara's speech of September 18, announcing the Johnson Administration's commitment to the building of a "thin" anti-ballistic-missile system, shows the Secretary at his best and his worst. The speech is sincere; it reveals a deeply troubled man. It is carefully reasoned. It stresses the impotence of nuclear weaponry in wars of the Vietnamese type, and the permanent stalemate between the United States and the Soviet Union in their nuclear confrontation. And in the end, because of crucial omission and because Mr. McNamara started with the wrong premises, it comes out with the wrong answers. At the very least it insures an indefinite continuance of the nuclear arms race; it brings measurably nearer the culmination of the contest in the showdown which no one wants but no one does much to prevent.

McNamara is not alone in using the arts of the logician to arrive at a conclusion desired for other reasons than those stated. Sen. Henry M. Jackson, one of the principal promoters of ABM technology, and one who will by no means be satisfied with a mere $5 billion job, a few days ago expatiated in a TV program on the theme that from the time of Peter the Great the Russian military stance has been defensive. As one example, he cited the Soviets' predilection for fighter aircraft in preference to bombers. No one asked Jackson why, if the Soviets were so obsessed with defense, they were such a menace that the United States had to have a "thick" ABM system on top of a nuclear offense arsenal of some 2,200 megatons, approximately 700 times the total weight of all the explosives used in World War II.

McNamara recognizes that the "light" ABM shield (which, if it is ever subjected to nuclear bombardment, may turn out to be a sieve) may be only the precursor of the $40 billion ABM system which will ostensibly protect us against Soviet missiles. Every step of McNamara's analysis can be used by the nuclear hawks to justify a vast, open-ended escalation in the nuclear arms race. Therein lies the real danger, which has been with us since the atomic bomb was developed and became the primary weapon of the cold war. The danger does not come from the East, nor from the West; it arises from the nature of the American politico-economic system and its domination by the military-industrial complex. The same pressures that finally produced McNamara's capitulation—not so long ago he was arguing against any ABM system—will result in further capitulation. The much misused Munich analogy is apposite here. "Mr. Johnson" [The New York Times said editorially on September 18] "has thrown a $5 billion fish to the cats. . . . The initial indications are that the advocates of heavy anti-missile defenses will not be appeased." Unless a miraculous conversion occurs, these advocates will never be appeased. The entire history of the period since the United States became a great military power shows that theirs is an appetite that feeds on itself; the more they eat, the hungrier they get.

Sorrowfully, McNamara points out that the nuclear age is with us to stay, that if man is to have a future at all it will necessarily be one "overshadowed with the permanent possibility of thermonuclear holocaust." With each escalation by one side, whether in the form of more nuclear-tipped rockets for delivery on foreign targets or specialized models to shoot down the nuclear-tipped rockets they send against us, reciprocal measures will be taken by the other side. This feedback applies to all arms races, nuclear and conventional; it is an old story. But it operates not only between nations but within them. In the United States it exists in its most malignant form. The Soviet Union and China do not need colossal armaments to maintain economic stability; however repugnant some features of their society may be to us, they could function under everlasting peace. In contrast, the American economy would be in dire trouble without arms manufacture. We have not been on anything but a wartime basis since Franklin D. Roosevelt began preparing the country for World War II, thirty years ago.

McNamara discusses the international back-and-forth of the nuclear arms race clearly enough, but he fails to relate it to diplomacy or policy or internal politics. Is the nuclear arms race to be regarded as a policy in itself, or do we have a policy which is implemented by arms, nuclear arms in particular? But if we do pursue an independent policy designed to promote the national welfare, could we not afford to be more conciliatory toward the powers we have antagonized? Do we, who are the strongest, in reference to Red China and Soviet Russia, separately or together, need to be truculent in proportion to our strength? Was it necessary for us to intervene in Vietnam, and is it necessary for us to expand our aggression there and pose as the champions of freedom? A halfway rational and humane politics within, and a correspondingly decent foreign policy, might suffice to save us and the world from the holocaust. Instead, Johnson and McNamara have taken another step toward it.

The Smale Case

If scientists all over the country do not rage and burn over the National Science Foundation's action in the case of Prof. Stephen Smale of the University of California at Berkeley, they will regret it later. There may be some exceptions—scientists who have no political views whatsoever, and scientists whose views are safely conservative. Others have reason to be concerned and so have citizens who are not scientists but who believe in freedom of political expression for everyone.

Smale is regarded by mathematicians as one of the most brilliant members of their profession. In this evaluation the National Science Foundation concurs. He has been the recipient of a $91,500 grant for research in global analysis, which expires next March. Of this amount, Smale received $5,556 in summer salary in 1966 and 1967, and some traveling expenses. Smale and his colleagues have applied for a two-year $247,000 grant to continue the work on a larger scale, with eight or nine senior investigators to be assigned to the project. The amount is not at issue; thousands of such medium-size grants are made every year by NSF, other government agencies, and private foundations. The trouble is Smale himself. He is a political activist from way back. In high school he agitated against a ban on teaching evolution. Later he was involved in pro-Castro activities, he was co-chairman of the Vietnam Day Committee at Berkeley in 1965, and in 1966 he held a press conference on the steps of Moscow University in which he denounced American military intervention in Vietnam, Soviet suppression of the 1956 Hungarian uprising, suppression of freedom of expression in the Soviet Union, and the "new McCarthyism" in the United States. He also tried, unsuccessfully, to persuade the Mathematicians' Congress in Moscow to join him in condemning U.S. involvement in Vietnam.

A difficult fellow, obviously, and one who must keep the NSF administrators awake of nights. He acts as if ours were actually a free country.

NSF's position was made more difficult by Rep. Richard L. Roudebush (R., Ind.), a member of both the House Science and Astronautics Committee and the House Committee on Un-American Activities. Roudebush has been gunning for Smale for some time. "He's about as pink as they come," one of the Congressman's aides commented. A pink topologist furnishes a prime issue for a conservative Congressman who must run for election every two years.

The NSF solution was to complain that Smale was not a good administrator and that while they were convinced of the intrinsic merit of his research they would like the new grant to be split between one covering Smale's own research and another covering that of his colleagues. In any case Smale gets so little of the funds that his name could have been left off the application entirely. The university thought of handling the matter in this way, but Smale would not stand for it. "All scientists should be able to speak their minds on politics," he insisted. "I am still strongly against the [Vietnamese] war and I will continue to say so." There is no military aspect to the grant and Smale is deliberately making an issue of his case in order to get the scientific and intellectual community to oppose political intervention of this sort.

Smale's is not the first case of its kind. Last July, Prof. William Taylor, a highly regarded historian at the University of Wisconsin, was denied a place on a White House advisory panel and Dr. Donald F. Hornig, President Johnson's adviser on science and technology, confirmed that the sole objection to Taylor was his outspoken opposition to the Vietnamese War and the fear that Congressional ire would be aroused. Speaking at the dedication of the Stanford Linear Accelerator Center on September 9, Hornig emphasized that the government cannot deal with individual investigators and a "larger, more responsible role must be played by university administration." Smale is in general agreement with this approach. There are many universities and only one federal government. One university might be reactionary, another in the middle, another might be libertarian. There would be no single-line control and the example of the good universities would spur researchers at the bad ones to action.

In the meantime, the National Science Foundation has not covered itself with glory. Science, the weekly magazine of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, sums up the situation with its usual acuity: "Though Smale is no easy client for a federal agency in the politically rancid atmosphere that now prevails in Washington, NSF must still be accorded high marks for a tour de force in bureaucratic weaseling." If similar kicks are aimed at the NSF backside from other quarters, it may in the end redound to the benefit of the agency itself.

Short-Changing FAA

The critical comment on the effect of the Vietnamese War on domestic welfare programs has left the impression that the Johnson Administration and Congress are not greatly perturbed so long as the middle class continues to live high on the hog. This is not quite the case: some programs that do concern the invincibly affluent American are feeling the drain of the budget for Vietnam. One involves the request of the Federal Aviation Agency for funds to hire additional air controllers and build urgently needed control towers and radar installations. The amount at issue is about $100 million, or slightly more than the current cost of one day's fighting in Vietnam. In effect, the answer of the White House, the Budget Bureau and, so far, of the Congress, is that FAA can have the controllers or the additional facilities, but not both. This put the usually submissive agency on such a spot that, as reported by Evert Clark in The New York Times (September 18) it is fighting back publicly.

Fatal airline accidents this year are running at about the normal rate, with ten crashes in the first eight months and a loss of 217 lives, compared to a five-year average of 293 fatalities. However, general aviation (private and business flying) is growing by leaps and bounds, and near collisions are increasing proportionately. So far this year two mid-air collisions involving airliners have occurred. One, which killed Secretary-designate of the Navy John T. McNaughton and eighty-one others, could probably have been prevented if the Asheville-Henderson, N.C., airport had been equipped with radar.

None of this seems to concern the Administration greatly. What does concern it is that if the denial of the FAA request were to be followed by another major accident involving air traffic control, the safety issue "could be catapulted into a political controversy." It would seem preferable that safety should become controversial without another crash.

FAA's requests seem modest enough. Its regular budget totals $811 million which, by the yardstick of Vietnam, would pay for ten days of the war. This would enable FAA to add 648 controllers and 121 maintenance men to its current control staff of about 14,000. David D. Thomas, FAA's deputy administrator, says that this 5.5 per cent increase is only a third of what is needed. The deficiency will be made up, as in past years, by "asking each controller to work harder." Anyone who has observed air controllers at work during the evening or morning rush hours, and who flies as an airline passenger, would much prefer not to see them work harder.

Some idea of the way FAA's budget requests are handled can be gleaned from Clark's story, which obviously was not written without some help from the harassed FAA heads. First the Budget Bureau cut deeply into the proposed 1968 proposal, but Gen. William F. McKee, the agency's chief, protested to the President, and the Budget Bureau settled for a cut of only $70.2 million. The House then made cuts that would compel FAA to forgo twelve new control towers and six new radars. In the meantime, according to the summary published in the September 11 Aviation Week & Space Technology, in the first six months of 1967 passenger miles on the big domestic carriers increased by 17 per cent, local service by 22 per cent, and so on, while smaller aircraft continued doing their bit to keep the controllers from sleeping on the job.

As for the future, in June Sen. Mike Monroney cited an Air Transport Association estimate that by 1970 two-thirds of the airline fleets will have improved airborne equipment to provide better information for the controller automatically, but FAA will have only one-third of its ground facilities correspondingly equipped, so the new system will be only half as effective as it should be. Monroney also pointed out that forty-nine airports which now have no control towers meet the minimum FAA requirements for such facilities, and by next year the number will approximate 100—but there is no allowance for any new towers in the 1968 FAA budget. Apparently nothing is important but the number of enemy bodies the services can count in Vietnam.

Crises Come, Crises Go

How quickly "crises" subside! A nation is aroused by riots and watches in horror as the police, with or without the National Guard, battle mobs in the streets. While the shooting continues, leaders of the disaffected and leaders of the local Establishment confer, seeking a way out. With peace restored, however uneasily and temporarily, committees and commissions are appointed. Men of good will take counsel with one another. Then, gradually, the community slides back into the old ways. There may be some modest reforms, but hardly anyone expects that such changes will suffice to avert further carnage.

The sequence is much the same in international disturbances, although the casualties are greater. The Middle East is the current example. Soon it will be back in the same old rut. The sleeping dogs will be allowed to lie, although everyone knows that they will not be quiet long.

Even now, the United States is resuming its role in keeping the Middle East, with many other parts of the world, in a state of tension. There would be tension anyway, but our arms serve to heighten it and to make outbursts certain. When the relation between the Export-Import Bank and the Pentagon in arms procurement became public, even conservative citizens were alarmed. Now the whole business is relegated to the back pages of the newspapers, and on radio-TV it receives no mention at all. It is taken for granted as a necessity, nothing to get excited about.

COMING SOON

William Eastlake, well known to our readers (see article p. 300), has sent The Nation a series of unforgettably vivid "close-ups" of men and scenes and incidents in the war in Vietnam. Here are the titles: "The Vietnam Dead," "The Death of Seven Zipperheads," "Lost in Vietnam," "The Last Man of an American Platoon," "Three Purple Hearts, Two Turtle Doves and an Ambush in a Flame Tree," and "Our Lord in Vietnam." Mr. Eastlake is the author of many books including that fine war novel, Castle Keep. He has been in Vietnam on assignment from The Nation. The series will start in an early issue. —Editors

On September 18, testimony given on July 17 by Paul H. Nitze, Deputy Secretary of Defense, before the House Banking Committee was finally adjudged safe for revelation. On behalf of the Pentagon and the Johnson Administration, Mr. Nitze stoutly defended the nation's role as arms supplier to the world. Arms sales, he said, benefited American labor and industry and generated favorable gold flow. He estimated that arms sales over the last five years had provided 1.4 million man-years of employment and $1 billion in "profits." He did not say that the bulk of the profits went to some sixteen major American companies, the same ones, in the main, that have profited from Vietnam.

Whether under this arrangement or some other, arms shipments to both sides in the Middle East are to be resumed. The U.S. Government has assured Israel that it will receive two squadrons of attack bombers. In accordance with its "even-handed" policy, the Johnson Administration will also make at least "symbolic" shipments to an Arab state, probably Jordan. For the time being, two squadrons of F-10 jet fighters will be withheld, since the Jordanian air force is incapable of flying them in its present state, but as soon as it recovers this embargo will presumably be relaxed.

What was said of the Bourbon monarchs is only half true of American policy in this respect. The Bourbons were said to learn nothing and forget nothing. In our arms distribution we learn nothing and forget everything.

One-Sided Candor

Denver

The new U.S. Freedom of Information Act, designed to provide news media with more access to governmental information, may also have opened up Pandora's box in the way of providing business with new weapons against government. The act hadn't been in effect twenty-four hours when two oil companies filed suit in Denver, demanding all information the government may have as to oil shale claims the companies are disputing with the U.S. Bureau of Land Management. The claims are on some 1,300 acres of government land which President Herbert Hoover withdrew from private entry in 1930. The two companies bought them up from the original claimants or their legatees.

They say that all relevant documents and information, including the findings and recommendations of bureau scientists and consultants throughout the years, must be made available to them under terms of the new act. The only exceptions allowed by the act are information that may bear on national security, or invade personal privacy.

Naturally, such access would bare the government's whole case to the claimants who have no obligation to provide equal access. The bureau has been holding hearings on the claims, but the whole matter may now go over until the federal courts rule. If the case sets a precedent for all situations in which business and government may find themselves legally opposed, it could become of national importance.

TEACHING TEACHERS

THE FREE UNIVERSITIES

RALPH KEYES

Mr. Keyes is studying at the London School of Economics and writes on education topics.

"An Investigation into Sex" is now offered at Dartmouth. "Analogues to the LSD Experience" can be studied at Penn. "Guerrilla Warfare" is being examined by DePauw students. Stanford undergraduates are studying "American Youth in Revolt," and "The Origins and Meaning of Black Power" is a course at Brooklyn College.

Has higher education finally caught up with the times? The colleges and universities themselves have not, but some of their members are trying to fill the gap with side shows. The above courses and hundreds like them are currently offered at student-organized "free universities" and "experimental colleges" on campuses across the country.

Bob Reich is one of the organizers. A short, ivy-leaguish senior, he is concerned about the quality and content of education at Dartmouth. Ten years ago Reich would have done little more than grumble discreetly about large lecture courses or grade-motivated learning. Five years ago he might have mustered up a minor demonstration. But in the winter of 1966, Reich, a top history student and former class president, simply gathered some colleagues around him and seceded.

"I had heard about student-organized experimental colleges at San Francisco State and Princeton," he recalls, "so I talked to a couple of guys, put a notice in the paper and held a meeting." Fifty people attended and out of it emerged the Dartmouth Experimental College (DEC). Fraternities, social clubs and dormitories agreed to organize courses.

The result was first presented to the community in the form of an elegantly printed catalogue. "When you're trying to explain a sex course to some townspeople, it sure helps to have a fancy catalogue," explains one DEC organizer. Listed were seventeen courses on such topics as "Man Faces Death," "The Development of Conservative Thought" and "Contemporary Marriage." Each course had an undergraduate coordinator who was responsible for writing a syllabus, constructing a reading list, and inviting speakers. "The emphasis of these courses will be on the desires and interests of the participants, rather than on the structures and requirements of an institution," reads the catalogue. "Innovation will be the rule; free give and take will be the method; a provocative educational experience will be the goal."

A massive publicity campaign then began. DEC organizers made radio and TV appearances, newspaper articles described the venture, and mailings were sent out—not only to Dartmouth students but to faculty, townspeople and girls at nearby Colby Junior College. Doubling the most optimistic prediction, 1,057 people applied for the first quarter's offerings. These included 585 Dartmouth students (about one-fifth of the student body); 230 townspeople; seventy faculty members; and 173 Colby girls. For a while, the Dartmouth Experimental College was the fourth largest college in New Hampshire. The dean of Dartmouth applied for a course, as did his two secretaries. (He missed the first class, but wrote the student coordinator asking for a "Dean's Excuse.") Since the seminars were to be kept small, only half the applicants could be accepted. Thirty-eight of seventy faculty members applying were admitted, and the Director of Admissions just missed being turned away.

"Great!" wrote in one student, "this has made Dartmouth meaningful." "It's wonderful to pursue a subject out of sheer interest and sans pressures of any kind," commented another. An older lady from town bubbled: "For so many years I've tried to get students into my home to talk. . . . This is the first time anything like this has happened and I'm so thrilled. . . . I'd do anything to keep it going." Even the Dean of Faculty endorsed the venture, saying soberly: "A healthy institution will work very hard to promote this kind of insurgence."

Dartmouth's experience is not unique. Banding together with faculty and townspeople, young academic seditionists have formed more than forty free universities and experimental colleges in the past two years.

Growing out of the civil rights "Freedom Schools" and Vietnam "Teach-ins," free universities began cropping up during 1965 in New York, Berkeley, Chicago, Detroit and Los Angeles. These early efforts were generally more militant than free and too often suffered from what Harvey Wheeler, a staff member of the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions, called "a suffocating Marxist commitment." New Left groups, particularly Students for a Democratic Society (SDS), quickly picked up the idea and began to organize free universities. Michigan, Texas, Colorado, Ohio State, Florida, Wisconsin and Minnesota became nervous hosts to "counter-university" squatters.

But an interesting evolution soon began to occur in these academic fifth columns. If free university founders were often left-wing ideologues, many of the teachers and most of the students wanted simply to teach and learn in a free atmosphere. The anti-establishmentarians were soon faced with the choice of trying to whip their creations into line, allowing them to go their own way, or simply letting them die.

The Free University of Pennsylvania (FUP), an early venture, founded in the winter of 1966 by the local SDS chapter, ran into this problem: "When we first started discussing having a free university we expected 100 to 150 to get involved at most," recalls Bob Brand, a stocky, garrulous SDS senior in economics. "We had thirty to forty courses planned and were really worried about how to explain a poor sign-up to the teachers of the courses." "But," marvels a girl who was involved in registration, "all these 'straight' people came out of the woodwork to get involved, people you never would have expected to sign up for something like this." In the end, about 750 people enrolled, and ten new seminars had to be organized on the spot to handle the overflow. It soon became obvious that the Free University of Pennsylvania had gone beyond its SDS roots, and the parent weaned its child because, as an SDS spokesman admitted, "it had outgrown us."

One of the most successful efforts of its kind, FUP has enrolled more than 700 students for forty to fifty courses in each of its three semesters, many participants coming from the surrounding community. Free University officials estimate that students or teachers from twenty-eight Philadelphia institutions other than Penn are involved.

Enthusiasm for Penn's Free University is generally high. Sophomore Rich Feigenberg took an FUP course because "in the regular university there are too many requirements, few electives allowed, and even these you have to fit into your schedule." Freshman Mary Knutch attended the FUP seminar on Contemporary Issues because "after two semesters at Penn I found that I had forgotten how to talk." Tom Knox, a junior, found that in the "New Left Ideologies" class, "you get a good discussion inasmuch as nobody feels like the professor is trying to make a point."

Penn's administration is less sanguine about this pearl in its shell. A point of friction has been the question of whether outsiders should be allowed to use the university facilities "for free." Though the students have won grudging consent on this issue, the dean's office points out that the Free University has yet to supply the reports and statistics that were promised in return. "There doesn't seem to be much planning," concludes Dean of Women Alice Emerson. Her complaint is well grounded. In its quest for freedom the Free University of Pennsylvania has created a bureaucratic structure so ill defined that work tends to fall upon whoever will do it—usually the hard-working coordinator Steve Kuromiya, a senior in architecture.

This type of problem caused three FUP Coordinating Committee members to write a public letter last year contending: "The Free University is in trouble. . . . The majority of courses are ill attended, the creative thought has been at a minimum in many courses, the minimal office work required has not been done, and that which has was done by a few people." The letter caused a flurry of controversy. A large public meeting was held to discuss the issue and many volunteers came forward.

But from beneath this crisis a more interesting and subtle kind of disagreement came to light. The worriers came from the original SDS crew who had started the Free University. Their conception of what it should be was expressed by Bob Brand who says: "The way I wanted it to go was to have people asking the basic questions about their disciplines." This, he admits, is "basically a very conservative academic position." But Brand's constituency is small. The new hero of today's Free University at Penn is Ira Einhorn, a thirtyish, long-haired, bearded, "Be-in" organizer. Einhorn, who wears a daffodil behind one ear, graduated from Penn ten years ago, and has been moving in beat and hip subcultures ever since. Last term he taught two courses in the Free University: Analogues to the LSD Experience" and "The World of Marshall McLuhan."

"Kids are learning more wandering around cities and on TV than in the universities," says Einhorn in explaining his approach to education. "I like to move around and you need more mobile classrooms. My classroom is just an extension of myself. It's the same kind of thing that happened in the Be-in. After living in the insane asylum you've got to get sane yourself."

Einhorn rambles, darting wildly from subject to subject. He is obviously intelligent and well read. His McLuhan course syllabus ("subject to change as I grow into the course or it grows into me") recommends thirty-six books, from Nietzsche to Goodman, and Roethke to Ginsberg. His teaching tools ranged from candles and incense to rock 'n' roll and free-word association. Einhorn's courses are easily the most popular in the Free University. "LSD" had an enrollment of more than 100, and "McLuhan" actually rose in participation from sixty to seventy-five, more people attending the last class than the room would hold.

"Old New Leftists" like Bob Brand are basically concerned with the limitations of course content in existing institutions, and want to create a setting where people can study society in a rigorous way. Leftism and pedagogy are hardly inconsistent. The new breed of insurgent looks to a hipper, freer, "celebration" form of learning. To them method and content cannot be separated because freedom, opening up, living and loving are themselves the goals. Randomness can only help that process, as surely as a junior bureaucracy will hinder it. As the hippies ascend, the "Be-in" and the free university become more and more indistinguishable.

Similar disputes have occurred at San Francisco State's Experimental College. Senior English major Cynthia Carlson brought some freshmen together there in the fall of 1965 to discuss and critically examine their education. By spring, twenty-one seminars had grown up, organized by students and loosely grouped under the heading of "The Experimental College" (EC). More than 350 students were involved as participants, as well as twenty-five student seminar organizers and thirty faculty members who donated time as advisers.

Although influenced by the free university movement, the students at State aimed at special goals from the start. They deliberately avoided getting stuck in a posture of self-conscious militancy, preferring instead to "build a model," a positive alternative that would parallel the existing college. "Creative tension" was to exist between the two, said Jim Nixon, 25-year-old graduate student in philosophy who coordinated the original effort. "If you can get the sense of what you want to build," he explained, "then you can go to the college, take what is useful in it and avoid hostilities."

State's venture quickly mushroomed. Seventy courses were set up in the fall of 1966 for some 1,200 registrants. The national news media began to take notice of this "quiet revolution" just across the bay from Berkeley. Nixon, a persuasive and extremely bright leader, ran for president of State's Associated Students on a pro-EC platform and won overwhelmingly. The future sparkled and the EC's fall catalogue declared:

> The idea is that students ought to take responsibility for their own education. The assertion is that you can start learning anywhere, as long as you really care about the problem you tackle and how well you tackle it. The method is one which asks you to learn how you learn, so you can set the highest conceptual standards of accomplishment for yourself. The assumption is that you are capable of making an open-ended contract with yourself to do some learning, and capable of playing a major role in evaluating your own performance. The claim is that if people, students, faculty and administrators work with each other in these ways, the finest quality education will occur.

In its first year and a half, the Experimental College has had a tempestuous history. At best it has provided an open creative learning situation, spiced by a heavy dose of West Coast avant-gardism. A course in "Competition and Violence" had participants study conflict by learning and practicing judo, speaking to one another about their reactions while they fought. The "Involvement Theatre Workshop" was "an attempt to create a genre of theatre in which the audience is involved to the greatest extent possible—perplexed, threatened and ultimately seduced into intellectual, emotional and physical participation in the action." Last year, EC sponsored a thirty-six-hour, 6,000-person light show, rock and soul, "sensory awakening happening" called "Whatever It Is."

Problems soon confronted the EC. State's newspaper, The Daily Gater, sniped regularly at the "Other College." Wrote city editor Phil Garlington: "The Other College, in truth, is quite harmless, for the most part a playschool for the S.F. State hippie element." Former chairman of the faculty, Dr. Richard Axen, commented that "Any professor who teaches in the Experimental College loses respectability within his department." When a Newsweek article lauding the Experimental College hit the stands, several faculty members reportedly called on the vice president for academic affairs to ask who was running the college—the president or Jim Nixon.

Harder to combat than external debunking has been perpetual strife within the "parallel college." EC's key debate centered around the question of planning versus spontaneity. As at Penn, the question of what type of learning is best receives constant attention. Former coördinator Cynthia Carlson Nixon, Jim's wife, has consistently pushed for greater structure and rigorous learning. She worries that students who cut their teeth on the Experimental College may reject "the beautiful, great thoughts of the ages," and confuse real learning with simple fun. Before resigning as coordinator, she reported hopefully: "Kids might have tried a course for a couple of semesters and found they were screwing up, not attaining what they wanted, and had to figure out how to do it. Now, they're having to make an investment of time and energy. They can't just bop in saying, 'teach me, and make it fun.' " Graduate student Floyd Turner, who has been studying the Experimental College, compared what he finds there to "the traditional problem that students faced when they got to Oxford. It often takes them a year to adjust to the shock of being responsible for their own learning."

But harder times now face EC. Their gadfly critic, Phil Garlington, was recently elected president of the associate students against an EC-backed slate. Internal dissension has left its toll in disunity. The original leadership has left the campus, and a hipper breed of student is in charge. Academic credit problems have created ill will, and after a year and a half the faculty is increasingly resistant to Experimental College demands and encroachment.

Staters who have been involved in the Experimental College for any length of time feel generally discouraged. But one wonders how they could possibly see the venture as in any way a failure. San Francisco State itself, in large part because of prodding from the Experimental College, now offers experimental courses which a faculty member can create for a trial semester, with only departmental approval. It has a much loosened general education program, with a student-faculty committee working to revise it still more. It is considering a Work-Study degree program, growing in part out of the Urban Communities and Change Area of the Experimental College. And when one considers the thousands of State students who were stimulated by direct or indirect contact with the EC to question the roots of their education, failure seems hardly the term.

It is risky to generalize about the scores of free universities and experimental colleges, since their diversity is at least as great as their similarity. Stanford's aggressively anti-establishment "Experiment" bears little resemblance to Dartmouth's low-key Experimental College. "Valley Centre" students (from Smith, Mount Holyoke, the University of Massachusetts and Amherst) happily rented a house for their venture, but FUPers wouldn't hear of such a thing. ("Too many ties, less freedom," contends coordinator Kuromiya. "The way we do it all you need is a few leaflets.") On the other hand, while Penn students gladly use university facilities, DEC organizers refuse to jeopardize their autonomy, preferring to meet in clubrooms and fraternities. The EC at San Francisco State relies on student teachers, while Ohio State's Free University uses only professors. At Penn and San Francisco State new teaching methods are eagerly being sought, but Dartmouth organizers have been content to rely on a standard seminar format. Students at Stanford and State can seek degree credit for their extracurricular learning, but the FUP and DEC want no such entanglement.

Despite this diversity some common aspects can be found and evaluated. These include:

Creating a new learning environment. Particularly in the multiversities where huge lecture classes are the rule, there is no doubt that the free universities and experimental colleges have responded to massive frustration with the existing learning environment. "The Free University did seem to fill a need students feel for small group discussion of intellectual matters," concedes Penn Dean Emerson. "It was the only chance I got to talk," says a Penn freshman of her FUP class.

Of course this informal atmosphere is not without its price. Extensive reading for a free university course is rare and discussions of the "bull-session" variety are all too frequent. Dartmouth English Prof. Alan Gaylord, who took the DEC course on J. R. R. Tolkien, laments: "If learning involves more than just an exchange of opinion, includes real digging, then I think there's a real question about the value of our course. Superficial discussion has value up to a point, but there are so many decisions about what to do with one's time that this rapidly loses value."

Focusing learning on more relevant, interesting and integrated subjects. If nothing else, the subjects studied in student-run colleges are more contemporary and lively than those taught in normal institutions. They must be to attract and hold an audience.

One of the DEC courses last term was on the Cuban Revolution. Freshman Camilo Garzón, the son of a Colombian military officer, eagerly enrolled. Asked if he had learned anything in the short time the class had been meeting, he replied, "Oh, yes, I learned for example that Castro had changed his mind about Marxism during the revolution. I hadn't known that and got a better view of Castro." He found that the most exciting thing was the debate between two anti-Fidel Cuban refugees and the Castro supporters in the class.

One enterprising 18-year-old junior science student at Dartmouth wanted to organize a course on Immanuel Velikovsky, a scientific heretic who has constructed an elaborate historical hypothesis of cataclysmic world development. Realizing that his subject was esoteric, the student, Ron Silverman, posted signs around campus reading, "WHO IS IMMANUEL VELIKOVSKY?" These were followed a few days later by posters asking "WHERE IS IMMANUEL VELIKOVSKY?" and later still "WHAT DOES IMMANUEL VELIKOVSKY SAY?" and "WHAT DOES IMMANUEL VELIKOVSKY DO?" "Who is Immanuel Velikovsky?" soon became a form of friendly greeting around Dartmouth, and when the first Experimental College catalogue appeared, sure enough, there was a course entitled, "The Works of Immanuel Velikovsky." Its description began, "In response to the current wave of interest in the theories of Dr. Immanuel Velikovsky. . . ."

About fifteen students and seven professors from different fields involved themselves in this course, the climax of which was a visit by Velikovsky himself. Word that he was coming spread as far as Ambassador College in Pasadena, where the dean sent money to tape the sessions and came across country himself for the two days. By most reports this was one of the most diverse and intensive grillings Velikovsky had ever received (he was eager to come for that reason), and he defended himself so limply that the few students who had started out in any way "believers" ended up as skeptics. "But," reports Silverman, "in order to understand Velikovsky we had to study so many side issues—Egyptian history, Biblical studies, geology, physics, astronomy, etc.—that this in itself was of great value." The class shared his enthusiasm, and the professors were delighted at the opportunity to get together with colleagues in other fields. Recently, letters have come from the Saturday Review and from as far away as Holland, asking for transcripts of the taped class sessions.

Although the sparkle and relevance of student-organized courses can be impressive, one wonders about their lasting value. Is the diligent student teacher at Dartmouth's course on "Gambling in the United States" really serving a useful function? "People will gamble," he explains, "and I might as well make them better at it."

Improved student-faculty relations. At best these ventures can fulfill a City College student's dream that a professor will "sit down, take off his tie, you'll call him Harry and he'll call you Mickey and you'll discuss physics together." Some have come close.

At Pennsylvania they tell of a psychology professor who had a reputation as a sort of "bad guy"—a tough, sour teacher. He had generally taught huge lecture courses which he hated. Lots of cheating went on, and there was little opportunity for personal contact. When the Free University first started he wrote a letter to the Daily Pennsylvanian offering to teach a course on "Pride." "We thought it was a put-on," recalls an FUP organizer, "but we called him and found out he was serious." Twenty people signed up for the course and most finished it. The Free University later got a letter from the professor saying how much he loved teaching it, having been able to relate to his students on a good intellectual and personal level. "I really dug that, since I had heard for so long that he was a bastard," marvels the FUP functionary.

But too often the traditional inhibitions of student-faculty relationships are not so easily broken down. History of Science instructor, David Kubrin, who took the Dartmouth Velikovsky course, expressed disappointment that the DEC had not achieved a "community of scholars." "I'm still referred to as 'sir,' " he notes sardonically. A Penn student tells of attending an FUP seminar held at a friend's apartment. Even there, he reported, the professor sat apart from the students, who directed all discussion at him. "They just couldn't break down old barriers," laments the visitor, "so I went for the punch to break down my own barriers."

Broadening the pool of teachers. Student-run educational experiments commonly involve as teachers people hardly acceptable to existing institutions. The most successful course at DePauw's Free University, on guerrilla warfare, was taught by an Air Force major. He enrolled several girls, a few professors, and had to divide his class in two sections to accommodate the overflow. In another vein, the Pre-University at the University of Wisconsin (Milwaukee) brought in the past state Communist Party chairman to teach Marxism, causing acute pain to some state legislators.

Lawyers, businessmen, housewives, writers, political activists—even a gardener (at SF State) and a Goldwater adviser (at Penn) have been considered qualified to teach free university-experimental college courses.

At San Francisco State the students hired social critic Paul Goodman to be "their professor" for a semester last year. The experience was less productive than it should have been because neither Goodman nor his students could figure out exactly what he was there to do. "Goodman's used to attacking his employers," observed one Stater more drolly, "but when students were in that role he kept maneuvering around but could never figure out a good posture from which to do that."

Broadening the pool of students. At the larger ventures such as Seattle, Penn and Dartmouth a number of the students consist of townspeople. Ira Einhorn was pleased to find that more than half the sixty-odd students in his McLuhan course were past 35. "All colleges must attract over-35s and bring them back to school," he argues with conviction. "The young hippies are so alienated from older people that they can't even talk to them. The over-35s can't understand how you can operate without a program like we do today. I'd tell them that my only program is what I'm doing at any given time. I don't think I got them to agreeing on much, but at least I got them in touch with one another."

FUP's open-door policy had one curious result for Einhorn when twelve right wingers showed up for three consecutive classes of his LSD course, the last time armed with cameras. One of them, a fundamentalist girl, became enraged when they started discussing the religious aspects of LSD. Asked if this didn't cramp his style, Einhorn replied off-handedly: "No. My policy is maximum jeopardy at all times."

At Dartmouth, junior Bob DuPuy had several townspeople in his course on "The Adolescent Subculture." "They enjoyed it and had as much to say as anyone," he reports, adding: "On the whole, in fact, they were more serious than the students. One older guy, a newspaper editor, used to drive 60 miles for every class, and do a lot of extra reading. I once asked him why he was taking the class and he replied, 'I've got several teenagers working for me, and I'm trying to learn how to get blood out of a stone.' "

A recent session of the DEC seminar on "Poverty in America" met in the easy chairs of the Union Lounge to listen to a community worker from rural Vermont. After the class, a young student nurse said she had read Michael Harrington's The Other America and was enjoying the course very much because it was teaching her how much poverty actually existed in this country. A soldier stationed nearby said he was there because "I'm against the poverty program, so I came to see what all the do-gooders are up to." Two high school girls reported they liked the seminar but didn't find the level of discussion any higher than in their high school. An older architect, a Dartmouth graduate, was taking the course with his wife and found it a welcome change from what he had known, because, "it puts the burden upon the individual."

Developing new subjects and teaching methods. If nothing else, free universities and experimental colleges have developed some strikingly creative courses and approaches to teaching. Almost every venture offers a few courses like "Bob Dylan and Other Folk as Contemporary Theologians" (Seattle), "The Philosophical Ramifications of Modern Drama: Or What in the Hell are We Doing in South Vietnam?" (Ohio State), or "The Biblical Roots of American Democracy" (Penn). The Free University of DeKalb (Illinois) offers not only "Eclectic Ecstasy" but an "Eclectic Ecstasy Laboratory."

Some ventures have made vigorous efforts to develop new teaching methods. Lawrence Lipton, teaching a course on "West Coast Avant-Garde Literature" at the Free University of California (Los Angeles), attempted a "reintegration of the arts in a workshop manner." In this "Teach-out" he employed tapes of poetry, films, a jazz combo and a "phono montage" of radio and TV commercials, football games and evangelical speeches.

At Penn, Ira Einhorn has been eager to come up with new approaches. "The first LSD class was in a huge lecture hall with lots of people, so I tried to break this down by turning out the lights and passing out candles and incense. This brought people closer together, made it more like a gathering, made people more conscious of one another's voices because they couldn't see faces. Then another time I spent a whole class period on four words—just put them on the board and let people free associate. I did a body eruption session using (Wilhelm) Reich, then a two and a half hour rock 'n' roll session and the next class gave a lecture on schizophrenia."

Though most free universities or experimental colleges have one or a few wild courses like this, the more striking fact is how conventional most of them are, in teaching approach if not course subject. "We need more daring people," complains instructor Paul Dorpat of Seattle's Free University. But too many participants feel like the Penn student who endorsed the lecture system used in his FUP course saying: "If somebody knows more about a subject than I, I expect him to lecture."

In Mike Vozick's experimental Biology I course at San Francisco State, the students quickly became dissatisfied with the random reports they were giving one another and decided that all future presentations should deal with cells. His students ended up taking the regular Biology Department exams as well as attending some of the laboratory sessions and lectures. "We're developing into a regular Biology I course," explains Vozick cheerfully. "The only difference is kids are learning because they want to, not because they have to."

If nothing else, these students' creations, by their very existence, constitute a damning critique of existing colleges and universities. That some faculty, administrators and townspeople are willing to involve themselves in the ventures indicates that the sentiment goes beyond mere youthful exuberance.

Political scientist Andrew Hacker, in a recent article on college presidents, noted that they often "prefer to work with the foundation-sponsored and government-underwritten programs that are rising parallel to the conventional curriculum. . . . For it is at this margin that a president has his freest hand, in new territory where he does not face the barricades of departmental baronies." Cannot something of the same motivation be ascribed to free university and experimental college founders?

What better way is there to reform outmoded structures than to create a better model at the side? Of course this involves much more than most initial enthusiasts realize. It calls on them to debate issues of education. How do you learn? What should you learn? Who is qualified to teach? How do you create the best educational environment? Even if the practical pressures of running their own learning communities serve only to give these seditionists greater sympathy for the centuries-old dilemmas of education, the experiments might justify their existence.

But more than recognition of difficulties is occurring. The free universities and experimental college may be serving all higher education by having the gall to deal with the old problems in daring ways. They are discovering what it is that people really want to learn about, and are trying to create an environment in which this can be done. For every course that dies another will attract and hold an audience. Since the free curriculum must renew itself each semester, it can constantly question the validity of any course or field of learning. Their faculty failures are matched by the discovery of "born teachers." If too many classes rely on conventional methods, a few create and test exciting new approaches.

More than a century ago, American higher education was bogged down in the pious and anti-intellectual irrelevancy of its religious origins. Students then, as today, grew quickly frustrated and created their own literary and debating societies to examine more relevant issues. They discussed the topics of the day, invited stimulating speakers and developed libraries (in many cases overshadowing those of the regular institution). For decades, most college students belonged to these societies, which were their major source of intellectual stimulation. Finally, after the Civil War, the colleges and universities reformed themselves to the extent that the student societies were no longer essential, and they slowly died out. Historian of education, Frederick Rudolph, attributes this wave of change to the pressure of example exerted by the lively undergraduates. "What is remarkably instructive about what they did is how much more effective they were than the would-be reformers in the ranks of the presidents and professors."

Is a similar process beginning today? Some slight evidence can be detected. Many of the recent reforms in San Francisco State's system can be directly traced to the ferment of the Experimental College. A faculty committee at Dartmouth is trying to develop more experimental opportunities in the curriculum, and Dean Thaddeus Seymour says: "There's no doubt this is directly related to the success of the Experimental College." In a clear response to the challenge of the Free University, Penn this year offered for the first time eight wildly successful noncredit seminars conducted by top faculty members.

Perhaps the highest function of the student educators will be to work themselves out of a job.

CLEANING UP JUAREZ

THE VIEW FROM PANCHO'S VILLA

WILLIAM EASTLAKE

Mr. Eastlake is the author, among other books of The Bronc People (Harcourt Brace) and Castle Keep (Simon & Schuster).

Cuba, N. M.

Las paracaidistas, the parachutists, bivouacked on the brown hills of Juarez, Mexico—not an army at war, nor an army at peace either, but an army without an enemy, as though they had occupied the terrain by default and would relinquish it tomorrow by resignation. Their clotheslines streamed bright flags of rags, forlorn and emblematic of the army of the poor that they were, portentous of a threat they could become.

Las paracaidistas, that word the migratory poor are called in Mexico, the parachutists, descend on the border towns of Mexico trying to find work. They have descended on Juarez, Mexico, across the Rio Grande from El Paso, Tex. They have surrounded Juarez with a ring of mud colonías without water, roads, sewer, electricity, gas, God, hope, work, love, friends. But from Pancho's villa, from the dry and much hotter than hell hill that las paracaidistas have conquered, you have an excellent view of the United States of America.

From Pancho's villa, you can see, too, the rich of Mexico, their houses in Panama Canal Modern, surrounded by barbed wire, dogs, watchmen, soldiers, policemen, troops of friends in high places, successful bullfighters, cars with U.S. license plates, heart-shaped swimming pools brimming with champagne, filled with mistresses—.

"And, Señor . . . "

"Yes?"

"Hay mucho mas. Mucho more. Much worse."

"What about the Rehabilitation Program? The PRONAF—the Programa Nacional de Reforma Fronteriza?"

Pancho called out everyone from his villa and from all the other mud huts. The señor who lived alongside Pancho's villa said, "I cannot believe that anyone could ask a question so estupido."

"In other words the reform program to clean up the border, to find work for you parachutists, is not working?"

"Si, Señor."

"Are you hungry?"

"Si, Señor."

"Are you ready to commence another revolution, Pancho?"

"Si, Señor."

"Or are you just agreeing with everything I say?"

"Si, Señor."

"I have come all the way from Los Estados Unidos to ask you about this border reform."

Pancho thought about the great distance I must have come, maybe from the outskirts of El Paso, and said: "Okay, I will have one tequila." Then he looked past me, and through me, at his villa, his quiet mud villa, and said slowly and with dignidad, "they call us las paracaidistas here in Juarez because we descend on them in the night, surround them with our mud forts of poverty, and cannot be removed. We are campesinos without land, the landless ones. There may be 100,000 of us, 200,000, here in Juarez. No one knows. Many of us, such as I, were braceros who worked in the Estados Unidos, but that has been stopped. It was so simple for you to stop it, but now there are those who are hungry, such as I. And do not blame the people of Juarez, such as them. They did not ask to be invaded by paracaidistas such as we."

"What about the PRONAF?" I said. "The beautiful, expensive new buildings, the muséo, the Camino Real Hotel at 200 pesos a night, the clothes at 2 million pesos a look, the emerald-studded shops, and the golden doors opening onto concrete highways past Pancho's fallen villa all the way to the Olympic Games?"

"Es un otro mundo. It is another world, Señor. That is the world of the Programa Rehabilitación. It is a world I never see. It is a world I cannot see, feel or touch. It is the world of somebody else. It is the world of not such as I. Oiga, Señor," and Pancho touched me, "Oiga." It was a light touch, not only a contact but a remonstrance and a reminder that he was there, that the invisible ones were palpable and alive, the observers and the victims.

Two years ago, when President Gustavo Diaz became President of Mexico, a reform program was announced to change the Mexican border-town image, the image of corruption, a gaudy, neon, forlorn, falling-down, wild pandemonium of inertia and optimistic despair. This reform program has recently been stepped up because the Olympic games are to be held in Mexico City soon and the border towns will be the gateway to Mexico City. A great deal of traffic will pass through Juarez, America's Sodom and Mexico's Gomorrah.

How much money has been spent so far on the rehabilitation of the border and where has it gone? It is impossible to get exact figures because the money comes from many sources, some local, some federal, some private enterprise. But the effect is overpowering, startling and grand. Across the bright new International Bridge you enter a brand-new border town, resplendent with a huge Aztec style Bellas Artes building where the government is making a genuine effort to sell the best crafts of the interior. There is the towering Agricultural Building within a complex of other government buildings, and a new dazzling hotel, the Camino Real. The main highway to Mexico City winds through this grandeur and off you go with the impression that the reforms are successful and all-pervading.

There is also a program of border morality and social reform. This has meant so far that girls are forbidden to work in bars and that there is a curfew on bars, but only the bars in the working-class section. So far no money has been spent on public housing, and so far, outside of the regal tourist entrance area, the town appears the same Juarez that I came through three years ago going into the interior, the heart of a beautiful country, a beautiful people, and the same town that Lopez Mateo, el ex-president de Mejico, lost sleep over three years ago. But I want to know more. I must inquire further about this new border rehabilitation program, first among sympathetic people in El Paso.

"As I said," the American doctor said, "the death rate in Juarez is phenomenal—but then the birth rate in Juarez is phenomenal too."

"The church is cynical about this," the priest from Juarez said.

We were sitting in a patio on the El Paso side of the border where the middle-class hills of America confront the hills of poverty across the Rio Grande.

"Yes," the Juarez priest said. "Certainly the church is responsible for the paracaidistas. If we did not encourage their breeding there wouldn't be so many."

"Come, come."

"Mexico has the highest birth rate in the world," the priest said. "Mexico, like Cuba, will not be saved by a caudillo maximo but by a condom."

"How can you talk like this?"

"Because it is true," the priest said. "That is what this man came here for, isn't it—the truth?"

"You will notice," the doctor said, "that the Juarez papers attribute the high infant death rate among the paracaidistas to dehydration."

"Of course," the Mexican priest said. "That is their euphemism for starvation."

"No," the American doctor said to the priest. "The Juarez newspapers are correct. You are wrong. Allow me my area of competence."

"Con Díos," the priest said, allowing the doctor to proceed with a motion of his hand.

"In the colonias of Juarez where the paracaidistas have descended, there are no sewage facilities and their drinking water is being drawn from a shallow water table. This is a classic condition of most Mexican towns on the Rio Grande. It gives the American tourist what we call the Aztec's Revenge, a form of paratyphoid called dysentery, accompanied by a general malaise. There is a fluid loss of several litres. In the infant paracaidistas, born poorly, that dehydration is accompanied by death."

"Tell him about the gonorrhea," the priest said.

"We believe," the doctor said, "we have isolated a unique variety on the border, one that actually sets up a rattle, a clapping, in the urethra of the victim. The literature is quite minimal now, but the journals are interested. We are all quite excited about it."

"Tell him about another area of your competence," the priest said. "The red-light district."

"That is an area of knowledge he is competent to acquire at first hand."

Two more of my informers entered the patio and we all looked across the Rio Grande at the mud mounds of our subject, the Mexican hills of the paracaidistas.

"What I resent," the Mexican-American arrival said, "is this: you see, I look Anglo. When I meet somebody for the first time and afterwards they call my house, my mother doesn't speak English and they tell me they spoke to the maid. I hate that. What I enjoy—what I enjoy and I know I shouldn't, is hearing of some Anglo, some tejano, some Texan, getting rolled in Juarez. And I know I shouldn't," the Mexican-American said, his voice alive in ecstasy. "I know I shouldn't."

"That's right," the priest said. "You shouldn't."

"What I enjoy," my other new informant began. He worked for the Poverty Program in El Paso. "What I enjoy . . . "

"He is not interested in what you enjoy," the doctor said. "He is interested in the Border Rehabilitation Program, the new Mexican image, the beautiful and well-architected buildings on the Mexican side of the new bridge, the laws closing down the bars at midnight in the poor sections, and the law forbidding women to work in bars, and something about the fact that although there is a law against everything in Texas the Texan goes to Mexico to break somebody else's."

"About laws," the American Poverty man said, "although Americans don't know it, the Juarez Mexican spends a lot of money in El Paso on clothes and food that he believes are cheaper and better in El Paso, money that could be spent on rehabilitation in Mexico. Americans don't realize what a blow the new American law was to Mexico, the one allowing the U.S. tourist to bring back only $100 worth of goods, duty free. Why, the Mexican border family spends five times that much over here every year. Also remember that the problem of Juarez is the problem of Mexico. Remember, those parachutists took off from the interior. The federal government of Mexico is trying to rehabilitate the states of Chiapas, Guerrero, Guadalajara, all the states where the paracaidistas take off. The Mexicans realize they must rehabilitate the border by rehabilitating the interior."

"That is what the alcalde, the Mayor, of Juarez told me," I said.

"Tell him about the dichotomy," the priest said.

"You mean about the thousands of Juarez people who work in El Paso, those who work in the clothing factories —that's cheap labor—and then those Mexicans that work as maids here. These maids have their own maids in Mexico. Maybe they make $15 a week here in El Paso and pay 60 pesos, that's $5 a week to their own maid in Juarez. Then there are the hungaros. The Mexicans call the gypsies hungaros, those that slip across the border to repair or buy or steal air conditioners. They will do the same with a bicycle or a baby carriage or a locomotive. Then there are the women who slip across in such a great, late condition that the American hospitals cannot refuse them, so that their baby is an American citizen like George Washington whose parents were not American either."

"No, tell him about the dichotomy," the priest said.

"It's more schizoid actually," the doctor said.

"Then it's your area of competence," the priest said to the doctor.

"Hell," the doctor said to the Mexican-American. "Go ahead."

"You mean the resentment, the schizophrenic intolerance of the Mexican national for the Americanized Mexican, based on the imagined or real arrogance, the patronizing air of the Mexican who has become an American citizen? They will abuse the Mexican-Americans, los pochos, every chance they can and arrest him in Mexico for the slightest traffic infraction. The Mexican-American too has a fear of the Mexican, an irrational need not to identify with him, like the middle-class black in the United States. He has made it up the ladder and he will not be pulled down by his own helping hand. Is that right?" the Poverty man said to the doctor.

"I will let it go," the doctor said.

"No one has told him," the Mexican priest said, "about certain things."

"As I said," the doctor said, "that is everyone's area of competence."

The area of everyone's competence begins with one drink at El Submarino, "The Eldest Bar in Mexico," where you meet Colonel Duranquense who conducts you through the potholes of the 15 Septiembre till you get to Las Noches de Oro. The master of ceremonies there, an Indian from Xolotl, introduces the "Young Virgins" who entertain. They are colleagues of his from Netzahaulcoyotl and Netzhualpilli. It is a strip tease. It is like watching the very poor undress—embarrassing.

"Of the drink you have not had enough," Duranquense tells me. A shock absorber, lost in the potholes of the Fifteenth of September, flies through the door of the Noches de Oro and the virgin from Atzayalcoatl, who is naked on stage, picks it up and takes it into the kitchen to see what it will do.

"At the moment of any," Duranquense tells me, "the ferrocarril through here will come."

"You mean the train runs through the Nights of Gold?"

"Of drinking you sufficiently have not had," Duranquense said. Señor Duranquense, before becoming whatever he was, had been a chemist at the Jose Cuervo factory in Tequila and aide-de-camp to Emiliano Zapato. Then there was something about being discovered by Adolfo Lopez Mateo and then something about political assassins and then something about starting life all over again at El Submarino, I did not take notes, and then something about norteamericanos that "I love particular of the place that you come."

"Of the place that I come is cerca de Albuquerque."

"Como no?" Duranquense said. "And why har you come?"

"To discover the rehabilitation of the border."

Duranquense embraced me like a lost chicken. "The rehabilitation you I will show, hand first." Señor Duranquense called a taxi and while they put on the wheels we bid adieu to the Señoritas Tizoc and Tlaloc Tonatzin.

"That's right to take notes," Señor Duranquense said. "Then Juarez can puts its forward foot best."

The taxi driver handed us his prison record, but they did not have any of those convict pictures they have in the back of American cabs.

"Of drinking you have had a sufficient now," Duranquense said, "to be understood with properly—understood? Understand?"

"Yes."

"To be understanded it must be visto—seen. It must be saw—seen, through the wrong end of the tequila bottle."

Juarez bleared up through the twisted windshield. Reinforcements were being rushed to the Fraccionamiento Aeropuerto through the explosions of neon and the artillery of broken glass, the shell holes of the Avenida Juarez, the mortar boom of collapsing trucks and the fire of light from the Cervecería Cruz Blanca. We made it all the way to the Hipodromo where we were detoured by the policía militaria around a new building that had collapsed from overstrain. We had to wait at the Acequía del Pueblo for a delegation to pass on its way to thank the alcalde for being born, then past the Second of April to the Fifteenth of March on the Avenida de los Insurgentes, until the Twentieth of November and the Avenida Vicente Guerrero, which can easily be confused by an extranjero because it shares the same hole as the Avenida José Borunda. There was a flagging mass—a mass of flags, celebrating the rehabilitatión ultimo, then the taxi swam the Avenida Ignacio de la Peña where it sprang a leak under the rear thwart on which we were sitting. When we burst on the centro commercial and at last in front of the Escuela de Agricultura, we paid a man for the car wash.

"Everyone is making it through tonight, Señor. Can I sell you a motor for your engine?"

Now we were at the Casa de las Virgenes where the rehabilitation of the border particularly had down clamped, and you had to enter through an underground garage, got in an elevator, and so went up the front stairs and entered a room that was sprinkled with spattered glass and swollen mirrors which gave the effect of Versailles the day after the Revolution. The girls were sitting around in sundry no costumes. Here is where you saw the full effect, el efecto ultimo, of the cleanup border.

"You see, Señor," Señor Duranquense told me, "a nice, a clean, a nice clean place. Clean nice girls. Shot through every Thursday with penicillino, clean everything. When I was young once every Thursday I came, but now everything is different. It is all up cleaned. I will introduce to you here, to Señorita Ronquilla Revilligedo."

We ordered a tequila that was brought in a Foremost milk carton.

"Everything up cleaned, Señor," and Señorita Ronquilla Revilligedo told me the story of her life, which was from Programa Reforma Diez, Reform Program Ten, to Programa Reforma Ochenta y dos, Reform Program Eighty-two. The story of her life was the reforms of Juarez, the history of Mexico.

"We must have another drink, Señor. Juarez must be seen through the wrong end of a Foremost milk carton."

We were back in the taxi now on the craters of the Calzada de las Américas, dive bombed in the Bernaldo Sebastian and gassed in the Bravo Nicolas by an escaping métro de gaz that had busted. On the Calle de Tenal a man in a twisted mustache approached the car with a flame-thrower in which he was roasting burning chestnuts and at the Carmona Damian young boys in secondhand fire suits fined us for going through a red-light district, and at the Calzado del Parque someone threw a bomb that exploded in a jacaranda tree and scattered the birds all over the Caranza Emilio. On the Carretera de Casas Grandes all flags were out to celebrate a victory over the dead at the Panteon Municipal. We got back to the fortifications at El Submarino Bar just in time to be rolled by the bartender who assured us that in Mexico we were not against discriminated.

I got away without Señor Duranquense and walked by myself down the tracks of the Ferrocarril Federal de Méjico into the paling and sobering light of morning in Mexico, past the place that called itself the Rancho del Charro and past the place that called itself Fraccionamento del Mirador, past the Palo Chino. Then I arrived at a place that I knew, a place that I was familiar of which, but I was sobering now and I realized it was a place with which I was familiar, the Colonía de las Paracaidistas and the villa of Pancho.

Pancho was nowhere to be seen and the villa of Pancho looked like every other villa of Pancho's. All the villas were exactly the same mud hut, the same creation of despair.

"Did you have a tour of the night?"

"Yes."

It was Pancho.

We walked to the front of his villa where we could see down to all I had seen closely from below.

"Do not say nothing now, Señor. Do not go home with this."

"Then with what?"

"Espere, Señor. Wait."

"For what?"

"For the paracaidistas, Señor."

"You mean the power you will it seize?"

"Si, Señor."

"And the reforms you will make?"

"La reforma ultima que dura siempre a la gloria de Méjico, hasta el tiempo de todos nuestros muchachos."

"The ultimate reforma that will endure forever into the times of our children."

"Si, Señor. Las paracaidistas," and he said the word with pride and with all the quiet peasant assurance of the man for whom the town beneath was named, that gentle Indio who had subdued darker darks, conquered blacker blacks than this—the man, legend and myth, the hero, the saint: Benito Juarez.

HIGH NOON AT CATHOLIC U.

MELVIN I. UROFSKY

Mr. Urofsky, an assistant professor at the State University of New York at Albany, is co-editor of the Louis D. Brandeis Letters.

The American Association of University Professors has quietly begun an investigation of academic freedom at the Catholic University of America in Washington. The move is unprecedented because, although the AAUP not infrequently protests arbitrary administration procedures, this is the first time that it has looked into the censure of a dissident teacher by his colleagues. The question at issue is whether academic freedom is any the less violated when attempts to restrict it come from one's fellow academics rather than from school administrators.

Catholic University in Washington is a key unit of American Catholic higher education, in that it provides most of the teachers and administrators for other parochial colleges. Last January, its faculty of the Graduate School of Arts and Sciences voted to censure Dr. Joseph M. Hernon, a graduate of Catholic University—he received his Ph.D. at Trinity College, Dublin—for allegedly bringing the good name of the school into disrepute by "wholesale charges of religious bias." Hernon's struggle indicates how slowly, if at all, the spirit of modernism is creeping into church-dominated education.

In the spring of 1966, a permanent position opened in the History Department for a medievalist. After suitable search, the members of the department decided that the best man was Dr. Richard Kay, now a visiting professor at the University of Kansas. However, when the department chairman, Dr. Manoel Cardozo, presented Kay's name to the administration, he was informed that Kay would be unacceptable because he had been divorced and remarried. Kay is a member of the Episcopalian Church which permits divorce. It should also be pointed out that the department and the administration at C. U. admitted that Kay had always been the faculty's favored candidate.

Faced with the rector's veto, the department hired a priest as lecturer for one year until it could settle upon a candidate of whom the administration would approve. During the summer, the rector privately informed a clerical member of the department that Kay's divorce would no longer be an impediment. Accordingly, the chairman resubmitted his name in the fall, but this time the board of trustees turned him down. (The board consists of thirty-three bishops and eleven laymen.) Shortly thereafter, a directive was issued instructing the History Department to hire "a Catholic if possible" for the vacancy.

Upon receipt of this news, Hernon asked the department chairman if he were going to accept such an order. Dr. Cardozo said he would; in fact, he said, he was about to call a potential candidate in Florida to see if he was a baptized Catholic. Hernon pointed out that in addition to Kay, the department had considered three other historians. Two of them were Jewish, and the third, a Protestant, held a prestigious Sterling Fellowship at Yale. Did the directive automatically disqualify all of them? Cardozo said it did.

Hernon, who had already led a walkout at a faculty meeting in protest against arbitrary administration policy, told Cardozo that he could not in conscience accept such a policy. It was, Hernon declared, an insult to the university faculty, a mockery of the ecumenical spirit of the Vatican Council, and degradation of the whole concept of collegiate education. If nothing were done to resist it, he promised, he would bring the directive to the attention of the press.

It was this decision to go to the papers that upset the conservative members of the administration and the arts faculty. But, as Hernon explained later, there was no other recourse. The full professors in the department, the only ones who ultimately vote on appointments, were used to accepting orders from above. In 1966, when some faculty members had wanted to protest the award of an honorary degree to Archbishop Bryan J. McEntegart of Brooklyn, because of his role in the St. John's dispute, senior professors had quickly quashed the move as "impolitic." This and similar experiences with both the faculty and the administration convinced Hernon that only outside pressure and publicity would help.

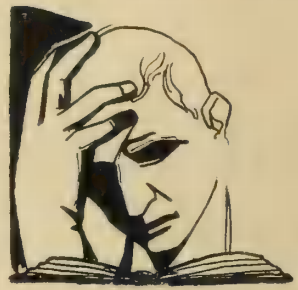
On Sunday, January 22, the story broke on the front page of The New York Times. The next day, the Rev. Patrick O'Boyle (recently elevated to Cardinal, and bishop of Washington) came to the Catholic campus to express in person his displeasure—with both Hernon and the publicity—to several of the old guard on the faculty. The full professors, supposedly on their own initiative, then met and decided that they would censure Hernon at the monthly meeting of the Graduate School, to be held the next day.

Shortly after the Tuesday meeting opened, the dean of the Graduate School, James P. O'Connor, recognized Dr. Theodore Litovitz of the Physics Department. Litovitz then read a long "open letter" to Hernon, in which he declared that everybody was well treated at the university, and abused Hernon as a religious bigot. No copy of this letter was put into the minutes, nor was one ever delivered to Hernon. For that matter, no one had seen to it that Hernon would be present. It was by chance that he came that day.

Other full professors joined the attack. One denounced the "scavengers" of the press; another lectured Hernon that "going to the press is going to the devil." The administration and the trustees did not like their policy to be publicized. Catholics' hiring practices run counter not only to those of most secular schools but also to those of the better parochial colleges. The faculty, in turn, resented Hernon's exposure of its weak and servile position.

Caught unawares, Hernon attempted to defend himself by challenging the older professors to dispute his statement. He had made no charges of prejudice or bias, but had merely stated that he opposed the arbitrary and irrational policy of the administration. No such attempt was made, considerations of truth or falsity being irrelevant in the minds of these scholars and teachers. By a vote of 69 to 19 (less than half of the faculty was in attendance, although most of the full professors had shown up), Hernon was censured for taking his story to the press.

Immediately after this vote, Hernon rose to make a motion. He proposed that the faculty show that it would not accept dictation on appointments by approving a statement he had just jotted down. In essence, Hernon asked that the faculty make clear that it would accept no administrative directives aimed at disqualifying applicants for teaching positions "on any other than professional grounds." Such a policy was supposed to be in effect already at Catholic, and approval of the motion would have merely reconfirmed it. The resolution was tabled.



On March 14, the History Department tried to lay the medieval appointment to rest with a diplomatic compromise. Dr. Cardozo announced that since they "had to hire a Catholic," he had offered the post to a Catholic scholar whose specialty is the rather innocuous (and definitely noncontroversial) canonization of Edward the Confessor. But, in order to demonstrate their "liberalism," the full professors had offered the post in Renaissance and Reformation history to a Protestant.

Unfortunately for the peace of mind of Dr. Cardozo, the historian so chosen not only had no credentials but was a defrocked Episcopalian priest, who had been jailed in Scotland for bigamy and was currently under arrest for deportation. Moreover, much to Cardozo's chagrin, it was Hernon who had discovered this information at a historians' convention.

The AAUP will, it is reported, attempt to make the dean of the Graduate School admit that Hernon had been denied due process of law. Hernon had not been informed in advance of the contemplated censure; he was never given a hearing nor even a copy of the charges. Had he not been at the meeting, there is little doubt that the old guard would have denounced him in absentia. While the AAUP approach is aimed at the narrowest procedural grounds, it nonetheless moves the organization into a new area of investigation, and has broad implications for academic freedom in general, and Catholic education in particular.

It might be thought that dissident voices in academic communities would have little to fear from their colleagues, supposedly dedicated to truth and individuality. Yet in some institutions, as a result of political or religious pressures, diffident faculties have been used as censors by strong administrations. This is what concerns the AAUP at Catholic University, for few doubt that the faculty acted in collusion with the administration.

As for Hernon, he is concerned for the future of Catholic higher education in the United States. He is but one of a growing number of young liberals who are attempting to modernize the church and church education from within, and who have taken Pope Paul's words at face value. Hernon says:

> The question remains whether a real university should allow any considerations other than professional qualifications to affect its hiring practices. Should history, for instance, be taught as a branch of sectarian apologetics? Some have maintained that this university, because it is Catholic, has a right to practice discrimination. . .in "sensitive areas." This is true in the sense that Catholic University has a right to choose to be something other than a university. Insofar as it seeks to maintain these insular and paternalistic ways, it departs from the way of what most people, in 1967, call a university and becomes something very much like a plain-clothes seminary.

The question confronting Catholic University, and other parochial colleges, is whether or not, as George Bernard Shaw once noted, a "Catholic University" is a contradiction in terms.

THAILAND: WHERE WE CAME IN

ROBERT BUCKHOUT

A little noticed column in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch this summer carried the news of an emergency request by the Thailand Government for more helicopters to fight insurgents. The alleged increase in insurgent activity may call for further increase of the already large U.S. commitment of up to 40,000 military men. Sensing in such reports from Thailand a possible parallel to Vietnam of about 1961, the Foreign Policy Roundtable at Washington University in St. Louis had called a conference in May of anthropologists, political scientists and journalists, expert in the area, to discuss present conditions in Thailand and the effects of our involvement on Thai culture and on the course of foreign policy in Southeast Asia.

In 1966, the Foreign Policy Roundtable was instrumental in producing Politics of Escalation in Vietnam (Fawcett Premier Books and Beacon Press), an analysis of the relationships between attempts to negotiate a Vietnamese settlement and military escalation by the United States. The proceedings of the present conference will be part of a similar book, designed to acquaint the American people with the complexities of Thailand in the face of growing U.S. involvement there.

The following article summarizing the content of the conference is by Robert Buckhout of the Department of Psychology, Washington University, who is serving as editor of the forthcoming volume. However, the views expressed here are the author's and do not necessarily reflect those of individual participants or of the Roundtable.

Long clouded by semi-official secrecy, the extent of the build-up of United States involvement in Thailand is now becoming visible:

- Thailand has become a landlocked aircraft carrier for up to 80 per cent of the missions flown by U.S. (and recently Australian) Air Force bombers against targets in North Vietnam and Laos. B-52 bombers now fly out of Thailand on bombing missions.
- U.S. troops numbering 40,000 are stationed in Thailand (2,000 were there in 1961), principally in direct support of the air bases and logistical network involved in the bombing program. Military aid to Thailand is publicly acknowledged to be $60 million per year. Supplies, weapons and bases have been positioned in advance to accommodate one 17,000-man U.S. combat division when necessary.
- Military advisers, ex-FBI men, CIA personnel, the Green Berets and an unknown portion of the 40,000 U.S. military troops are involved in training Thai military and police forces to cope with alleged Communist-led insurgent movements in Northeastern and Southern Thailand. This counterinsurgency program was until recently under the command of Maj. Gen. Richard G. Stilwell, who directed similar efforts in Vietnam in 1961.

As in Vietnam, it has been recognized that the 95,000-man Thai army was shaped by years of U.S. military assistance into a cumbersome World War II-like army capable of fighting small conventional battles, but unsuited for anti-guerrilla or pacification operations. Efforts to restyle the Thai military meet resistance from the officer ranks, since the large units and conventional arms are politically useful for gaining privileges, promotions and power.

- U.S. helicopter pilots have flown Thai soldiers into action in the Northeast pending the training of Thai helicopter pilots.
- The United States Information Service (USIS) and other U.S. agencies, are engaged in intensive propaganda efforts through television, radio and mobile information teams in rural areas, to trumpet the virtues of the present Thai Government. This is the political side of the counterinsurgency (COIN) program. The United States Operations Mission (USOM), deploying an annual $42-million economic aid program, pushes the Accelerated Redevelopment Program (ARD) to raise living standards in the rural areas. It hopes thus to reduce grievances before they can be exploited by the insurgents. ARD has replaced the "resettlement" of tribes in the Northeast, a program that was similar in concept to the "strategic hamlets" of Vietnam. Social scientists are conducting studies all over Thailand, the sponsors including the Advanced Research Projects Agency (ARPA), the Stanford-Research Institute, RAND and hardware manufacturers such as Ford-Philco. The CIA program is headed by Peer De Silva, former CIA chief in Saigon.

Part of the many-sided U.S. program is intended to combat "internal Communist aggression." The impoverished Northeast sector, long neglected by Bangkok governments, is regarded as "security sensitive" because of a long history of estrangement, an immediate threat of insurgency—and the location there recently of Air Force bases used to bomb North Vietnam. At the Foreign Policy Roundtable Conference, participants described the Northeastern insurgents as principally Thais who are alienated from the Bangkok government.

The U.S. State Department, in its latest bulletin on the subject, estimates the number of insurgents in the Northeast to be less than 1,000, but growing. They are said to be organized as the Thai Patriotic Front, and to be engaging in propaganda and selective assassination. These charges are debatable, since banditry and rough politics are common in the Northeast. Other official sources state that the insurgents receive aid, training and leadership cadres from North Vietnam, Laos and China. In addition, a clandestine radio, "The Voice of Thailand," is reported to be operating from Southern China.

Since some 40,000 North Vietnamese refugees (along with other nonassimilated groups) live in Northeast Thailand, a remote area of poor farm land and ill-patrolled borders, it is clear that the Bangkok government has little effective control of the region. The insurgents capitalize on years of government neglect and harsh treatment of the peasants.

Similarly, the permeable borders of Southern Thailand aggravate a situation in which a nonassimilated Malay population, with its own Muslim religion, and the remnants of an old Malayan Communist revolutionary group, contribute another security problem. One conferee reported that the Thai Government control of the South is so ineffective that the insurgents allegedly roam about collecting taxes, demanding food and shelter in return for guarantees of safety. As the speaker noted, when Thai control does extend into remote areas, the local population is subject to the same demands from the Thai police.

Past Thai political efforts to assimilate the Malayans have been ineffective, hampered as they are by a language barrier, a history of Thai indifference and harsh treatment, and the occasional outbreak of violent movements seeking independence or union with Malaysia. Military forces sent against the insurgents, in conjunction with Malaysia, have failed even to find the insurgents, whose numbers are estimated variously from a few hundred to 1,500. The conferees tended to believe that the size of the Southern insurgent movement had not increased significantly since 1950. Recent newspaper and magazine stories, on the other hand, speak of greatly increased activity and a possible link-up of the Southern and Northeastern insurgencies.

Most of the conferees felt that the effect to date of these insurgencies was relatively small, but that, considering the basic problems confronting Thailand and the nature of its government, they posed a potentially serious threat to the regime. As one speaker pointed out, an insurgency of sufficient scope to topple the Bangkok government might be far beyond the capacities of the dissident elements, but an effort of much smaller magnitude could render large sections of the country ungovernable for a long period of time. A far more immediate threat is the possibility of mortar attacks or sabotage against U.S. air bases. Some doubt was expressed, however, as to the accuracy of reports on the degree of Communist control over the insurgents, it being a suggestion that certain Thai leaders might be exaggerating the Communist menace in order to stimulate more U.S. military assistance.

Since most of the conferees were social scientists, much attention was devoted to describing the social structure of Thailand, the way American influences interact with it and the social disequilibrium that results from the presence of the U.S. military in considerable numbers.

Into a stable economy has come an influx of money, jobs and opportunity related to the military build-up by the U.S. Bangkok is now the rest and recuperation center for Vietnamese GIs who come in at the rate of 700 per day. The adornment of Thai cities with bars for Americans, the increases in prostitution, the attraction of young educated Thais to lucrative jobs with American firms, are conspicuous examples of the social malaise which, while it did not begin with the arrival of the GIs, is exacerbated by their presence.

As more Americans become advisers at all levels of the Thai bureaucracy (whose officials are appointed by the junta) they become increasingly frustrated by the Thai's lack of administrative coordination and efficiency. While Thais prefer to receive specific technical training, the Americans prefer to suggest better ways of organization. This conflicts with the Thai reluctance to question administrative superiors. The Americans don't want to let Thailand drift into the chaos of Vietnam but, in the opinion of some of the conferees, the size and the disruptive potential of the U.S. economic and military aid program may threaten the very order that such a program was intended to preserve.

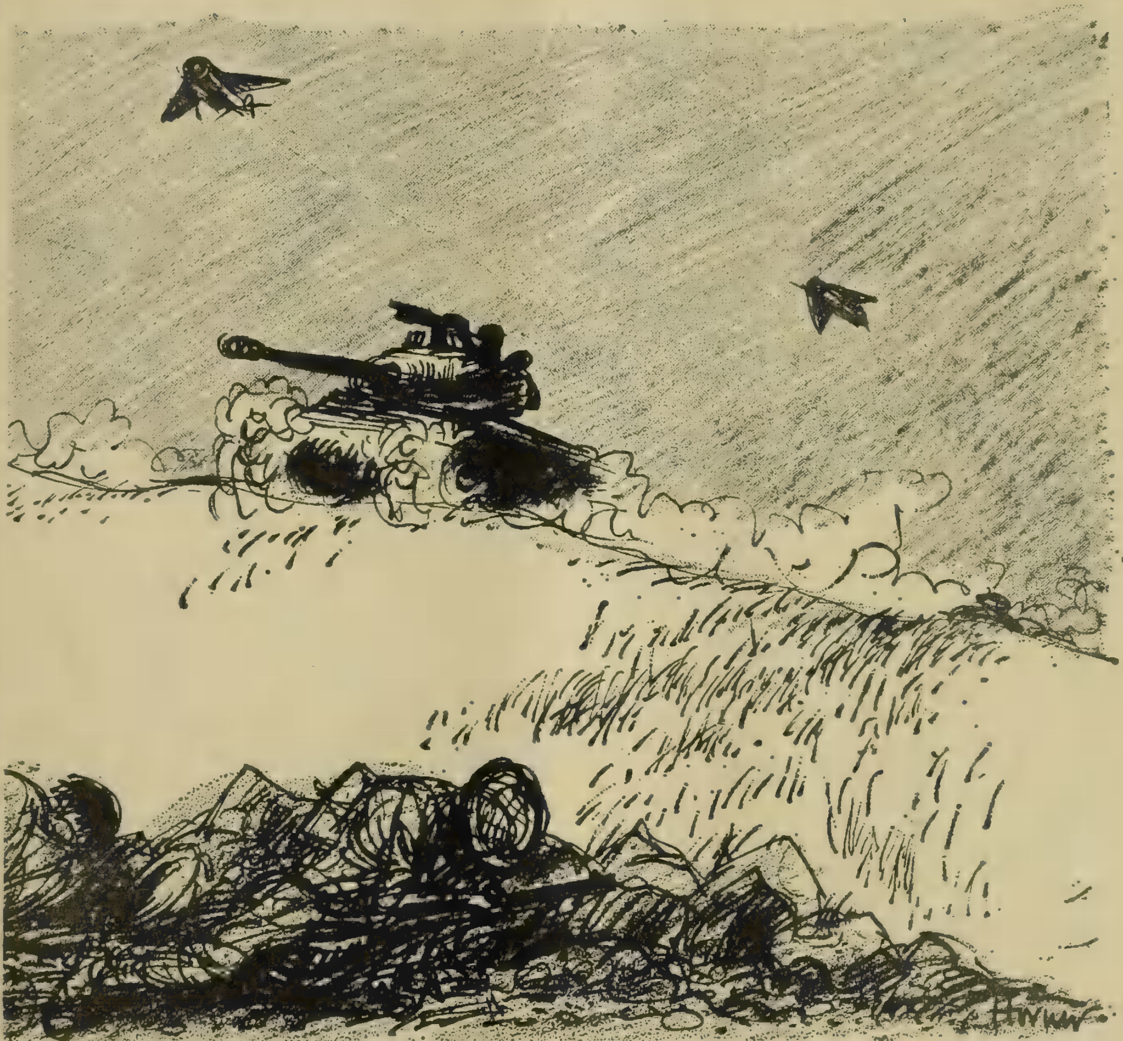
One anthropologist described the social order of Thailand as a bundle of fine gold independent chains. The vertical organization of Thailand's social order leads to patterns in which Thais look upward for help from powerful, superior figures—topped by the king. One speaker pointed out that U.S. military aid has made the Pentagon the benefactor of people in the Thai military chain. These men, faithful to their social precepts, accept gratefully the largess of a benefactor. What the benefactor wishes then becomes a dependent's amiable duty to provide, for to question threatens the integrity of the chains. Thus, when Washington proposes to build airfields, to man them with Americans, and to fly bombers for the Vietnamese War, the Thai military could not say no. Another speaker, however, noted that the Thai military might also be motivated to join with the United States by their traditional hostility to the Vietnamese.

An inevitable result of the U.S. military assistance program has been to strengthen the military chains and to corrode the integrity of other chains. Recently, in a move toward "efficiency," the Minister of the Interior and army commander, Gen. Praphat Charusathien, took over the elementary school system from the Ministry of Education. Thus, a military man now controls the civil service division which has the most direct political effect on all segments of the population. General Praphat is reputedly the strong man in the Thai Government whose ascent may reflect a shift in emphasis from political reforms in rural areas to more vigorous military action against insurgents. It was he who issued the recent urgent call for more helicopters.

The uniqueness of Thailand has historically been its nationalism and the conduct of a foreign policy designed to insure its independence. Stability has depended upon the ability of any Thai regime to mobilize nationalistic sentiment. The folk heroes of the Thai population are low-born heroes who threw off foreign conquerors. One anthropologist emphasized that the U.S. military presence imperils the plausibility of the governments' claim to be the sole custodian of Thai national symbols and traditions. The visibility of Americans lends credence to the Peking radio charge that Thailand politicians are lackeys of the United States.

Social change has been occurring in Thailand which will invariably bring about new developments and considerable fluidity in a society whose institutions have been stable and relatively undemanding, at least to the average villager. The anthropologist pointed out that modernization itself produces institutional transformation and social and personal dislocation. In Thailand, for example, it has meant an increase in landlessness among peasants.

However, this same speaker doubted that the social changes taking place, independent of the war in Southeast Asia, would yield directly to plans and predictions derived from U.S. understanding of situations alien to the Thai situation—such as the economic-military redevelopment program in Vietnam. As a Thai spokesman pointed out, the effort in Vietnam involves the virtual building of a nation from scratch. In Thailand, on the contrary, excluding the regional splinter groups, a sense of nationhood has existed for centuries. The particular government in power may now be expected by the people to deliver some of the services it is promising, but, despite the impatience of American advisers, the cohesive, proud,



New Statesman

Hardware by the Big Powers; Software by the Small

Thai culture does not need, nor is it likely to tolerate, the sort of complete societal remodeling that has been resorted to in Vietnam. Thai nationalism doesn't have to be created—it is there.

The spectacle of a Bangkok government totally committing itself to the foreign policy of the United States may well create conditions which could be exploited by insurgents who remain identified with nationalistic symbols.

The United States is in Thailand at the request of the Thai Government. This familiar phrase is the keystone to a brand of flexible diplomacy which has permitted the United States to escalate its military involvement in Thailand almost without discussion at home. It has also meant a reversal of the 700-year-old Thai "bamboo policy"—that is, bending with the wind.

Both the build-up of U.S. forces, and the details of military and economic assistance programs between the two governments were kept secret for some time. In a little publicized step, Dean Rusk and Foreign Minister Thanat Khoman signed a joint statement on March 6, 1962, reinterpreting and making bilateral the SEATO treaty. This document is now cited as the authority for the U.S. aid program. The agreement came in for considerable discussion at the Foreign Policy Roundtable.

Article 4 of the SEATO treaty declares that the signers (Australia, Great Britain, France, New Zealand, Pakistan, Thailand, the Philippines and the United States) shall by unanimous agreement act to meet common danger and immediately report the steps taken to the Security Council of the United Nations. The United States was thus committed under the treaty to the collective defense of member nations, including Thailand.

The Rusk-Khoman agreement effectively amends the SEATO treaty by stipulating that the obligation to "meet the common danger in accordance with its constitutional processes . . . does not depend upon the prior agreement of all other parties to the treaty, since this treaty obligation is individual as well as collective." In effect, this means that the United States knows that it could never get the votes of France and Pakistan to intervene in Thailand—especially when the SEATO treaty is interpreted by the Rusk-Khoman agreement as providing "an important basis for U.S. actions to help Thailand meet indirect aggression." The U.S. also pledged itself to preserve the independence and integrity of Thailand and help it meet Communist subversion.

It need hardly be pointed out that the steps taken to enlarge the U.S. military commitment in Thailand were largely unknown to the Americans (or Thais). Obviously, the U.S. Government has done almost nothing to publicize either the extent or the purpose of the build-up. Just how the independence of Thailand can be preserved by converting the country into a forward base for U.S. strategic policy is unclear. Thai and U.S. Government officials maintain that while the United States is doing the bombing of North Vietnam from Thailand, the Thai military has the main responsibility in the counterinsurgency effort. U.S. forces are acting as advisers under standing orders not to engage in combat—so says the official State Department paper.

However, The New York Times carried a story on November 26, 1966, that U.S. military advisers were at that time accompanying lower-level Thai units on anti-guerrilla sweeps, as well as flying helicopters.

Thus, as in Vietnam in 1961, U.S. military forces have become exposed as "noncombatants," with an excellent chance of being dragged into a hot war against Thai insurgents if an American were killed or a U.S. helicopter shot down. This potential, coupled with the vague wording of the Rusk-Khoman agreement, suggests that the United States commitment to the Thai military regime is as open-ended as the one woven out of the Eisenhower letter to President Diem in Vietnam.

When a former State Department official, who helped draft the Rusk-Khoman agreement, was asked at the conference to speculate on what the United States would do if the insurgency flared up to where American air bases were being attacked, he asserted that Thai police and armed forces could handle that sort of situation; but he later conceded that we might reach the point, as we did in 1965 in Vietnam, where we would have to make the choice between wading in or pulling out.

But is there still a real choice? The question in the minds of many at the conference was whether we had not already committed ourselves to defend the stability of the Thai military dictatorship against any threat, whether from outside military forces or internal political ones. Had we not, by placing vital military bases in Thailand, defined the status quo in terms of the present regime, whether or not it is responsive to the social changes going on in Thailand or to the needs that these changes create for its people? Is there some threshold to be reached, as in Vietnam, where the threat to U.S. interests will cause us to cease trusting the Thais and gradually take over the military and then the political jobs of counterinsurgency? Will we not then be tempted to line up with the strong man who takes a clear anti-Communist stand, regardless of his sensitivities toward the needs of the Thai people?

These are largely unanswerable questions, but as speculations based on the Vietnamese experience they are reasonable. Thailand no longer conducts an independent foreign or even domestic policy. The Thais proudly assert that they could send the Yankees home if they wished. But, would the United States leave, or would it permit anti-U.S. political factions to gain power? Even now, a governmental decree provides penalties and censorship if a paper publishes "any matter defamatory or contemptuous of the nation or Thai people . . . or any matter capable of causing the respect and confidence of foreign countries in regard to Thailand, the Thai Government or Thai people in general to diminish." The United States, despite its desire to support democratic governments, is tied to the defense of yet another dictatorship whose indifference to its rural population has contributed many of the problems that the U.S. is being asked to solve.

But, as one speaker pointed out at the conference (quoting the current ambassador to Thailand, William Martin), U.S. soldiers are being committed to die for the Thailand dictatorship. The depth of this commitment has not yet been discussed openly in the United States.

Lasky-Lasch Exchange

London

Dear Sirs: Christopher Lasch's 15-page article on "The Cultural Cold War" (Sept. 11) is much more an expression of his political passions and personal animus than it is an analysis of the real world. Because of its length, which is in inverse relation to its understanding of the situations, motives and organizations to which it refers, its pervasive and tendentious misinterpretations could be corrected only at a length greater than your correspondence columns allow or the intellectual inadequacy of the performance merits.

Nonetheless, your readers might appreciate a few instances of Mr. Lasch's lighthearted irresponsibility in his treatment of the facts as they relate to me personally.

(1) Mr. Lasch writes that in 1947 "Lasky led a walk-out of anti-Communists from a cultural meeting in the Russian sector of Berlin." This is false. I did no such thing, and no such thing happened. The facts are: I was invited as a free-lance American journalist to make a brief talk to the first postwar German Writers Congress and I did so. Inasmuch as my theme was the need to resist all forms of censorship anywhere, my talk was (given the Russian venue) controversial and there was vigorous discussion. Full and accurate accounts of the matter were published in The New York Times and other easily accessible sources, and a few minutes of research in a library would have enabled anybody to get the facts straight.

(2) Mr. Lasch writes that I, together with certain other persons, "had all been Communists during the thirties." This is false. I have never been a Communist. Doesn't Professor Lasch ever observe any of the elementary rules of evidence for establishing a fact?

(3) Mr. Lasch quotes a sentence from the former CIA official Thomas Braden to the effect that "[an] agent became an editor of Encounter." With a disregard for evidence that one hopes doesn't characterize the rest of his historical writings, Mr. Lasch goes on gratuitously to suggest that I might have been such an "agent" who became an editor of Encounter. This is false. I have already stated publicly (London Times, May 9) that Braden's allegation was untrue. Braden has also publicly explained (and it is characteristic of Lasch's method that he quotes Braden to suggest a point that Braden himself seriously qualified and in effect withdrew) that by an "agent" he also meant "unwitting" persons (New York Times, May 8); according to this definition, obviously, half of Europe's intellectuals, lawyers, journalists and trade unionists were "agents" who "worked for the CIA." In 1958, when I became an editor of Encounter, at the invitation of the then co-editors, I had no knowledge of the CIA's involvement and was, then as now, nobody's agent. For ten years I had been editing Der Monat in Berlin, until 1954 for the USIA, and thereafter (after a brief losing battle with McCarthyism) under a direct Ford Foundation grant. As I have also publicly stated, when I subsequently became aware that some of the grants which various U.S. donors gave to the Congress for Cultural Freedom to help subsidize Encounter's publishing deficit were not in fact private but covert governmental funds, I did everything in my power to end this. In 1964, Cecil Harmsworth King and the Daily Mirror group in London took over the financial sponsorship of Encounter.

(4) Mr. Lasch, trying to demonstrate his untenable thesis that Encounter pursued an uncritical political line, writes: "Writers in Encounter denounced the Soviet intervention in Hungary without drawing the same conclusions about the Bay of Pigs." This is false. In July, 1961, Encounter published a 15,000-word analysis by Theodore Draper criticizing the "perfect failure" of U.S. policy toward Cuba; in the next number Anthony Hartley explained, from a British writer's viewpoint, why the "disastrous adventure" was shocking, illegal and wrong. In July, 1964, Encounter published a 9,000-word article by Herbert L. Matthews, entitled "Dissent over Cuba," protesting the perils of non-conformity" in the U.S. and the dangers of dissent which he himself and other friends of Castro's Cuba had experienced. At the time of the Bay of Pigs I co-signed a statement (Encounter, July, 1961) criticizing "direct (or, for that matter, 'indirect') U.S. military intervention in Caribbean affairs," calling it "as indefensible as it is tragic." Mr. Lasch is so clearly incompetent in ascertaining elementary facts which are essential to his argument that readers might well reflect on the reliability of his interpretation of much more complex events and attitudes when he has not been responsible enough to document even simpler ones with any degree of accuracy.

(5) Mr. Lasch writes: "Lasky's resignation was . . . rejected by the management of Encounter." This is false. No such thing happened. There was no resignation and no rejection. Once again a few simple inquiries would have been sufficient to establish the true facts.

What is true is that Encounter (with myself as one of its editors) has continued — as an independent journal of discussion and comment, then as now beholden to no one, uninfluenced by patrons or publishers, its pages open to the widest variety of views, and in which no idea or culture or governmental policy, East or West (including the United States), has been immune from criticism. What it publishes in any monthly number is, and has always been, determined solely by the personal ideas, beliefs and prejudices of its own editors and contributors. Melvin J. Lasky

Evanston, Ill.

Dear Sirs:

(1) I was misinformed about the "walk-out," and Mr. Lasky is right that I should have checked this fact, although it has no bearing on the main points raised in my essay.

(2) I am, of course, glad to accept Mr. Lasky's correction but the statement to which he refers was based on H. P. Trevor-Roper's account of the Berlin Congress which appeared in the Manchester Guardian Weekly, July 20, 1950, whose accuracy I had no reason to question.

(3) The article in The New York Times, to which Mr. Lasky refers (May 8), reads: "Mr. Braden refused to name the CIA 'agents' in the congress or the magazine, nor would he describe what kind of agents he meant. The agency, he said, used the term 'agent' to describe both 'witting' and 'unwitting' operatives. But the article in The Saturday Evening Post clearly implies that the persons involved were 'agents' before they were 'placed' in the congress and 'became an editor' of Encounter." I see nothing in this report which entitles the reader to conclude that Braden "in effect withdrew" his earlier statement.

(4) Theodore Draper's article on Cuba criticizes American policy within the framework of cold-war assumptions. Likewise, Anthony Hartley condemned intervention as a failure, and on the curious ground that subversion of another country violated international law unless justified by internal disorder or "an almost unanimous opinion abroad of the undesirable character of a regime"; and he specifically denied any parallel between Cuba and Hungary. "American troops were not used, and the operations failed because of it. Can we imagine a genuinely imperialist regime behaving like this?" As for the Matthews article, the editors printed it with a supporting apologetic introductory note to the effect that although Matthew's views on Cuba had "been frequently criticized in Encounter, especially in Theodore Draper's articles," his "account of his opinions and tribulations, especially in the American context, seems to us a document interesting and important enough to publish and to discuss."

(5) Mr. Lasky may not have offered to resign from Encounter, as he reported, but the Times story (May 9) seems to indicate that he considered resigning, as his colleagues Spender and Kermode were urging. The Times says that he "won a vote of confidence today from the magazine's backers and decided to stay on the job." What Mr. Lasky still has not explained is why, when he came to "suspect" that "some of the foundations that were giving money to the Congress for Cultural Freedom . . . were not what they seemed," he did not confide his suspicions to his colleagues. It is hard to understand the reasons for this behavior, which is the exact opposite of what one would have expected. Christopher Lasch

Next week, space permitting, we will publish a sampling of the many comments which we have received on Mr. Lasch's article. —The Editors

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Sontag: Shaking the Tree of Death

DEATH KIT. By Susan Sontag. Farrar, Straus & Giroux. 312 pp. $5.75.

STEPHEN KOCH

Mr. Koch's essay is the second in a series of articles, wrtten mainly by younger critics, attempting to define and evaluate the form and direction being taken by contemporary American fiction. Mr. Koch teaches at the State University of New York at Stony Brook.

The glacier knocks in the cupboard,
The desert sighs in the bed,
And the crack in the tea-cup opens
A lane to the land of the dead.
Auden, "One Evening"

Susan Sontag's new novel, Death Kit, examines and analyzes what might be called the inside of a single moment and a single condition. The moment is its hero's suicide and the condition is the daily death that led him to it. The two of them together—the fistful of sleeping pills and the life—are made to look like the crack in the tea-cup in Auden's ballad, and indeed, after the reader finishes Death Kit, I suggest he look up "One Evening" for an interesting trans-formal and cross-generational bang. Inside both the suicide and the life, Miss Sontag has discovered terrorism and banality, intertwined like two dead lovers. They are Death Kit's sole links to her first novel, The Benefactor, or to the essays that made her famous. She wrote in Against Interpretation:

> Ours is indeed an age of extremity. For we live under continual threat of two equally fearful, but seemingly opposed, destinies: unremitting banality and inconceivable terror.

An ordinarily well-educated New York copywriter, a middle higher-up in an optics firm discovers the life he merely "inhabits" beginning to "run down":

> The walls sag. Empty spaces bulge between objects. The surfaces of objects sweat, thin out, buckle. The hysterical fluids of fear deposited at the core of objects ooze out along the seams. Deploying things and navigating through space becomes laborious. . . . But Diddy's [for such is his name] difficulties can't be solved by making a bigger effort. Stepped up effort won't repair his ingenious sense of incapacity, which proceeds from a hallucinated erasure of the present as it becomes past.

After Diddy's "ingenious sense of incapacity" at last eats out the bottom of things, Diddy empties a bottle of sleeping pills and is discovered beside his bed, semiconscious and retching. During the twenty minutes or so that elapse between the time an attendant slides him into the back of an ambulance and an anonymous figure ties the tag—"Dead on Arrival"—to his wrist, Diddy hallucinates the substance of Miss Sontag's novel. It takes the form of a 275-odd page narrative that transforms the ambulance ride into a banal business trip punctuated by a murder, a love affair with a blind girl, Diddy's return to New York with her, and a trip through a charnel house, during which the naked hero floats on his own dream toward his real death at the end of his ride to the hospital, and the end of all his fantasies.

Prose fiction can play with the sense of time as no more concrete medium can do. Death Kit opens up a moment in the mind of a man who knows he is going to die in a matter of minutes, and it turns that moment into a story which, naturally, takes several hours to read and which accounts for six or eight months added to Diddy's life. Time is diffracted into three separate beams: a single moment is turned into reading time, and reading time, in turn, simulates the time the story claims to cover. But the moment thus expanding and contracting is not just any one: it is the moment of death, transformed into a life—a life which in turn crawls back, without pausing, toward death. Because all novels deal with a sequence of events, all novels must be "about" time; but Death Kit is also about a physical and spiritual condition. It is about being moribund:

> It's those who know themselves to be merely the custodians or lessors of their lives who make up the roster of prospective suicides. Knowing one has a life induces the temptation to give it up. One is dead. Therefore, one wants to die. Equally, one wants to be born.

Miss Sontag is much more interested in spiritual death than she is in physical mortality or even physicality itself, and that fact gives her book an allegorical quality. She is primarily concerned with the way people lower themselves to the end of their own rope; she describes those whose quiet desperation has reached the point of mute hysteria:

> Worn out, he finally tosses the paper on the floor; sleeps; dreams . . . the nervous raw music filters into Diddy's ears. He opens his eyes and it begins again, for early morning is the other worst time. At the open window, pulling the blinds before he dresses. In front of the bathroom mirror minutes later, shaving. The lethal invitation of windows and mirrors.

The mute hysteria leads to terror. Diddy's mind excursion toward the end includes a murder which he commits for no reason at all, bashing in the head of a railroad workman who is repairing the tracks in front of a stalled train on which Diddy has been riding:

> Diddy yells and brings the crowbar down on the back of the man's head. Diddy groans, the man groans. Diddy's hands tingle from the blow. Letting the crowbar drop, he flexes his cramped fingers. Which don't respond. Has to unlock the fingers of his right hand with his left, the fingers of his left hand with his right. Poor dry throbbing fingers.

Death Kit ends in terror as well, when Diddy returns several months later to the scene of his crime and finds the same workman again, on the same tracks. Diddy again murders him:

> Incardoma throws his hands up to his head, sways, pivots, his knees bending; then collapses to the ground. Lying there, huddled. His shattered head pours forth blood, brains, bits of bone, something that looks like dirty water. There's no doubt this time.

All this violence ends in some oddly anodyne horror: a tour through a vast charnel house, where Diddy seems not so much frightened as soothed and amused, as if he were surrounded by gentle companions:

> The temptation to touch was irresistible. Where touch was possible. Diddy reached out gingerly to several of the open coffins and stroked the withered, dusty faces.

Banality breeds with terror: creates it and is created by it. Miss Sontag's treatment of banality is in some ways the most surprising and original aspect of Death Kit—original, I mean, to our current situation and surprising because almost nothing she has done before prepares the reader for the attitude toward it expressed here. The thick choking gas she shows dulling Diddy's life comes not so much from the familiar as the unintelligent, and she is plainly much less interested in a Baudelairean release from an empty world than she is in ridiculing and preventing that form of escape called stupidity. Somewhere in Susan Sontag a highly austere classicist carries on a complicated argument with a more exorbitant artist of sensory extremes, and over a long stretch of Death Kit that classicist is winning the fight. She answers to the muse of satire; she casts a cold eye on the world's knaves and fools. The rhythm of this art is not the rhythm of a dream or of imaginative release. It is based on the precept, the epigram, the sharp retort:

> "But godamn it," Diddy cried, "you can't be right all the time!"
> "Why not?" said Hester.
>
> "Why not?" Diddy repeats incredulously.
> "What do you think, Dalton? That being right is something democratic? A guarantee that you can be right half the time and I can be right the other half? Darling, it isn't like that—except when it is. And with us, it isn't."

Jane Austen is the presiding genius of such writing, not Baudelaire, a fact I wouldn't linger over except for a strange detail which Miss Sontag has written into this violent book. Diddy entertains his blind girl friend by reading Emma out loud. What a novel for such a man to be reading—and in such a book! When you first come across the passage you are likely to laugh out loud. But as things proceed, the logic of the detail becomes more apparent, as do Miss Sontag's links with the author of Pride and Prejudice: most of Death Kit moves from event to event according to the progressive stages in a human relationship, and not according to the rapid, violent logic of dreams.

Near the end of his dream life Diddy shouts, "I want to be seen!" The kind of mind he is calling upon is the mind that scrutinizes the world rather than attempts to transform it; one which tries to purge the fuzz of subjectivity and leave only crystalline concreteness and specific details of time, place and feeling sparkling with unmodulated presence, like a piece of music in which each separate instrument is heard in its special timbre, resonance and intensity. Rather than lead the mind out of banality into some more exciting Beyond, the artistic mind at work here wants to purge the smog of those Beyonds and reveal the lucidity of the here and now.

And suffering, as always, gets in the way. Why is Diddy's girl friend blind, so he cannot be "seen"? Because her eyes were put out by a madwoman. Why is his relation with her a living death that drains his life a là vampire? Because despite herself Hester is a fraud who must put a good face over the despair she basically feels, and in consequence she deprives Diddy of what this classico-fantasist sees as the emotional nourishment of the authentically Real.

And yet Diddy loves Hester on his own; he is in complicity with her falseness because he asks for it. A full half, if not two-thirds, of Death Kit explores this complicity, asking what justifiably can be asked from other people and assuming that the load of suffering carried around by each man makes unauthentic human contact inevitable, like death. This assumption makes Death Kit veer away from the classicism of its central sections and sets it loose again on the post-tragic necromancy that gives the book its title and form. A classicist like Jane Austen finds death the least interesting event in any life, having exactly the interest of a period in relation to any written sentence. But this novel seriously entertains the kind of despair that makes death the human experience.

So far as I am aware, no American novelist in recent memory has brought anything like Susan Sontag's intelligence and sophistication of world view to this subject; Death Kit stands alone as a meditation on a theme which after all hovers (particularly right now) over our society like a vile lingering odor; which is smeared across our faces with every morning newspaper; which spills out onto the living room rug every time we turn on the six o'clock news. It is a grim novel and in some ways it is even difficult to bear, but it ought to be read by anyone who follows the art and temper of our time. Rather than linger over the details that stick in my mind—the story of the wolf-boy, living in a cave; three startling, merciless satires of the middle-aged American female — I'll complain instead that the book is somewhat too long. Charlie Chaplin once remarked that after shooting a new movie he always shook the tree as hard as he possibly could, and kept only the fruit that didn't fall. Such wisdom always ought to be followed, even when one is shaking the tree of death.

NO END OF A LESSON: The Inside Story of the Suez Crisis. By Anthony Nutting. Clarkson N. Potter 205 pp. $5.

SUEZ: Ten Years After. Edited By Anthony Moncrieff. The B. B. C. Third Programme Series. British Broadcasting Corporation. 160 pp. 20s.

ALEXANDER WERTH

Suez is very much in the news again. The latest item is Mr. Levi Eshkol's explosive statement that the Suez Canal "would be Israel's best natural frontier." This is another example of that "verbal escalation" in the Middle East which is not likely to lead to any good. The Suez Canal, one bank of which is held by the Israelis, and the other by the Egyptians, has now been closed to traffic for several months; the Arab countries are, after the Khartoum conference, further than ever from recognizing the existence of the state of Israel, and no solution of the Middle East crisis, which started with the withdrawal of the UN troops at Nasser's behest, the closing by the Egyptians of the Gulf of Aqaba and what the Russians still call "Israel's aggression," is in sight.

It looked for a short time as if Nasser was seeking a "political solution" to the Egyptian-Israeli war, implying a de facto, if not de jure, recognition of Israel by Egypt; but the very suggestion of such a possibility appears to have caused the sharpest resentment in the other Arab countries (especially Syria and Algeria), and in the Egyptian army —which, in itself, threatened the very existence of the Nasser regime.

One of the most paradoxical aspects of both the 1956 and the 1967 Middle East crises is that Nasser was, in both cases, built up in the imagination of Western statesmen and of Western public opinion as the number-one bogyman of the Arab world. Both Anthony Eden and French Premier Guy Mollet started on their crazy Suez venture in 1956 on the assumption that Nasser was "the Hitler of today." Eden argued that the fatal error made in not destroying Hitler in 1936 at the time of the German reoccupation of the Rhineland or, at the latest, at the height of the Czech crisis in 1938, would not be made again in the case of Nasser, since Nasser also allegedly wanted to "conquer the world"— or at any rate the Arab world (not, by the way, quite the same thing).

Eden dreaded the loss of British influence in the Middle East; the French had more specific reasons for wanting to eliminate Nasser. In Algeria, in 1956, the war had been raging for nearly two years, and the French liked to imagine that but for Nasser, who was allegedly supplying the Algerian "rebels" with arms, and was inspiring their anti-French nationalism through Radio Cairo, the Algerian people would calmly and meekly reaccept the old French colonial order in Algeria. I remember my visit to Algiers in July of 1956. At that time Nasser had not yet nationalized the Suez Canal Company; but the French ultras were even then openly talking of a preventive war against Egypt, since the liquidation of Nasser alone, they asserted, could put an end to all their troubles in Algeria. Soon afterward I found London in a flag-waving Kiplingesque kind of mood; one lunatic, in a letter to The Times, asserted that any man whose name ended in "er" represented a mortal danger to the British Empire: Kruger, Kaiser, Hitler—and now Nasser!

Nasser is an Egyptian nationalist and represents perfectly the Egyptian people's revolt against both the humiliating British colonial regime, under which Egypt suffered for nearly a century, and against the corrupt feudalist order which continued under King Farouk and Nahas Pasha. There is, of course, no doubt that Nasser does not like Israel, which he regards as a "Western springboard" planted in the middle of the Arab world; he also resents the fact that over a million Palestinian Arabs should have been driven from their homes and should be reduced to living in a state of utter misery on meager UN charity rations in Jordan and Syria. But there is probably some truth in the Russian assessment of Nasser which I heard in Moscow a few months ago. The head of the Palestinian Arabs, who wants to "exterminate in Israel every man, woman and child the way Hitler did," was described to me as "a son of a bitch"; but Nasser, to the Russians, is still a man "with genuine statesmanlike qualities," with whom it would be possible to come to an arrangement except for the anti-Israel fanatics in Egypt and in many other Arab countries. Whether the Russians are right in saying that Nasser's move against Israel was "provoked" by Israeli incursions into Syria in April is much more dubious; but, on the other hand the Russians also admit that the destruction by the Israelis on June 5 of the Egyptian air force, was "not unprovoked": there were the threats (though not from Nasser himself) to "destroy every Jewish man, woman and child." But at the same time the Russians admit (and even complain) that they were not informed of either the withdrawal of the UN troops from Sinai or of Nasser's closing of the Gulf of Aqaba. To the Russians, in short, the responsibilities for the war are divided, and they consider that there are extremists and preventive-war extremists on both sides (among them men like Dayan in Israel and many Arab leaders—though not Nasser).

All these three books were written before the present Middle East crisis, but they are, nevertheless, of the greatest topical interest. They often deal with certain fundamentals which, in the heat of the 1967 battles, we have been apt to overlook. For instance, the tragic problem of the Palestine Arab refugees, or the extreme precariousness of Egypt's economic future, or the economic, political and psychological importance of the Aswan Dam which the United States and Britain refused to finance (hence the nationalization, by Nasser, of the Suez Canal) and which was later taken over by the Russians.

As Hugh Thomas recalls in his excellent study of the Suez crisis:

> Nasser cared more about the Dam than the Canal. Egypt, though large, is mostly desert. Only the delta and the plain of the Nile are suitable for agriculture. On these six million acres (the size of Yorkshire and Lancashire together) most of the population of 24 million make their living. This region has the highest density for a rural population in the world: 3,000 per square mile. The population is increasing fast so that in 1988 there will probably be 60 million Egyptians. Most people in Egypt are starving. The expectation of life is 35 years, the per capita income £25 a year.

This is the real Egypt, only a few miles away from the Groppi Café and Shepheard's Hotel. Nasser is acutely aware of these grim realities of his country's economic future: hence his interest —perhaps excessive interest—in the Aswan Dam, in Russian economic aid, his dislike of Israel with its entirely different standard of living, and his fellow feeling for the other Arab countries, some even more wretched than Egypt. Here, in a nutshell, is the whole tragedy of the overpopulated and underdeveloped countries. That even the Aswan Dam is not ultimately a solution is fairly convincingly demonstrated by Prof. W. R. Polk of the United States in a B.B.C. talk in one of the books listed above:

> The High Dam has been very disappointing. The amount of land that will be irrigated is very much less than the original estimates, and the amount of electricity generated will have to be considerably less than the original estimates also—otherwise there will be a terrible wastage of water.

Even so, the High Dam, whatever its economic value, has its uses:

> The real importance of the Dam, I suspect, is symbolic. It is a symbol of the regime and on this the Egyptian Government simply had to continue, no matter where it got its aid from. . . . I am sure the Egyptians are very grateful indeed to the Soviet Union. . . . But, most important of all perhaps is this: the High Dam was the school, above all other

THE STONES

I owned a slope full of stones.
Like buried pianos they lay in the ground, shards of old sea-ledges, stumbling blocks where the earth caught and kept them dark, an old music mute in them that my head keeps now I have dug them out.
I broke them where they slugged in their dark cells, and lifted them up in pieces.
As I piled them in the light
I began their music. I heard their old lime rouse in breath of song that has not left me.
I gave pain and weariness to their bearing out.
What bond have I made with the earth, having worn myself against it? It is a fatal singing
I have carried with me out of that day.
The stones have given me music that figures for me their holes in the earth and their long lying in them dark.
They have taught me the weariness that loves the ground, and I must prepare a fitting silence.

schools, in which the new kind of Egyptian was trained—the engineer, the technician, the foreman are all graduates of the High Dam.

There is this: and there is also the fact that Russia is the natural and automatic market for Egyptian-grown cotton, thanks to the Aswan Dam:

> Never mind what the Russians do with the Egyptian cotton crop; they can put it at the bottom of the Black Sea, but the important thing is that they buy it —and they usually leave it to the very last minute when the Egyptians are literally on their knees . . . . Then they come and bail them out. This is the sort of thing that makes friends and influences people.

This last quote is from a statement made by Anthony Nutting in the same B.B.C. discussion.

Nutting is, indeed, a man who is acutely sensitive to the plight of an underdeveloped country like Egypt, and this very largely accounts for his extreme opposition to Eden's return in 1956 to the bad old imperialist ways. He was Secretary of State at the Foreign Office in Eden's government in 1956, and so number-two man to Selwyn Lloyd, Eden's Foreign Secretary. At the height of the Suez crisis, he resigned from the government and from Parliament, and ruined his highly promising political career.

Of these three books Nutting's is, historically, by far the most important. Very few records were kept of the "sordid negotiations" (as Nutting calls them) that led to the "collusion" among Britain, France and Israel, and their abortive seizure of the Suez Canal in November, 1956. Many episodes which Mr. Thomas laboriously and tentatively tries to restore are perfectly clearly described by Nutting, a direct participant in a variety of crucial meetings among British ministers, and between British and French leaders. Nutting was a man with the greatest admiration and affection for his Prime Minister. And yet Eden came to act in the Suez affair in a manner which was "completely out of character." Eden's reputation, Nutting says, had been founded on his genius for negotiations. But now, in March, 1956:

> Eden completely lost his touch. Gone was his uncanny sense of timing, his deft feel for negotiation. Driven by the impulses of pride and prestige, and nagged by mounting sickness, he began to behave like an enraged elephant charging senselessly at invisible and imaginary enemies in the international jungle.

The trouble, according to Nutting, started in March, 1956, when King Hussein of Jordan suddenly fired General Glubb (Glubb Pasha), the Jordanian chief of staff, and commander of the Arab Legion. Until that day Eden had every reason to be satisfied with his own record as a diplomat. He had, in the last few years, settled the great oil dispute with Persia, had played a decisive role (despite fierce resistance from Dulles) in arriving at a peace settlement in Indo-China after the French debacle at Dienbienphu; had reached a settlement with Nasser over the withdrawal of British troops from the Canal Zone, and had even helped secure the complete liberation of Austria from the Russians. But the firing of Glubb by King Hussein drove him mad. He immediately assumed that the man behind it all was Nasser. Although Nutting proved to him that Nasser had nothing to do with it and that Hussein simply decided that he was not master in his own house so long as Glubb was there, Eden got the idea that the world was too small to hold him (Eden) and Nasser.

For several months he raved and ranted about Nasser. In reply to a proposal to "isolate" Nasser with the help of a UN police force, Eden shouted: "Why isolate and neutralize Nasser? I want him destroyed." When Nutting suggested that there was no alternative to Nasser in Egypt, except somebody much worse, Eden screamed: "I don't give a damn if there's anarchy and chaos in Egypt."

We need not deal here with all the complicated negotiations that went on in connection with the Anglo-American refusal to finance the Aswan Dam and Nasser's nationalization of the Suez Canal. The important thing is that Eden was determined, ever since March, 1956, to "destroy" Nasser. Any hopeful signs of a peaceful settlement, such as the six-point program virtually agreed on between Fawzi, the Egyptian minister, and Selwyn Lloyd only irritated Eden. He welcomed instead the growing signs of Franco-Israeli collusion, and finally, on October 13, joyfully accepted the French plan brought to him by M. Gazier and General Challe (a future member of the anti-de Gaulle "Generals' Plot" in Algiers). This was Challe's plan:

> Invite Israel to attack Egypt across the Sinai peninsula. Having given the Israelis enough time to seize all or most of Sinai, the British and French will then order "both sides" to withdraw their forces from the Suez Canal. This would permit the British and French to occupy the Canal and "separate the combatants," thus saving the Canal from damage.

As we know, this was the plan that Israel, Britain and France carried out—or tried to carry out. If it failed in the end it was because of sharp American opposition, UN opposition, and strong objections from the Labour Party inside Britain—despite the extremely ambiguous line at first taken on the Suez issue by Gaitskell—an attitude which induced Eden, for a time, to believe that he was in fact pursuing a genuine "bipartisan" British policy.

Nutting's book tells the real inside story of Suez, and tells it more honestly and more fully than anybody else has ever told it. As a study of Eden's motives, Eden's anti-Nasser mania, and of the reasons for this mania (illness, jealousy of Churchill, perhaps the influence of his overambitious wife, his hatred of Dulles and his determination not to be dictated to by the U. S.), it is extraordinarily interesting. Curious, too, is the fact that Eden had been, unlike Churchill, pro-Arab and rather anti-Israel. But now, in his pathological hatred of Nasser, he allowed himself to be trapped by such mediocre French politicians as Pineau and Mollet who proposed to him their cynical plan in the firm belief that the end of Nasser would mean the end of the Algerian War. The absurd plan misfired completely as we know, and the new Anglo-French entente cordiale fell to pieces within a few days—only to cause the most violent anti-British feeling among those Frenchmen who felt that complete victory would have been certain within twenty-four or forty-eight hours if only the English hadn't called the cease-fire half-way down the canal and in this way ruined the whole scheme.

If Nutting's book is full of hard facts (many of them completely new) Thomas' book is more speculative, though his conclusions are, roughly, the same as Nutting's. The B.B.C. volume is useful in providing valuable background material, not only to the Suez crisis of 1956 but also to the Middle East crisis of 1967—and to that chronic Middle East ulcer, for which nobody has yet discovered a cure. Nutting's suggestion in one of the B.B.C. discussions that there can be no end to the malady so long as Israel remains a "Western stalking horse" does not help much. Nor does his proposal that Israel should be "de-Westernized and de-Zionized," and that the country should be run by a majority of Oriental, but not Western, Jews. Maybe a bright idea but, surely, wholly unrealistic. At times Nutting comes dangerously close to the Arab view that the creation of a Jewish state in Palestine was a bad mistake from the start. To him, the Balfour Declaration was far less a piece of British idealism than one of the usual tricks of British imperialism. True no doubt; only what can one do about it now?

Here are two books about Ireland, one by an Englishman, one by a German, that might amuse if not enlighten many Irishmen. But then neither book seems to have been written for Irish circulation. Certainly not Mr. Pritchett's glossy sketch of dear dirty Dublin for which no Irishman in his right mind is likely to spend the staggering sum of £4-4-0. (I can see a Dublin reviewer now slipping down to the quays to flog his copy for a fraction of that.) And Herr Böll's reflections were obviously composed for fellow burghers in Cologne and environs whose notions of Ireland would seem to be, following Böll, a dreamy mélange of fairyland and low Tartary.

Heinrich Böll's reputation as "one of postwar Germany's most important novelists" is, oddly enough, more pronounced in America than in Europe, and it may be for this reason that his Irisches Tagebuch of 1957 has been translated into English ten years later by Leila Vennewitz, a Canadian lady, as Irish Journal. It seems a pity to have disturbed its German repose. "This Ireland exists," Böll writes in a cunning epigraph, "but whoever goes there and fails to find it has no claim on the author." No claim indeed, for this Ireland exists only in the mind of Böll, a most improbable place, a land of unlikeness—an Ireland without latitude or longitude, where time and place and person are without design or definition, as colorless as space, as elusive as mist.

The book is vacuous, but it would amuse that Irishman, who will not read it, by its ponderous effort to embody those qualities Böll thinks are most Irish—feyness, piety, fantasy, fun and melancholy. All coalesce in a story Böll puts in the flannel mouth of an imaginary policeman. The story is about a nun. Here is a sample of it:

> . . . a nun who found the dead Redskin on Duke Street . . . walked beside us all the way and prayed for his poor soul—the water was running into her shoes, and the wind was so fierce it lifted her heavy wet habit, and for a moment I could see she had darned her dark-brown underpants with pink wool. . . . You know what I really wondered about: whether they actually wear darned underpants in Heaven.

That policeman, typical of Böll's excursions into fantasy, is without wonder of any kind. The wonder is that Böll dares even an attempt at this sort of thing—like a mollusk trying an entrechat or an elephant pirouetting. It is bad enough when a people sentimentalize themselves, as the Irish have been known to do, but it is insufferable when they are sentimentalized by foreigners. In this Ireland of Böll's make-believe, nothing real is ever observed, though statistics are sometimes disguised as observations. His list, for example, of "Irish world records": drinking tea, making priests, moviegoing, drinking whiskey and cigarette smoking. Poor Ireland. Poor Böll.

One turns then with some relief and much pleasure, not wholly unalloyed, to V. S. Pritchett's elegant portrait of Dublin. Evelyn Hofer's photographs—sixteen in full color, seventy-eight in monochrome—are simple and superb, quite the best photographic essay on Dublin yet assembled. The camera has realized and heightened without distorting by gimmickry whatever it turned upon—the stately façade of the Custom House, Christchurch, the Four Courts, prospects of square and quay and river and bay, a street in the slums, the chamber of the Dail, a grave in Glasnevin, a lounge bar; in short, the real and remembered face of Dublin, but above all the faces of Dubliners—poets and actors and priests, of course, and old revolutionaries and students and tinkers, but also lords and weavers, gravediggers, mods and PR men. Here they all are, many of them showing as Pritchett shrewdly observes, "the double face, one containing the outer, the other the inner life." My own favorite is the portrait of three easy and able-looking gravediggers in great dark coats and slouch hats standing on a shiny road under the cypresses of Glasnevin and leaning on their spades, as long and sharp as lances, looking out at the world of the living with a courteous and expectant regard.

Pritchett's text accompanying these photographs is polished and urbane, a composite view of the city as it was and as it is — Georgian, Edwardian, De Valeran and contemporary Dublin. It shuttles smoothly backward and forward in time on well-oiled wheels of generalization, the gentle whir of the prose precluding disagreement or contradiction, though the occasions for both may be many. Pritchett's acquaintance with Dublin dates back to the early twenties when the city was still local habitation for many of the great names of the Irish literary revival. He knew or met many of them, and many more still of the younger writers who followed them, and he has drawn now on almost all of them for anecdote and illustration in his own portrait of Dublin.

How faithful a portrait is it? More than passing fair, but less than perfect. In a book so elaborately produced and so expensively marketed one is irritated by negligences like Berryman for Merry-man, Edward for Edmund Curtis, F. J. Cormick for McCormick and the perverse and persistent appearance of Finnegan's for Finnegans Wake. The index, too, though this is probably not Pritchett's doing, is shoddy and incomplete. Carelessness of this kind—still other examples might be given—will not strengthen a reader's faith in the responsibility of editor or author. But aside from that, there are enough good things, especially the photographs, to make the book almost worth the price.

Though a Dubliner moving about daily in his taken-for-granted city would be little likely to recognize the significance of the place as Pritchett portrays it, the same is probably true of the citizens of any town whose very familiarity blurs its definition. The place and its significance, however, are real, as the Ireland of Heinrich Böll is not, seen thus from the outside by a literary Englishman. Not so real, of course, as the same place in all its quotidian variety seen from within, for example, Ulysses —but no one, especially not a Dubliner, would expect that.

O'Casey's Benevolent Blasts

BLASTS AND BENEDICTIONS: Articles and Stories. By Sean O'Casey. Selected and introduced by Ronald Ayling. St. Martins Press. 314 pp. $6.50.

SEAN CRONIN

Mr. Cronin is a journalist who has lived in Ireland and the United States, and has written for publications in both countries.

This lovely land that always sent
Her writers and artists to banishment
And in a spirit of Irish fun
Betrayed her own leaders, one by one.

Thus James Joyce. Sean O'Casey could have echoed the sentiment as he headed for exile at the age of 46 a few weeks after his masterpiece The Plough and the Stars was hooted in the Abbey Theatre despite Yeats's magnificent declamation:

> You have disgraced yourselves again . . . Dublin has once more rocked the cradle of genius. From such a scene in this theatre went forth the fame of Synge. Equally the fame of O'Casey is born here tonight. This is his apotheosis.

Was it? Not all the objectors were obscurantists. Yet their arguments make pathetic reading today. One can explain them only on the grounds that normally civilized men and women have their aberrations and that those were not normal times in Ireland. The year was 1926, nineteen years after The Playboy riots, but only three years removed from the civil war. To many rebel partisans, O'Casey's anti-heroes sounded like anti-revolutionary mockers and defeatists; they saw his play as a savage satire on the Easter Rising. They might discount what Yeats, the government senator, had to say; but from the Socialist O'Casey they expected slogans they could chant and cardboard figures they could cheer. The pietists joined the uproar. Previously they had denounced Juno and the Paycock; a bowdlerized version had to be performed in Cork. The combination of patriots and puritans proved too much for O'Casey and he got out. His reasoned replies in the Dublin newspapers (reproduced in this excellent anthology) to the charges against his play are models of moderation.

But it is clear that he was grievously wounded. His feelings come through in a 1960 piece written for The New York Times during a revival of The Plough:

> Scholars, saints, hurlers and bards shouted down O'Casey; and in spite of the herculean defiance of the indomitable poet, Yeats, I felt as Ruth felt among the alien corn; I was an alien in my own land. The next day, angry and abrasive letters against the play shone darkly from the Dublin papers, and O'Casey was told by many symbols in speech and letter that the shamrock wasn't for him to pluck. It was time to go.

Two years later when Yeats rejected The Silver Tassie, on the specious ground that O'Casey could know nothing of the horrors of war because he had never trod a European battlefield, the artist lost a theatre as well as a country. Joyce might manage to live by "silence, exile and cunning," but O'Casey's particular genius required an Irish setting and a Dublin stage. Or so it may be fairly argued. The playwright would not agree; he had broken his bonds and was free to write whatever he chose. So he followed his own lonely path and produced four experimental morality plays, four comedies, a couple of curtain raisers, six volumes of autobiography, and, in addition to the one under review, two anthologies of articles on politics, drama, people and literature before he died in 1964 at the age of 84.

O'Casey's blasts are mostly benign, his benedictions are generously distributed. Yesterday's battles, their heroes and villains are observed from O'Casey's command post. When he thunders against the Boston ban on Within the Gates — brought about by an unecumenical alliance of Catholics and Methodists — he sounds like a latter-day John Knox. The play, which deals with the outcasts of the world, sought to bring music and song and dance back to the drama; a Jesuit critic thought it "drenched with sex." O'Casey takes after him in fine style in "The Church Tries to Close the Gates," published here for the first time.

Controversy invariably followed production of his plays, with O'Casey defending his creations pugnaciously and effectively. Few writers managed to raise the hackles of so many nonplaygoing conformists — political and religious — especially in Ireland. This collection is a sort of "Essential O'Casey" of that field, selected with obvious care by Ronald Ayling of the Drama Department, Bristol University, who also provides a fine preface. The articles, and three short stories, are published for the first time in book form. It is typical O'Casey: provocative ideas skip lightly across the pages clad sometimes in breath-takingly lyrical language; at other times the style is as plain and direct as a Swift tract.

He never became a Grand Old Man of Letters, safe above the strife. The dust raised by his last two plays, The Bishop's Bonfire and Drums of Father Ned, has still to settle in Ireland. The story has been told quite often, but O'Casey tells it best. Suffice it to say here that when Cyril Cusack produced The Bishop's Bonfire at the Gaiety Theatre, Dublin, in 1955, a vicious campaign had been launched against it even before it opened. "It caused a great commotion, great crowds assembled outside the theatre, not to boo or to protest, but to cheer the name of the author — one of my astonishing and pleasant surprises," writes O'Casey. "Those who had booked their seats had to fight their way through the throng, and many who wished to see the play found it impossible to get in, including the American Ambassador and Mme. Pandit Nehru." Not surprisingly, the Dublin critics, with one exception, clobbered it. The London critics, with a few exceptions, liked it. And the usual anti-O'Casey wail started in the Irish papers. Nevertheless, the original three-week run had to be extended to five, and it played to packed houses every night. Except for some isolated and perhaps organized hissing there were no additional incidents.

Three years later the director of the Dublin Theatre Festival asked O'Casey for The Drums of Father Ned, a gay frolic about an Ireland awakening to new ideas; a follow-up to Bonfire which depicts a country still in thrall to closed ecclesiastical minds. Other 1958 festival plays included an adaptation of Joyce's Ulysses, titled Bloomsday, and a reading of Samuel Beckett's radio drama All That Fall. Archbishop John Charles McQuaid let it be known that he did not approve of O'Casey and Joyce — he said nothing about Beckett — and refused permission for the usual Mass to open the festival.

"All the pietistic and sacred societies began to blast and bawl, yell and yelp," comments O'Casey. "The Drama Council was frightened." When the producer demanded changes in the play, O'Casey withdrew it. The council dropped Bloomsday; Beckett would not allow the production of his play because of the clerical ban on O'Casey and Joyce. Finally O'Casey stopped all performances of his plays in Ireland and Beckett did likewise. The main sufferer turned out to be the innocent Abbey Theatre, which made a lot of revenue during the tourist season on early O'Casey revivals. It is an amusing and sad story, full of Irish irony.

Censors of all kinds irked O'Casey. In 1939 he wrote an article called "Literature in Ireland" for a Moscow magazine, praising Joyce as "the daddy of all those who write, a genius standing alone on a high and lonely peak." The Soviet view of Joyce, of course, was — and perhaps still is — that he was the daddy of the "decadents" and his works are not circulated in Russia. (That too may be changing, for it seems that a Georgian is translating Ulysses into his native tongue.)

"The Bald Primaqueera," O'Casey's last article, is an assault on the Theatre of Cruelty and the Theatre of the Absurd. Among his targets are Artaud, Ionesco, Harold Pinter ("Prim Pinter is genteel, he rarely shouts, but uses the voice like the sibilant purr of a Siamese cat, ready to change to the dangerous hiss of a snake at any minute") and Joe Orton's Entertaining Mr. Sloan. Of the avant-garde only John Arden wins his unstinted praise:

> Indeed, it seems to me that Arden's Serjeant Musgrave's Dance is far and away the finest play of the present day, full of power, protest, and frantic compassion, notwithstanding that, on its first presentation, it was scowled and scooted from the theatre by most of our intelligent and unintelligent drama critics. I wonder why!

O'Casey lived a full, productive life and one gathers—from the time of his marriage to the young Irish actress, Eileen Reynolds Carey— a happy one. Yet his literary rewards were few. Neither his native city nor his native country made any gesture toward him at all, though he brought renown on both and was perhaps the most authentic Dubliner and Irishman of his time.

A pity. If they didn't want to salute O'Casey the exile or O'Casey the one-time casual laborer from the slums, they might at least have cast a cold eye on O'Casey the Irish-Irelander who was learning and speaking and teaching Gaelic at a time when De Valera was still playing the imperial game of rugby football. Or the O'Casey who joined the Irish Republican Brotherhood when the revolutionary activists amounted to only a handful. Then there is the O'Casey who worked in Liberty Hall with Jim Larkin during the brutal lockout of 1913. And the O'Casey who was secretary of the Citizen Army, the labor defense force, before he resigned in a proletarian huff over Countess Markievicz's membership in 1914, so that when the revolutionary pot he had helped to stir came to a boil he was an observer on the side lines.

And a good thing too for literature. It left him free to ponder the illusions of power, patriotism and politics; to compile searing plays on man's condition; to create some notable tragicomic characters; above all, to write the most remarkable dramatic poetry of our century.

And too — as this posthumous collection shows — it left him free to retain the outlook of the cloth-cap intellectual who sees life as a glorious ad-adventure, no matter how dreary the journey, and sings to it.

Deviants and Puritans

WAYWARD PURITANS: A Study in the Sociology of Deviance. By Kai T. Erikson. John Wiley & Sons. 228 pp. $5.50.

ALLEN GUTTMANN

Mr. Guttmann, author of The Conservative Tradition in America (Oxford University Press), teaches at Amherst College and is a public affairs editor for The Massachusetts Review.

Although they sought to establish a "science of society" to replace the descriptive narratives of most historians, the great 19th-century sociologists realized that their theories had to account for human behavior at various moments in history. They often wrote historical books, like Weber's Religionssoziologie, or books clogged with a near plethora of classical erudition, like Pareto's Trattato. American sociologists today, despite a division between Establishmentarians and Activists (the followers often of C. Wright Mills), share a common disinclination for historical research outside the rather restricted field of the history of sociology itself. Kai T. Erikson is an exception. Wayward Puritans is a book of interest to sociologists, to historians and to the general reader.

Erikson begins with Durkheim and with a number of observations about the nature of deviance. Deviance seems necessary in any given society, partly to establish conceptually and emotionally the lines between tolerated and forbidden behavior. The institutions which are supposed to curb deviance seem often to create what they are allegedly designed to prevent, a phenomenon which Negroes in urban America have recently brought to the attention of everyone to the left of Rep. Gerald Ford. The social ceremonies which declare one a deviant (i.e., conviction, imprisonment) are far more socially impressive than the ceremonies which return one to normal life. Do we really expect the police to eliminate crime and prisons to reform their inmates, or do we assume an ineradicability of social sin? The observations and the questions are not new to sociologists, but historians have seldom if ever turned to the past with this frame of mind.

Historians have not, of course, neglected Puritan New England. The sociologist has at hand an immense heap of books concerned with the Antinomian controversy (in which Anne Hutchinson and her followers were expelled from the Bay Colony), with the persecution of the Quakers, and with the witchcraft hysteria. From a sociological perspective, Puritan New England has other attractions as well—it was small, isolated and highly self-conscious. Records, like those of the Essex County Court, are particularly full. The familiar data are put together in the middle chapters of Erikson's book, in which he tells again the story of the errand into the wilderness and what came of it, but the heart of the book is in the last two chapters.

Erikson shows that the incidence of deviance remained fairly constant despite past and present impressions of a series of "crime waves." In 1651-55, for instance, 3.60 per cent of the population of Essex County were legally "offenders" against church or state. In 1676-80, 3.58 per cent were offenders, and statistics for the intervening years vary by no more than one-tenth of 1 per cent. Given the regularity of the level of deviance, one must assume that the ministers who preached against the rapid descent of the colony into a sink of depravity expressed their own inner crises rather than a state of affairs recorded in the courts. Analogies to the present are obvious.

More interesting still is Erikson's attempt to move beyond statistical matters and to give specific substance to the general conviction that 17th-century Puritanism has had an immense effect upon all subsequent generations. Puritans saw deviant behavior as "the special property of a particular class of people who were more or less frozen into deviant attitudes." The "reform" of a sinner was in the hands of God. The best that a magistrate could do was to punish the sin that the sinner had committed in accordance with God's predetermined plan.

The Quakers of Pennsylvania were more optimistic. They held that a man might listen in solitude to the inner voice and mend his ways. The Puritan view of criminality was institutionalized in the Auburn system (named after New York's famous prison). The Quaker view led to the "Philadelphia system," where men lived in solitary confinement rather than in work gangs. Erikson's account of the two systems is concise:

> In a sense, then, the two prison models represented different philosophies of punishment and different psychologies of crime. The Philadelphia system, with its emphasis on penitence and solitude, took its major tone from the Quaker feeling that the resources for conversion lay within every man and that even the meanest rogue could improve his religious estate if he were separated from evil influences and left in a position where his better nature could begin to assert itself. The Auburn model, however, was not shaped to so gentle a view of man. Here the keynote was discipline; the men were assembled in long grey ranks, forbidden to speak to one another, kept at heavy labor and subject to constant harassment from the guards—all of which mirrored the Puritan conviction that a reprobate spirit must be broken to the routines of a useful life because it cannot be truly redeemed.

The United States is the only nation in the Western world to opt for the Auburn system, despite the fact that it seems to reinforce criminal patterns. In technical terms we have clung to a system with a very high rate of recidivism, despite all evidence against the system. From this, Erikson concludes:

> This outcome cannot be written off as a simple failure of American inventiveness, for in many ways it is a very apt representation of American attitudes toward deviation: people in this society do not expect much in the way of reform from those who are labeled "deviant."

And this brings us back to the Puritans.

The applicability of this insight to matters other than criminology is obvious. Because most Negroes exhibit patterns of behavior unlike those of the middle class, they are, in a sense, deviants. There is every reason to fear that the police view Negroes very much as Puritan divines viewed sinners—they are worthy of punishment for the blackness by which God marked them. Like the Puritan ministry, the institutions of social control in contemporary America do much to create the calamities they deplore and expect.

A LOGICAL GIRL. By Gerda Charles. Alfred A. Knopf. 400 pp. $5.95.

A Logical Girl follows on Miss Charles's memorable earlier novel, A Slanting Light. In that excellent work, published in 1963, her woman narrator called herself an intellectual Bovary, a new kind of woman: "A lower middle-class, provincial Englishwoman with immortal longings," who wanted from life not wealth or excitement or romantic love but style and brilliance. Rose Morgan in A Logical Girl is exactly this sort of woman, living in an English seaside town in 1943 when the Americans arrive. She is the narrator, telling her poignant story—an intense inner life masked by a drab exterior—from the perspective of a middle-aged woman looking back on herself as an unbelievably naive, incredibly inexperienced 26-year-old adolescent. Miss Charles is an extremely gifted writer, a writer of unfashionable moral seriousness and exceptional narrative power, but A Logical Girl is the least impressive of her three novels so far. One can take her female protagonist seriously, or regard her as an object for subtle satire; Miss Charles has not quite brought her themes and characters under the control of her hard, unsentimental intelligence, and there is an ambiguity at the core of A Logical Girl that is not willed.

WIDE SARGASSO SEA. By Jean Rhys. W. W. Norton. 190 pp. $4.50.

Jean Rhys, who ends a very long silence with the publication of Wide Sargasso Sea, has had a circle of critical admirers, from Ford Madox Ford who championed her first book (The Left Bank, 1927), to Francis Wyndham who introduces this fifth book. The admiration is justified, and it would be good to have reissues of the four out-of-print books. Wide Sargasso Sea is a portrait of Antoinette Cosway, the Creole heiress who was the first Mrs. Rochester in Jane Eyre—the terrifying wraith in the attic of Thornfield Hall. Except for the last dozen pages which emanate from that attic room and Mr. Rochester's narrative, both of which depend substantially on Charlotte Brontë's tale, Miss Rhys was free to create the descent into madness during Antoinette's adolescence and early married life in the West Indies. She has done a superb job, mixing subtle amounts of acid into Antoinette's life—suspicions of inherited madness, native hatred and superstitions, rejections and infidelity—to account for brain rot in beautifully lush surroundings. Working a stylistic range from moody introspection to formal elegance, Miss Rhys has us traveling under Antoinette's skin. It is an eerie and memorable trip.

of a murder of a young boy planned by three older boys. For shock and horror values it will not compare favorably, but there are other successes in Quarry to recommend it. Mrs. White's insights into the behavior of children are extraordinarily good: and she is equally successful in brief glimpses of the boys' adult relatives. But the transitional hell where two of her three main characters chronologically reside, together with the selection of an odd and peculiarly Christ-like 12-year-old victim, create unresolved problems for Mrs. White in an otherwise fine first novel.

THE 28th DAY OF ELUL. By Richard M. Elman. Charles Scribner's Sons. 279 pp. $4.95.

Alex Yagodah, a Hungarian Jew who outlived the holocaust of the Final Solution to resettle in Israel, will inherit $40,000 from his uncle's estate, if he can testify that he is still a professing Jew. Richard Elman's first novel is the bitter record of the hero's testimony. Alex retraces his youth in Clig, a mildly introverted and comfortable existence in a middle-class family, a life of minor pleasures and petty snobberies, of belief in laws and orders and willing disbelief in Hitler's camps. "By now all words are traps," he complains as he begins to record his testimony. Elman's unfolding of Yagodah's youth convincingly demonstrates how the will to live gradually accommodates betrayals, how the burden of the betrayals grows into unrelieved self-loathing and despair; and in exploring the loss of faith and spreading guilt, Elman masterfully mines one part of the holocaust heritage.

HOW THE FISHES LIVE. By Joel Lieber. David McKay. 375 pp. $6.50.

How do the fishes live? The big ones eat up the little ones, of course. Joel Lieber's first novel explores savage and social cannibalism: both are terrifying to contemplate. The first half of How the Fishes Live relates a three-week nightmare aboard a lifeboat for ten survivors of an ocean liner sinking. Three die of the hardships they undergo before the strongest survivor organizes the act of killing and eating one of the seven to insure a return to society for the rest. In the second half of the novel social cannibalism takes over, as two of the survivors stand trial for murder and the newspapers feed on the case for circulation.

However, Lieber's impressively strong narrative talents are distributed somewhat unevenly in this large book. The survivors, starving in a degraded world of sun-blistered, salt-caked bodies, are carefully realized in the first portion of the novel, but they are seriously threatened with verbal suffocation in the legal and moral expositions of the trial scenes. But isn't this perhaps what society does to individuals when its rituals and laws are challenged? Lieber prompts us to ask ourselves these and other difficult questions.

What I disagree with most, however, is the impression Mr. Bernstein leaves that editorials written for the broadcast media are usually bland and harmless. I disagree completely and have enclosed some editorials from this C.B.S.-owned station. As you will see, our editorials are direct and deal with gut issues. I submit that those who editorialize in this community would be quite apprehensive about doing so in this honest and forthright manner.

Of course, it is true that most of our editorials deal with local and state issues. These are the issues people are interested in and the larger issues, the fate of the world and the destiny of man, we leave to the political sophisticates.

Donald J. Trageser
Vice President, C.B.S. Radio
General Manager, WEEI

New Milford, Conn.

DEAR SIRS: The Nation asked me to write about Michael Keating's editorial program on one of the country's largest and most important broadcasting stations—WCBS-TV (New York's Channel 2). This is what I did, setting the story against the background of certain difficulties imposed on all broadcast editorialists by FCC policy. Mr. Trageser objects, apparently, to the title put on the story. I didn't write the title; but, in any case, the title refers specifically to TV editorials. Mr. Trageser is vice president of, and writes editorials for, a radio station; why does he insist on shoving a tender foot into a shoe obviously not designed for him? That's point 1. Point 2 is Mr. Trageser's intimation that I object to the principle of equal time. What I wrote was that while equal time makes for good air forums and good letters columns in newspapers (admirable features, both), it doesn't make for dynamic and persuasive editorial campaigns. On a final point, Mr. Trageser and I have no quarrel. He agrees with me that his station deals mostly with local and state issues. And I agree with him that his station's editorials (like most broadcasting editorials) display disinterest in "the fate of the world and the destiny of man." But if I were he I wouldn't boast about it.

I am happy to acknowledge that Mr. Trageser's capacity for indignation, which I think misplaced in his letter, shows up constructively in his editorials, samples of which he was kind enough to send along. I'm certain that, if we could only get him interested in the fate of the world, he'd have something interesting to say. Victor H. Bernstein

Vietnam hearings

Baltimore, Md.

DEAR SIRS: Apropos your editorial of a few months ago ("Advice to Congressmen," July 3) stressing the importance of Congressional Open Hearings on Vietnam and apropos, as well, the letter from Congressman Ryan seconding your comments, we wish to let you and your readers know that we have just had a successful Hearing on Vietnam here in Baltimore. The Baltimore Vietnam Summer Project canvassed in the district of Rep. Samuel N.. Friedel (D., 7th Dist.) and using the results of this work as a basis, we were able to convince the Congressman to hold hearings.

The format of this hearing was not the same as earlier ones. Instead of testimony from a series of witnesses, we had two panels, pro and con, which made statements and cross-examined each other, Congressman Friedel acting as moderator. Panelists included professors, clergymen, State Department, J.W.V., League of Women Voters. The last hour of the evening was open to the floor. All in all this arrangement was satisfactory, except maybe for the fact that the panelists, as well as speakers from the floor, seemed unable to work up their comments and questions in a brief manner.

Congressman Friedel, an Administration supporter, was able to hear various sides in the debate first hand. It is a bit unfortunate that he did not take a more active part in the cross-examination of panelists; however, the agreed upon ground rules were that he would be moderator, and he chose to stick very closely to that role throughout. The audience was overwhelmingly peace oriented, much more so than even Vietnam Summer had anticipated, and we feel sure that this made a strong impression on the Congressman.

Proposal for the Middle East

Beginning with Harry Truman and Stalin, Soviet and U.S. leaders, with some assistance from lesser potentates, have made a bear garden of the United Nations. Typically, the 22nd session of the General Assembly began with a hostile exchange between Nikolai T. Federenko and Arthur J. Goldberg, to be followed shortly by further inconclusive wrangling over the unresolved hostilities in the Middle East. One would think that in the whole wide world there is nothing constructive that can be applied to such questions, yet there is at least one promising proposal that might make the present session less sterile than the preceding ones.

More than two months ago, Admiral Lewis Strauss proposed a Middle East peace plan which C. L. Sulzberger described in a series of articles in The New York Times beginning July 14. The plan was sponsored by General Eisenhower, who commended it to President Johnson, who turned it over for study to Donald F. Hornig, his science-technology adviser. Since then little has been heard of it.

"In a nutshell," Sulzberger wrote, "the plan aims at permanently cooling Middle East tempers by giving something tangible to both sides and removing the fundamental causes of tension. It would provide water in huge quantities, dwarfing all present irrigation resources, to an area capable of easily absorbing more than the entire population of unhappy Arab refugees. And it would give jobs to those same refugees so they can support themselves while this Eden is being built."

Sulzberger calls the plan imaginative and dramatic, which it is, and new, which it is not. Although not specifically applied to the Middle East, it was conceived by Dr. R. Philip Hammond, a chemical engineer at the Los Alamos nuclear weapons center, more than five years ago. At that time sea water could be distilled only in small quantities because of the high cost of the heat energy required. Hammond's solution was large-scale nuclear power plants to generate electricity and, with the exhaust steam from the turbines, to operate the distillation plants.

Dr. Alvin W. Weinberg, director of the Oak Ridge National Laboratory and one of America's leading scientist-engineers, borrowed Hammond from Los Alamos and set him up as head of the Saline Water Conversion Reactor Program at Oak Ridge. Weinberg publicized the development and as a member and chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission, Strauss was naturally familiar with it. The pros and cons of the project were discussed in The Nation by Carl Dreher in "The Big Atom: Solving the Water Shortage" (December 28, 1963) and "Atomic Power: The Fear and the Promise" (March 23, 1964). In the second article Dreher wrote: "When—if ever—the Arab masses come to understand the conflict between their interests and those of their rulers and, concomitantly, the identity of their interests with those of the Jews, the North African and Arabian deserts can be transformed by nuclear distillation of sea water."

In 1955, President Eisenhower sent the late Eric Johnston to the Middle East with a scheme for joint exploitation of the waters of the Jordan River. One obstacle was that the Jordan, hardly more than a good-sized creek, does not supply enough water to satisfy the needs of either Arabs or Jews. Eisenhower now says: "This makes the Johnston Plan look like a flea against a dog." It does indeed. The nuclear program envisions three nuclear plants, the first of which alone would produce 400 million gallons of fresh water daily—more than the combined flow of the Jordan tributaries. The cost of the completed project would be less than one year's expenditure on the Apollo moon program. The nuclear plants, pipe lines, reservoirs and power lines would be built by contractors from the United States, Britain and France and perhaps the Soviet Union, with the Palestinian refugees supplying the major part of the labor force. The International Atomic Energy Agency, of which all the major belligerents in the current war are members (proving that it is not impossible for them to cooperate when there is something in it for them) would act as a TVA, supervising distribution of water, of which there would be enough for all, and power, of which there would be too much, and guarding against diversion of fissionable material for military uses.

If this will not work, it is hard to see what will. Eisenhower is well regarded in the Arab world: it was he who pulled the victorious Israelis, French and British off Nasser's back in 1956. Strauss moves in the highest financial circles in the United States and abroad. He suggests creating a chartered corporation like Comsat with the U. S. Government subscribing to half the stock, the balance to be offered in the world security markets, where Strauss believes it would be regarded as a sound investment.

No doubt in carrying out the project there would be the usual fights and recriminations but a plan so audacious, offering such palpable benefits to all the peoples of the region, can hardly be depicted as an imperialist plot. President Johnson has had time to evaluate the project. We suggest that he authorize Ambassador Goldberg to lay it before the General Assembly. Such a move would serve useful purposes. It would correct the not unfounded impression that only the specialized agencies of the UN ever entertain anything hopeful or creative. It would blow away some of the miasma which overlies the current session. And, quite possibly, it could divert the contestants from the fruitless altercation which is otherwise in prospect.

'End This War'

A cri de coeur is what one U.S. correspondent in Vietnam calls the protest against the war issued by fifty U.S. volunteers who have been working in that half-ruined country. It comes not only from the heart but from people whose patriotism can no more be impugned than their knowledge of conditions can be challenged. They have been working in Vietnam, within the context of U.S. government policies, for periods ranging up to nine years. Donald Luce arrived in 1958, and three years later became director of the International Voluntary Services mission there. He has won the respect of both Americans and Vietnamese. Talking to Donald Kirk of the Washington Star, he described his reluctant conversion to an anti-war position. He has a master's degree in agriculture and economic development from Cornell, and at first international politics was far from his thoughts—he was interested only in helping the Vietnamese improve their agricultural techniques. Ngo Dinh Diem forced Luce to think politically, and disillusionment set in. But after the United States helped dispose of Diem, Luce's confidence returned; he was "quite hawkish" for a while. His final revulsion began late in 1965.

IVS members work at the local level in education, agriculture and community development, bringing American techniques to the Vietnamese peasant. They are largely idealistic youngsters, willing to break their backs in a good cause and to live on a stipend of $80 a month. According to Newsweek, IVS is generally regarded as the original model for the Peace Corps. Luce, described as "an ascetic man with an intense devotion to the Vietnamese peasantry," is now quitting, and taking forty-nine others out of a total of 152 with him. They have seen the country destroyed culturally and economically by the United States presence and the bombing, strafing and shelling to which the Vietnamese are subjected by the American military. The statement which they sent to President Johnson declares: "to stay in Vietnam and remain silent is to fail to respond to the first need of the Vietnamese people—peace."

They deplore Vietcong terrorism, but it is on nothing like the scale of American terrorism—although ours is never called by that name. The volunteers object to the killing of innocent civilians by air and artillery action, to the forcible resettlement of refugees, to the "Revolutionary Development" program, which is largely run by young Vietnamese motivated, sensibly enough as far as they are concerned, by a desire to avoid the draft and to enjoy the security of a government job.

The letter makes five recommendations: de-escalate the war, stop defoliation, stop bombing, recognize the National Liberation Front, and turn the war over to an international commission and abide by its recommendations. This could hardly be more at variance with the views of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who can think of nothing but escalate, escalate, escalate. But then, the Joint Chiefs do not work with Vietnamese peasants in the rice paddies, nor do they see the shattered bodies and the shattered land.

Luce hates to leave Vietnam, but he sees no choice. He declares he does not want to be associated with the "typical" protest movement against the Vietnamese War in the United States, which he thinks is dominated by hippie types, but to talk to Lions Clubs, women's groups, church auxiliaries and other plain middle-class Americans. When he returns to the States, he will have a surprise coming to him. The hippie types make good copy and are featured in print and on television, but even now they are far outnumbered in the peace movement by the plain middle-class Americans to whom Luce proposes to address himself. He will find that thousands more are only waiting to listen to his message.

The Troubled Army

The volunteers who could no longer stomach the horror which the United States has created in Vietnam have only praise for the Vietnamese people. The peasants, according to these young Americans who have lived among them, are strong, heroic, enduring. But these are terms that would normally be applied not to poor farmers but to the army of the nation to which they belong. Since the South Vietnamese army is necessarily recruited largely from just such peasants, one would expect that, further hardened and disciplined by training and the pride of the uniform, they would make a splendid combat force. Instead, there is almost unanimous agreement that the bulk of the ARVN is a military travesty.

The September 28 National Observer carries a long article titled "Inefficient, Slovenly and Lazy—The Troubled Army of South Vietnam." Ample evidence follows. There are a few good units, but overall the army is "the No. 1 scandal of the war, and it is the No. 1 failure of the American military command here." Even members of the Vietnamese officer corps subscribe to this view. Gen. Cao Van Vien, the chief of the Vietnamese joint staff, has cited his 25th Division as not only the worst in the Vietnamese army but "probably the worst in the world."

The army just doesn't want to fight. It is especially afraid of the dark, when the Vietcong is most confident. The chief trouble, the Americans agree, is with the officers. Many of these are holdovers from the French-commanded forces in Indo-China, when the chief requirement for a commission was a university degree and good family connections. Only the wealthy could belong to the officer corps for that reason, and also because the pay was so low that an independent income was a necessity. Even now, a private earns the equivalent of only $15 a month, while the average captain is paid $25, plus rice ration and housing. The housing is important because officers customarily take their families with them into the field—a strange way of going to war, but they prefer to spend the night in comparative safety with their families.

William Tuohy recently reported on this odd situation in the Los Angeles Times, in connection with a visit by Sen. Thomas H. Kuchel to the headquarters of a Revolutionary Development team in a Mekong Delta hamlet. The province chief, Lt. Col. Roa, said success depended on the deployment of a battalion from the 21st Vietnamese Army Division to protect the pacification activities. The U.S. adviser interrupted: "The only trouble with the battalion is that it is not guarding the hamlet's flank. It has parked itself inside the village, and there are plenty of Vietcong to the west." Kuchel had this confirmed by the Vietnamese officer. "The battalion," the U.S. adviser explained, "does not want to deploy to the west because it is more dangerous and less comfortable than settling down in the hamlet."

Such revelations are a sore embarrassment to Gen. William C. Westmoreland. He makes out as good a case as he can. The South Vietnamese army, he tells the correspondents, is "not fully effective, the way I want it to be, but they're better than they were a year ago." He doesn't say how much better, but adds stoutly, "I cannot conceive in my wildest imagination of abandoning these people," much as if they were foundlings, not soldiers.

The Vietcong, in contrast, are found to be highly disciplined—more like the peasants whom the volunteers found so admirable. The South Vietnamese army, one must conclude, is fighting (or not fighting) on the wrong side. If so, it will never improve substantially, and the suggestion often made in the States—by Sen. Charles Percy, Sen. Robert Kennedy and others—that more of the burden of the fighting should be shifted to the Vietnamese, is the stuff that dreams are made of.

Cracking Down on Castro

In 1962, the Organization of American States expelled revolutionary Cuba from the hemispheric sodality. In 1964, it called on its members to break economic and diplomatic relations with Castro. All but Mexico have since complied. Now, amid great rejoicing in Washington, further punishment has been meted out—this time with Mexico only abstaining, not opposing, in the vote on a resolution providing for tighter controls on shipping and vigilance against subversion. Mexico did adhere to a separate resolution that called on each OAS member to bring before the United Nations instances of Cuban subversion, or any other act of interference by one UN member in the affairs of another.

A third resolution overflowed with benevolence; the stern conferees changed roles and agreed to press for economic and social development in the hemisphere. If taken seriously, this would curb Castro more effectively than sanctions, but since only the United States is a source of the funds necessary for relieving misery in Latin America, and those funds are going into the Vietnamese War, space, anti-missile systems, etc., this resolution is not likely to be worth much.
